If Senator LODGE's view prevailed the same results would follow without the moral influence of the specific obligation of article 10. The moral obligation would exist any way to restrain an international outlaw from invading peaceful territory and upsetting the peace of the world.

I agree with President Wilson in believing the United States should enter on equal terms and with equal mutual obligations with other nations and not appear to distrust them or seem to seek the benefits of the treaty without being willing to meet our equal share of its burdens. I prefer article 10 as it is, but I am prepared, for the sake of passing the treaty and getting the advantages of it, to yield to the demand of a majority of my colleagues in the Senate. The views of the majority of the Senate are entitled to respect.

The country unhappily believes the differences are not reconciled because of personal and partisan pride.

I refuse to be a party to the defeat of the treaty or to its delay. I am ready to support it in any form and follow any leader who leads to its ratification, and I will not follow any leader who is leading to its defeat or delay.

Mr. President, the remarks which I have just delivered were written on March 7, before I was furnished with a mimeographed copy of the President's letter to Senator HITCHCOCK of March 8, and are subject, therefore, to that understanding where I seem to have misapprehended the President's position.

It appears now to be the wish of the President to have his Democratic associates vote with the irreconcilable opponents of the treaty, defeat the resolution of ratification, and make the "treaty without reservations" the issue of the next election.

I should regard this as a great injury to our domestic interests. The delay in establishing peace has helped to raise instead of helping to lower the cost of living. The defeat of the treaty would injure American prestige abroad.

With the treaty "with or without reservations" as the campaign issue, the discussion of our vital domestic problems of reconstruction—the cost of living, monopolies and profiteering, and so forth—will be obscured as behind a smoke screen to the benefit of those selfish interests which have been taking unjust advantage of our people.

It will be impossible at the next election to elect a Senate favorable to the treaty without reservations, and every well-informed public man knows it, so that after the campaign the treaty will be in no better position relatively than it is now, and with the "treaty without reservations" as the issue the Democratic Party would have a ruinous handicap.

As far as I am concerned, as an American Senator who for very many years has ardently and strenuously served his party and his country and supported the administration on all suitable occasions, I decline to assume the slightest responsibility for the delay or the defeat of the treaty.

Mr. OWEN subsequently said:

Mr. President, after I submitted my comment this morning there was handed to me a telegram addressed to the Washington Post by Mr. Bryan, which I wish to read:

RATIFY TREATY, BRYAN URGES ON DEMOCRATS.

As ratification of the peace treaty without reservations is no longer within the range of possibility, the only hope of the United States entering the League of Nations lies in compromise, and the prospect of ratification by compromise grows brighter as the Democratic Senators vote for reservations. Several have been adopted by more than a two-thirds vote, only 17 Democrats voting against the Walsh reservation.

I am confident that the Democratic Senators will refuse to assume responsibility for making article 10 a campaign issue. To do so would be suicidal.

It not only would be grossly unjust to the little European Republics that need our counsel and influence in the league, but it would draw attention away from the profiteers and permit them to practice extortion unmolested; and it would also give militarists an excuse to demand big Army and Navy appropriations. That can be prevented if we enter the League of Nations.

The Democratic Senators can serve their party, their country, and the world by hastening the ratification of the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the following substitute for the pending reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As the Chair understands the situation, the Senator from Massachusetts has a right to perfect the reservation as reported by the committee before consideration of the substitute offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I understood that the Senator from Massachusetts had perfected his amendment, but if he has not——

Mr. LODGE. No; I offered an amendment to the pending reservation. It strikes out nothing, and is a pure addition.

Mr. KING. I withhold my tendered substitute until the Senator from Massachusetts has perfected his reservation.

Mr. LODGE. I have nothing to perfect. I have offered an amendment. The vote will be on the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that all those parts which appear in italics in the printed copy of the reservation have been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I offered one amendment, to prefix six lines to the reservation. There is a subsequent amendment which will be offered later. It is also in italics.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair misunderstood the matter, inasmuch as the Secretary, under request, stated all the amendments proposed or intended to be proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I did not undertake to offer two amendments at once. I offered one amendment, which is to prefix certain words to the existing reservation. Then there is a second amendment to the text.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the numeral "14," designating the proposed reservation, the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to strike out the article "The" and to insert:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think some discussion of this very important amendment ought to be had before the Senate commits itself to it. At least there ought to be a clear understanding of the differences between the reservation as it was heretofore adopted by the Senate and the reservation as it would be if this amendment, with others proposed in connection with it, is adopted.

The amendment is to be followed by another, marked in italics in the draft of the reservation offered by the Senator from Massachusetts on February 11, namely:

Except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent.

So that the reservation in that part will read:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have cast more than one vote.

The first amendment proposed merely contemplates some future amendment of the covenant under which the United States shall have as many votes as any empire or nation with its self-governing colonies, dominions, and so forth, which means, as the matter has heretofore been interpreted, until the United States is granted 6 votes in the league.

Mr. President, whenever the United States is granted 6 votes in the league it follows, as a matter of course, that there is going to be a revision of the basis of representation. The United States is not going to have 6 votes in the league and France only 1. The United States is not going to have 6 votes in the league and Italy only 1. The United States is not going to have 6 votes in the league and Japan only 1.

Of course, Mr. President, if this read "until there is a revision of the basis of representation in the league, an amendment providing for a different basis of representation in the league, then the United States shall," and so forth, it would be all right; but we are not going to get any amendment of that character, and why should we provide for a condition until an amendment is made? I do not see that that helps the situation to any degree whatever. I think if the reservation is to be adopted at all it ought to be adopted as it was originally drawn, providing that the United States shall not be bound by any vote in which the self-governing colonies and dominions are permitted to vote, letting the future take care of itself so far as an amendment to the covenant is concerned changing the basis of representation. I think it would be exceedingly unwise for us to put into reservations any provision which would be effective or cease to be effective at some future time when the covenant is amended, so that the basis of representation shall be changed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator understands, does he not, that under the original reservation, even though the league covenant should be amended giving us a number of votes equal to that of any other member, nevertheless we would not be bound under the original reservation by any action taken where such votes were cast.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the statement I made. Under the original reservation the United States would not be bound.

Mr. LENROOT. So, after we got an equal number of votes, if we exercised them we still would not be bound under the reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is inconceivable that an amendment to the covenant should be made changing the basis of representation and yet that we should be entitled to exercise the right conveyed by the reservation. At that time, as a matter of course, the United States would be called upon to abandon any right that it had in the matter. That would be a condition of the acceptance of the new basis of representation.

Mr. LENROOT. If it was agreed that it should be abandoned, why bring up the question at that time at all?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why bring it up now?

Mr. LENROOT. Because we then make clear that if they exercise the option to amend the league covenant, this reservation shall no longer be binding whenever the United States shall be given a number of votes equal to that of any other nation with its colonies.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not care to delay the Senate further. I want the Senate to understand that this is a provision looking to a future amendment of the covenant of the league affecting the basis of representation. That is to say, we are to provide for what shall take place when the covenant of the league is amended. When the covenant of the league is amended, of course the amendment will take care of existing conditions.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Excuse me. It is as if we passed legislation here in Congress that should be effective when the Constitution of the United States shall at some time in the future be amended. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. We are simply providing that so long as this inequality exists we are not bound. When that condition is removed and we are upon an equality, we say that we are bound.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish to point out the very serious objection to the reservation as it originally existed. I am not speaking about the objection fundamentally; I am speaking about the way in which it is put and the rights which the United States would be entitled to exercise under it. Under the original reservation it is provided—

That the United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, have cast more than one vote.

Bear in mind it says, "have cast more than one vote." What does that mean? It means that an election takes place, an election of a new member of the league, an election admitting a new member to the council, a report of the council upon a dispute submitted to it, or any other matter upon which the council or the assembly is obliged to cast a vote. While all the process of voting is going on the United States stands by. It gambles upon the result, and the result is unsatisfactory to it, and then it declares that it will not be bound after the vote has been taken. It repudiates any obligation to observe it at all. Mr. President, that is indecent. Of course if the United States is not going to be bound by the vote in some way or other, its attitude concerning the matter ought to be expressed before the vote is taken.

Mr. REED. Is it not expressed if we say in this reservation that we will not be bound? Is not that notice then in advance?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is notice to them in advance that we do not assume to be bound. We can remain bound or not as we see fit. Accordingly, here is a dispute between the United States and another country, we will say between this country and France. It goes to the assembly and Great Britain and her self-governing colonies vote upon the question. We expect to get their votes or to get enough of them to carry the dispute in our favor. We go on and let them vote. They vote, and we do not object at all. As I said, we expect to get their votes, but we do not get them. They vote with France, and then we say we will not be bound by it anyway.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Before all that voting begins we serve notice on them in the most solemn manner, "No matter what this vote is, we will not be bound. If you cast more than one vote we refuse to be bound." What is unfair about that? Let us follow the Senator's illustration. Suppose we say that to them——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Really, I yield to the Senator for any question he has to put, but I do not think he ought to inject an argument in the midst of my discussion.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What difference is there, Mr. President? We say we assume no obligation to be bound, but notwithstanding that we submit our controversy to the council, we appeal to the assembly, the votes are taken, we expect to get a favorable result and our expectations are hopeless; they are not realized. Then we say to the conference, "Well, we will not be bound by it. See reservation No. 14."

I insist that if we are to deal fairly with the other nations of the earth in all the matters which we submit to adjudication and determination, and if we are not going to be bound by any decision that we ourselves invite by submitting the controversy to the council or on appeal to the assembly, as the case may be, the other parties in the dispute ought to know about it.

We ought to say in advance if we have any such dispute with France now, Great Britain and her six self-governing colonies or dominions are entitled each to cast a vote upon the dispute. We give notice in advance that if they do cast those six votes we will not be bound by the decision. Accordingly they will refrain from voting. But if we do not, if we stand by and allow them to vote without telling France in advance that we are not going to be bound by it, how can we in decency fail to recognize the decision as binding?

An amendment is proposed in order to meet that situation of affairs. It will be found in the draft submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on February 11 as follows:

Except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent.

In such a case as I have spoken of, a dispute between this country and France, we appeal to France to arbitrate the dispute and she declines to do it. We then submit the matter to the council, and having submitted it to the council we appeal to the assembly as provided in article 15. Mr. President, this reservation provides that if Congress does not pass an act consenting in advance to be bound by the decision, the self-governing colonies of Great Britain participating, we are still at liberty, even though we go through all the formalities of submitting the matter to the assembly, not to be bound by the decision. I insist that by all the rules of right and decency if we are not going to be bound, our member of the council or of the assembly, as the case may be, ought to say so, ought to announce clearly and distinctly and in unequivocal terms that the United States will not be bound.

It is a fundamental rule in every court that one can not gamble upon the verdict of a jury and afterwards complain about it. If he has any cause to complain, of which he knows in advance, he must tell it and disclose it and make his objection before the result is announced; he can not be heard to assert it afterwards. We ought not to reserve that right.

Much is said about the Americanization of this treaty; but, Mr. President, we can Americanize it to such an extent as will involve the honor of the United States; that is to say, we may ask things for ourselves in connection with these matters that in decency we ought not to ask. I submit that in all honor we ought not to ask the privilege of not being bound by a decision which we ourselves invite and ask and in respect to which we allow the self-governing dominions and colonies of Great Britain to vote without any protest whatever upon our part. I think the original reservation ought to be amended so as to provide that—

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases in which its consent has previously been given, by any election, decision, report, or finding—

And so on.

That is as far as we ought to go. If we keep silent under such a provision as that, we shall not be bound; the other parties will know it, and they will call upon us to declare whether or not we propose to be bound. Then we shall have to declare our attitude.

I appeal most sincerely and most earnestly to Senators whether these considerations are not such as ought to move us, regardful as we must be and as we are of the honor of our country, to put some such provision as this I have suggested in the reservation. It would be an intolerable condition of affairs if we had any controversy with any country on earth which we ourselves submitted to the council and by appeal to the assembly, allowed without protest the self-governing colonies and dominions of Great Britain to vote, and then, when the decision went against us, declared that we would not be bound by it. I do not believe that the Senate of the United States cares to put this Nation in that attitude.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The question before the Senate is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 14.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Curtis	Glass	Kendrick
Beckham	Dial	Gronna	Keyes
Borah	Edge	Hale	King
Brandegee	Elkins	Harris	Kirby
Capper	Fletcher	Harrison	Lenroot
Chamberlain	France	Henderson	Lodge
Colt	Frelinghuysen	Hitchcock	McCormick
Culberson	Gay	Jones, Wash.	McKellar
Cummins	Gerry	Kellogg	McNary

Moses	Phipps	Smith, Md.	Trammell
My[illegible]	Pittman	Smith, S. C.	Wadsworth
New	Poindexter	Smoot	Walsh, Mass.
Norris	Pomerene	Spencer	Walsh, Mont.
Nugent	Reed	Stanley	Warren
Overman	Sheppard	Sterling	Watson
Phelan	Smith, Ga.	Townsend	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon this reservation I ask to have read by the Secretary a statement by Mr. Rowell, acting secretary of state for external affairs, at Ottawa, Canada, as to what Canada will do in the event of the adoption of this reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

SAYS CANADA WILL NOT RATIFY UNDER LENROOT RESERVATION.

(By the Associated Press.)

"OTTAWA, February 16.

"N. W. Rowell, acting secretary of state for external affairs, declared emphatically last night that Canada would never consent to ratification of the peace treaty by the United States if the Lenroot reservation was adopted either in its original form or with the proposed amendment. Mr. Rowell, who is also president of the privy council, outlined Canada's position in a speech delivered before a mass meeting of war veterans.

"The Lenroot reservation would deprive Canada of her independent voting power in the League of Nations.

"'If the United States Senate should adopt the Lenroot reservation,' the secretary said, 'either in its original form or amended as now suggested, and should also adopt the preamble as proposed, Canada, as one of the nations of the British Empire and a party to the treaty, would be called upon to decide what action she should take under these conditions. There can be no possible doubt what Canada's decision will be. She can not and will not consent to any impairment of her status and voting rights under the treaty. Therefore, when final action on the treaty is taken by the Government of the United States, if the ratification can only become effective on Canada's assent thereto, the ratification can not go into effect, so far as Canada is concerned, as Canada will not give that assent.

"'Canada has made her position perfectly clear to the proper authorities in London and she has asked them to make her position clear to the authorities in Washington. We have done this in the interests of good understanding between the United States and Canada.

"'The reasons why Canada can not assent are so obvious that they need hardly be mentioned. I shall only mention one. Canada, by the free action of her own Government and the wholehearted cooperation of her own people, raised 600,000 men to take part in this war. She mortgaged her future to carry the burdens which her participation in the war involved. The flower of her youth lie buried in France and Flanders and thousands more are maimed for life in order that Canada as one of the free nations of the Britannic Commonwealth might make her contribution to the cause of liberty and the restoration of the world's peace.

"'In the light of these facts it is inconceivable that any government in Canada could be so false to both the living and the dead and to Canada's future as to give the assent of Canada to a proposal which would deprive Canada of the position and status won for her by her soldiers on the field of battle and accorded to her at the peace conference by the enlightened judgment of nations. Particularly this is the case when full status and voting rights are granted—and we think properly granted—to several nations of the American Continent, which either by reason of treaties with the United States or of economic necessity are dependent upon her; nations which took no part in the war and whose combined population probably does not exceed that of Canada.'"

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] continues to-day to urge the claims of a foreign nation as against the claims of the United States, which is entirely consistent with the course that he took yesterday; but I want to call attention to one paragraph of the article just read, sent to the desk by the Senator from Nebraska. It is as follows:

Canada has made her position perfectly clear to the proper authorities in London and she has asked them to make her position clear to the authorities in Washington.

"Canada has made her position clear to the authorities in London," and yet the Senator from Nebraska stands here upon this floor and says that Canada is a free and independent nation, when she can not even communicate with the United States except by sending her communication across the Atlantic Ocean twice before it can reach Washington!

The proper authorities in London—

"Authorities," speaking not only for the British Isles but for the entire British Empire, including Canada; and I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska indicate how Canada can object to these reservations.

Mr. REED. Through the proper authorities in London. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the galleries.

Mr. LENROOT. But if we are to believe that Lord Grey represents the attitude of the British Empire, presumably the foreign office in Great Britain would refuse to take the position of Canada and would not object, and Canada, notwithstanding the statements of the Senator from Nebraska in regard to her being free and independent, is so helpless, so subordinate, so subject to Great Britain that she has not even an opportunity to make an objection!

Now, just a word, Mr. President, with reference to the argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] as to the unfairness of this reservation.

There is an amendment that will next be offered providing that except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent we shall not be bound by any election, decision, and so forth, and so forth. I take it from the argument of the Senator from Montana that what he desires is to give to the representative of the United States in the League of Nations full and complete authority to bind the United States.

Mr. President, the United States had a representative at the peace conference who helped to frame this treaty and dictated it in large part. Fortunate, indeed, was it for the United States that that representative did not have the power to bind the United States by the action that he took.

Under the Constitution, the Senate stands between the people of the United States, for their protection, and the representative that the United States had at that peace conference; and if that representative had had the power to bind the United States, as the Senator from Montana now desires to have a representative of the United States in the League of Nations given power to bind the United States—in other words, if President Wilson had had the power to bind the United States at the peace conference—the liberty and independence of the people of the United States would have been destroyed to-day by this treaty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the vote. I simply call attention to a single paragraph in the English publication known as the National Review of February, 1920, which has just reached this country, in support of the argument which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has just been making.

In discussing the League of Nations this writer says:

The bonds which connect the constituent parts of an Empire or Commonwealth may be loosely or tightly drawn, strong or weak; but unity in its relations with the outside world is an essential condition of its continued integrity. The British Empire is often spoken of as a partnership of sister nations. But partners, whether in government or trade, must owe undivided allegiance in matters of common concern to their own partnership. They must speak with one voice in their relations with the outside world. They must settle their policy together and must not individually take their instructions from strangers.

The whole argument is crystallized in a single sentence—that however they may be associated together as a partnership, whether loosely or tightly, or whatever differences they may have among themselves, whatever may be their different interests in the different localities, when they come to deal with the outside world they speak with one voice; that is to say, they are a united people. Of course, everybody knows that is true with reference to the British Empire—that while the Empire covers all races and reaches to all climes and all conditions of existence, when they speak to the outside world they are one; and in this instance they would do the same, regardless of the fact that Canada, upon the north, is a western country.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the series of amendments presented to the Senate does not include as an alternative an amendment which was proposed by my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON of California], who is absent from the Chamber at the present time, and of whose present views I have no information; but in order to bring it before the Senate, I will offer it now. I desire to state that when it was proposed last November it was defeated by a close vote of 46 to 43.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California offer it as a substitute?

Mr. PHELAN. As a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the substitute is not in order until the amendments pending to the reservation, which may be termed perfecting amendments, are disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, Mr. President, I will bide my time.

I desire to state, though, while I have the floor, that the amendment proposes to give one vote each to England and her five colonies of South Africa, India, Australia, New Zealand, and Canada. The pending amendment endeavors to confine the British Empire in the deliberations of the assembly to one vote, which would represent England and all her colonies, and that would equalize the empire with the United States; but I have been of the opinion—and I supported last November this amendment which I now propose—that it would be very much better, if a change is to be made in the covenant, to allow each of these self-governing colonies to have a vote, and to allow the United States to have a vote equivalent to the sum of all the votes of the colonies plus the mother country.

The object, sir, would be this: First, these several colonies of New Zealand, Australia, and Canada understand particularly our Pacific problem and are with the United States in its desire to prevent oriental aggression in the Pacific. When the matter of national or racial equality was proposed by the Japanese, Baron Makino, at the peace conference, I am convinced that the representatives of the United States voted with Great Britain, voicing the sentiment of her colonies, and, thus denying unanimity of action, defeated the proposal of the Japanese. If that proposal had prevailed and had become an article of the League of Nations, the United States would be unable, unless in violation of the pact, to deny to the Japanese free immigration, citizenship, land ownership, intermarriage, and all those privileges which pertain to the nationals of other lands.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator has spoken of Australia and Canada very likely taking the view that California takes against Japanese immigration. I think that is true; but at the same time that we admit to voting Australia and Canada, we also admit India. Does the Senator know how India would stand on that question?

Mr. PHELAN. I have no knowledge as to that.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know how South Africa would vote on that question?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; I am convinced that South Africa is opposed to oriental immigration.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator any especial reason for that?

Mr. PHELAN. Nothing except the general attitude of the South Africanders against the importation of coolies; and, of course, for that matter, the people of India, the Hindus, fear Japan, as do all the oriental peoples, because they are a warlike and aggressive and in some respects a superior people.

Mr. REED. But, if the Senator will pardon me, does his State desire immigration from India? Under this League of Nations, if India is received, and India's people wanted to immigrate to California, and the question was racial equality, does not the Senator think that India would vote for her own racial equality, assuming now that India had anything to say about it?

Mr. PHELAN. I am disposed to agree with the Senator that all the orientals would stand together on a question of racial equality; but we have excluded the Hindus by our present immigration law of 1917, because India is included in the barred zone.

Mr. REED. Of course you have excluded them; but, of course, they will raise the question again if they are really members of this league. I think the Senator will agree with that. The Senator and I are in complete accord in the idea of keeping out of this country these dark-skinned races of men, because I do not think they amalgamate with our people, and I do not think they benefit our people; but it seems to me there is this weakness in the Senator's argument, if he will permit me just a word. While it is true that Australia and Canada probably would vote on this question as California would vote, assuming, now, that they are permitted freedom of action, still India votes and South Africa votes, and at any time Egypt may be made a self-governing colony and it would vote. Indeed, Great Britain might easily out of her vast domains make a number of independent colonies among the oriental races, all of them eligible, so does not the Senator think that is considerable of an offset to the advantage we might possibly get through the support of Canada and Australia?

I just put it to the Senator as a matter of consideration.

Mr. PHELAN. I think the Senator's fears are groundless. He intimates there might be a subdivision of the British Provinces, and they would be in turn accorded colonial home rule or self-government, and they would then be eligible for election in the league as members. But it is hardly reasonable to suppose that they would be admitted to the League of Nations, because it would be so obvious an attempt on the part of somebody to increase representation.

However, if the British colonies are to be admitted I do not know why they should be limited to India, South Africa, New Zealand, Australia, and Canada. There is a very eligible member which has been ignored, a country so overflowing with the ability to govern that she has representation in every country except her own. I think Ireland should be included.

I wish to draw the line, however, between the amendment as proposed, and which is before us, giving to Great Britain one vote, which includes all her colonies, and the alternative proposition as proposed by the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], giving to Great Britain one vote and each of these five colonies one vote, making a total of six, and then, when the United States joins the league she shall have an equal number of votes, namely, six votes. That preserves in the league these great Commonwealths, and they may serve us in time of need, whether it be in peace or war, in solving the great question which impends—the awakening of the Orient, and the aggression in the Pacific by a race of fighting men, which won, I remember very well, the admiration of Theodore Roosevelt, who, in the settlement of the treaty of peace at Portsmouth against Russia and in favor of Japan, performed an act which in his mind at the time settled the peace of the Pacific.

But I fear that his appreciation of the merits of the fighting men of Japan is only too well borne out by the facts. They are of warlike spirit and have risen from semibarbarism in 60 years to dominate Asia to-day, and capable of taking a place, and no one denies Japan a place, among the family of great European nations which have subsisted for a thousand years. She is capable of building great warships with as much skill as ourselves. There is nothing that she can not do, and there is nothing she will not attempt to do. She feels the power and vigor of youth as a new nation, springing, as it were, from the void; and it has been the history of the world that these new nations, springing out of obscure places, have dominated; and, as in the case of Egypt and of Rome and of Greece, the older and more cultivated nations go down, perhaps for the very reason of their cultivation, because the refinements and gratifications of civilization enervate and weaken. And here is this rising nation, and I look to Australia, which understands the question, and to New Zealand and to Canada and to South Africa, if not to India, to stand by us in a pact of peace to solve this question in an orderly way without recourse to arms. If it is not settled in a peaceful way, inevitably, it may be in 5 years, or 10 years, or 20 years, there will be a conflict between the Orient and the Occident.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is his position that we should not enter this league at all, or ratify this treaty, unless the United States is given a number of votes equal to those of the British Empire?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator asks whether or not we should go into the league at all unless——

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator think we should not go into the league at all, or ratify the treaty, unless the United States is given a number of votes equal to those of the British Empire?

Mr. PHELAN. I am not prepared to say that I would consent to that for this reason, that I believe a League of Nations, established on the lines proposed by the President, or on any other reasonable lines, is going to serve the great purpose of peace, and I believe the understanding in the country, which has given its adhesion to the league, is that its primary purpose is to avert war. The people are not very much interested between tweedledum and tweedledee. They only see the great purpose of the league. They realize the ideals of the President. Certainly I would not disapprove a league, even if it did not contain the terms of the amendment which I propose.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator understand that if the reservation which he now proposes is adopted it does keep us out of the league, and does prevent the ratification of the treaty unless this equality is secured?

Mr. PHELAN. That is to say, there are a sufficient number of members on the other side who oppose the league——

Mr. LENROOT. No; under the terms of the Senator's amendment, we could not enter the league, we could not ratify the treaty, unless the equality is secured, if the Senator's amendment is adopted.

Mr. PHELAN. The amendment simply provides for this representation as a reservation. Then the Senator means that the parties on the other side would not consent to it?

Mr. LENROOT. No; the Senator's proposal is an amendment, not a reservation. It amends the treaty, and of course that amendment would have to be affirmatively accepted. The Senator has just stated that he would not keep the United States out of the league upon that account, but his reservation does keep the United States out of the league, even though everything else were agreed upon.

Mr. PHELAN. Then the Senator assumes that the other parties to the covenant will not agree——

Mr. LENROOT. No; I am assuming nothing. The Senator's reservation states that the United States will not become a member of the league unless the United States is given six votes.

Mr. PHELAN. The United States makes that proposition on its own account, and if it is concurred in by the other parties the supposition which the Senator has proposed does not arise.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but we do not become a party to the treaty unless that amendment is made, under the Senator's own proposition.

Mr. PHELAN. The reservation proposed by me is as follows:

The Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations and conditions, anything in the covenant of the League of Nations and the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding:

When any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire which are also members of the league the United States shall have representatives in the council and assembly and in any labor conference or organization under the league or treaty numerically equal to the aggregate number of representatives of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in such council and assembly of the league and labor conference or organization under the league or treaty; and such representatives of the United States shall have the same powers and rights as the representatives of said member and its self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire; and upon all matters whatsoever, except where a party to a dispute, the United States shall have votes in the council and assembly and in any labor conference or organization under the league or treaty numerically equal to the aggregate vote to which any such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire are entitled.

Whenever a case referred to the council or assembly involves a dispute between the United States and another member of the league whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the council or assembly, or between the United States and any dominion, colony, or part of any other member of the league, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

Whenever the United States is a party to a dispute which is referred to the council or assembly, and can not, because a party, vote upon such dispute, any other member of the council or assembly having self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire also members, upon such dispute to which the United States is a party or upon any phase of the question shall have and cast for itself and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire, all together, but one vote.

I do not see that the Senator has convinced me that it is either this amendment or nothing.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator, does he not see that it is not a reservation, but an amendment changing the terms of the treaty, and that if it is adopted we are out of the league and can not ratify the treaty unless the league covenant is amended?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator has not heard the language, which is the the language of his colleague on the other side of the aisle, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. It reads:

The Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations——

Mr. LENROOT. The language is the language of the Senator's colleague, who is against the treaty.

The Senator proposes it as a friend of the treaty. When proposed by the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] it was immaterial to him; in fact, he would be delighted to have it kill the treaty; but now a friend of the treaty proposes it for the purpose of killing it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I want to remind the Senator from Wisconsin that under the preamble of these reservations, at least as it now stands, none of the reservations take effect, nor does the resolution of ratification take effect, unless it is approved by the express acceptance of some of the members of the league. I want to know from the Senator what is the difference between a provision that does not become effective unless accepted by some of the members of the league and a provision such as this, to which he calls our attention, which does not become effective until accepted by all the members of the league?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to answer the question. In the first place, even though the preamble stood as it was adopted last November, which I have every reason to believe it will not, nevertheless, since that time the League of Nations has come into being. The ambassadors of the various nations can not amend the League of Nations. That will depend upon the representatives of the nations who have ratified the treaty in the council and the assembly. The ambassadors can not accept reservations amending the treaty. They can accept reservations by which the United States does not ratify all the treaty. But now there is only one way by which this league covenant can be amended and that is in the way provided by the covenant. The Senator's proposition, as he proposes it, says as plainly as words can say it, that he is in favor of rejecting the treaty, of the United States keeping out of it, unless in the manner provided by the league covenant it is amended so as to give the United States 6 votes. I do not think the Senator from California wishes to occupy that position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin is not convincing to me, however it may be to the Senator from California.

One of the reservations which we have proposed is to the effect that the United States shall not be bound by any decision touching a question which it says is domestic in character. The covenant, however, provides that it shall be bound when the council determines otherwise. What is the difference between a reservation in that regard and an amendment in that regard? Has not the covenant been amended by that reservation, and must not that reservation be accepted by all the other nations, members of the league, either expressly or impliedly, in order to be effective at all?

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean to say that this league covenant can be amended in any other way than as provided in the covenant itself?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not undertake to say anything of the kind. But I do undertake to say that neither a reservation nor an amendment proposed by the Senate of the United States can become effective in any way except by being expressly or impliedly accepted by the other nations, and it does not make any difference what you call it. The Senator has pointed out very clearly that it is a matter of substance, not a matter of language, and the operation is exactly the same. If you can secure the limitations provided by the reservations in a particular way, if you can get the reservations as suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, you can get the same thing in the same way with reference to the reservation proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the Senator from Montana a question, because perhaps I have misunderstood the league covenant entirely. Does the Senator from Montana now take the position that the league covenant can be amended by one nation, the other nations remaining silent?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; the Senator does not take any such position, neither does he take the position that any reservation can be attached to the resolution of ratification so as to be effective unless it also is accepted by all the other nations, either expressedly or implied.

Mr. LENROOT. But in the one case they are bound and in the other case they are not, as the Senator must admit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Who is bound?

Mr. LENROOT. If there is an amendment, silence binds nobody. If there is a reservation, silence means acceptance to the reservation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not agree with the Senator at all on that. Silence has exactly the same effect in the one case as it has in the other. Silence will make an amendment effective. If we ratify the treaty with an amendment, and all the other nations of the earth parties to the agreement, without saying a word, go on and act under the treaty as though the amendment were a part of it as we proposed it, they are bound by it just the same as though we put it in as a reservation.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have not lost the floor, I trust?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to take just a moment further if the Senator will yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I will yield to the Senator from Wisconsin for a moment.

Mr. LENROOT. That presents a most curious doctrine, because amendments of the league covenant are very analogous to amendments to the Federal Constitution. Would anyone say that an amendment can be proposed to the Federal Constitution, and by a State remaining silent it becomes effective and binding? That is where the argument of the Senator from Montana leads him.

Now, just a word further. I do not want to take too much of the time of the Senator from California.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I simply dispute the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin. The conditions are not analogous at all.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely wish to say this to the Senator from California. I am sure that both the Senator from California and the Senator from Montana must realize the difference between a reservation and an amendment. There is no reservation pending here that is an amendment in any degree. The only amendment that is proposed now is that of the Senator from California. Our reservations do not affect the terms of the treaty. They are not binding upon us to-day. Are they binding when we ratify the treaty in part? We have simply not ratified that part of the treaty which seeks to impose obligations upon us. It does not in any degree change the terms of the treaty, but the amendment of the Senator from California does completely change the terms of the treaty.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin one question?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if the effect of the proposed reservation No. 14 is not identical with the effect which he claims would result by the adoption of the amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Because there is no obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not. Under the Senator's so-called reservation the treaty must be amended in its terms. Under the pending reservation Canada can vote, every one of the British colonies may vote, and we still will have only one vote; but we do not ratify that part of the treaty which would attempt to bind the United States by that proposition.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that we are discussing the so-called Lodge reservation No. 14, and that the amendment which I propose will be submitted after the committee amendments have been either approved or rejected, but I thought while I was on my feet—it is so difficult to get the floor, but it is even more difficult to hold it—that I would say there is another very good reason why the six votes should be given to the colonies rather than only one vote to Great Britain, equalizing the votes by giving the United States six votes. It is that these great self-governing colonies will be given a very much greater confidence in themselves, and it serves to establish in a still greater degree than they enjoy by charter from England a position of independence and of autonomy.

Just as soon as they feel that sense of independence and autonomy by reason of their membership as equals in the League of Nations, they will draw away from this British Empire, which seems to have been exposed to bitter attack upon this floor. It would be a measure, in that view, that should satisfy those gentlemen for the purpose of promoting imperial disintegration; but if the pending reservation prevails, and the colonies have to go to Great Britain and make humble plea for their rights, for a voice in the league through the mother country, the tendency will be all the other way, and there will be a firmer and a closer alliance between the mother country and the colonies.

If we want to give independence to small nations, and these are small only in the sense that they are called colonies—they are great nations—if we want to give independence, here is a means of doing it, giving them an equal voice with the mother country in the League of Nations and protecting ourselves by reserving, on account of our larger interests and vaster population, an equal representation, so that we shall not be outvoted in the assembly of the league.

But no matter what we reserve for ourselves, nevertheless it remains true that those colonies under this amendment would assume an independent and automatic position which they do not now enjoy, and it would not only serve their interests, but every great interest in the world, by drawing them from the apron strings of a mother who is very aggressive in the world of commerce and of trade, and who, indeed, is our one great surviving rival. It for no other and higher purpose would be excellent strategy to give to the colonies an equal vote.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, some comments made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] a short time ago move me to remark that it is entirely unnecessary for anyone to undertake to institute a comparison between the comprehension of the President of the United States of the principles of American liberty and his devotion to the preservation of the same, and those of the Senator from Wisconsin. History will have to decide that question.

What I wanted to say, however, is that the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin very clearly discloses by his silence with respect to the matter that the original reservation ought to be changed. He says it is proposed to change it so that we shall not be placed in the position of inviting a determination of the assembly upon some question which we have submitted to it, standing by and allowing Great Britain and her colonies and dominions to vote and then afterwards refusing to be bound by the decision thus rendered. He says it is proposed that the reservation shall provide that the United States shall not be bound unless Congress shall give its consent in advance. The Senator is very much disturbed lest our representative upon the council shall surrender the liberties of the people of this country and violate the Constitution. If any provision is to be made to avoid the effect of the reservation to which I have called the attention of the Senate, it ought to be a sensible provision, it ought to be something that will take care of the case.

Much has been said about a controversy between this country and Japan over the question of racial equality. Let us suppose such a dispute as that arose. Let us suppose for the sake of the discussion that it is not strictly a domestic question and that the United States does not so urge, but submits that or some other question—it is of no consequence what it is—to the determination of the council and on appeal to the assembly. Now, it is proposed that there shall be an act of Congress passed consenting, upon the part of the United States, that Canada and Australia may vote on the question, and the United States agrees to be bound.

That is utterly impractical. I do not mean to say that those who proposed it know it is impractical, but they certainly could not have reflected upon it and considered that it is. The reservation reaches to every election, every decision, every report, every finding of the council or the assembly, and the United States is in the position to which I have adverted, unless Congress in advance passes an act under which it becomes bound by the decision, even though Canada and Australia should vote upon it. That is not a practical proposition at all. Everybody ought to recognize that it is not a practical proposition. Either you ought to make a provision that is adequate to the case or you ought to make no provision at all.

Suppose you make no provision at all. Let me call your attention to the situation of affairs. Here is a controversy between this country and Japan. We submit it to the council and from the council we appeal to the assembly. If the colonies vote at all upon that, we are not bound. What does that mean? It means simply that when any controversy comes up to which the United States is a party the colonies can not vote. That is all there is to it, because if they do vote they destroy the effect of the judgment. What does that mean? It means that the colonies of Great Britain can prevent us, if they care to do so, from submitting any controversy whatever to the arbitrament of the council or the assembly. Of course, you can not have a decision that is binding upon one side without being binding upon the other. A decision can not bind the opposing party and leave the United States free. Of course, no nation will be compelled to submit a controversy under such conditions as that.

Moreover, Mr. President, how can we stop Canada from voting? A controversy comes up between us, we will say, and Mexico, which is submitted to the council, and, upon appeal, to the assembly. Canada casts her vote; Great Britain casts her vote; the decision is not binding upon the United States. Of course, it could not be binding upon Mexico when it is not binding upon us. In other words, this operates to prevent us from submitting any controversy at all with any nation, so far as I can see, unless the colonies of Great Britain voluntarily decline to participate in the proceedings; so, in a measure, they control our destiny under this reservation. If these conclusions are not correct, I should like to have some Senator explain why they are not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to reservation No. 14.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dial	Harrison	Knox
Ball	Dillingham	Henderson	Lenroot
Beckham	Elkins	Hitchcock	Lodge
Borah	Fletcher	Johnson, S. Dak.	McCormick
Brandegee	France	Jones, N. Mex.	McKellar
Capper	Gay	Jones, Wash.	McLean
Chamberlain	Gerry	Kellogg	McNary
Colt	Glass	Kendrick	Moses
Culberson	Gore	Keyes	Myers
Cummins	Hale	King	Nelson
Curtis	Harris	Kirby	New

Norris	Ransdell	Spencer	Wadsworth
Nugent	Reed	Stanley	Walsh, Mass.
Page	Sheppard	Sterling	Walsh, Mont.
Phelan	Sherman	Sutherland	Watson
Phipps	Shields	Thomas	Williams
Pittman	Smith, Ga.	Townsend	Wolcott
Poindexter	Smith, S. C.	Trammell
Pomerene	Smoot	Underwood

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] on important official business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment to reservation 14 offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and embraced in the first six lines of the printed reservation.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been called for on the amendment. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I promised to take care of him by pair during that absence. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I do so, and vote "yea."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]. I ask that the announcement of the transfer may stand for the day. On this question I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent. For that reason I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to do so, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer for the day to my colleague [Mr. NEWBERRY]. I ask that this announcement may stand for all votes taken to-day. On this question I vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. WARREN'S name was called). The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is absent on official business of the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. That Senator is absent on account of illness. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on official business of the Senate. He is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If present, the Senator from North Carolina would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Ball	France	McCormick	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Smoot
Brandegee	Gore	McNary	Spencer
Capper	Gronna	Moses	Sterling
Chamberlain	Hale	Nelson	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	New	Townsend
Cummins	Kellogg	Norris	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Page	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kirby	Poindexter	Watson
Elkins	Knox	Reed
Fernald	Lenroot	Sherman
Fletcher	Lodge	Shields

NAYS—28.

Ashurst	Harrison	McKellar	Ransdell
Beckham	Henderson	Myers	Sheppard
Culberson	Hitchcock	Nugent	Simmons
Dial	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Smith, Md.
Gay	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Smith, S. C.
Gerry	Kendrick	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Glass	King	Pomerene	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—18.

Calder	La Follette	Robinson	Underwood
Fall	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Harding	Newberry	Stanley	Williams
Harris	Overman	Swanson
Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Thomas

So Mr. LODGE'S amendment to reservation No. 14 was agreed to, the amendment being to strike out the word "The," the first word, and insert:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate, shall be entitled to cast, the.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move as a further amendment, in line 7, to insert the words "except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 7, after the word "bound," it is proposed to insert the words "except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment as it is proposed by striking out all after the word "cases" therein, and substituting the words "in which its consent has previously been given," so that it will read:

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases in which its consent has previously been given.

I again submit that it is utterly impracticable to get the consent of Congress in advance so that the United States shall be bound by any election, any decision, any report, or any finding of the council or assembly. The council or assembly could not take a vote on anything unless Congress previously passed an act declaring that the United States would be bound.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Montana who he thinks should have the power to give this consent?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why, Mr. President, we ought either to leave it exactly as it is, and say we will not be bound, or put it in the hands of some one who can give the consent appropriately.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but if the Senator's amendment is adopted?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, I have not any hesitancy at all about saying that the consent ought to be given by our representative on the council.

Mr. LENROOT. That is what I wanted to know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Montana to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The READING CLERK. On page 1, line 7, it is proposed to strike out the words "where Congress has previously given its consent," and to insert the words "in which its consent has previously been given," so that, if amended, it will read:

Except in cases in which its consent has previously been given.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will not prevail. It is an amendment to my amendment, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment now being voted upon is the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who is absent, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is absent from the Senate and the city on account of illness. I therefore am not at liberty to vote, and must withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. Making the same announcement as to the pair of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], I desire to state that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent and I therefore withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ashurst	Harrison	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Stanley
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.

NOT VOTING—17.

Calder	La Follette	Robinson	Warren
Fall	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Harding	Newberry	Swanson
Harris	Overman	Thomas
Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Underwood

So the amendment of Mr. WALSH of Montana to Mr. LODGE's amendment to reservation No. 14 was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to reservation No. 14.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and transfer as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). Repeating the previous announcement, that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness, being unable to secure a pair, I desire to announce that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The result was announced—yeas 55, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—55.

Ashurst	France	Lodge	Reed

Johnson, Calif.	Owen	Thomas

So Mr. LODGE's amendment to reservation No. 14 was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer one formal amendment. At the top of page 2, I move to strike out the word "and" and insert the words "the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Begin a new paragraph, strike out the conjunction "and," and insert the words "the United States," so as to read:

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Unless within one year after the filing of the act of ratification, part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States shall cease to be a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the amendment requires very little explanation. It is intended to quiet the apprehensions of those Senators who have feared lest an immediate insistence upon an equality of votes would prevent or delay the United States from assuming the obligations and responsibilities entailed by the covenant. It is intended to meet their apprehensions, and at the same time ultimately to guarantee to the United States the equality in voting strength to which the position of the United States and the numbers of the American people entitle them.

This issue has been presented repeatedly to the Senate, as the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] pointed out a few moments ago. When last presented it failed by an infinitesimal margin. The consciousness and conscience of Senators as they and their constituents came to understand the problem made them in increasing numbers, mindful of the present and the future, insist that the United States should have as many votes in the League of Nations as any other power.

Upon the amendment, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and its transfer. I will allow this announcement to stand for the rest of the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my absent pair and myself are of the same mind in regard to this amendment, and I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. Again announcing the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin on account of illness, I wish to state that I am unable to get a pair for him, and announce that if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the negative). I find that my pair, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], has not voted. I therefore transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced; yeas 19, nays 57 as follows:

YEAS—19.

Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sherman
Cummins	Knox	Phelan	Shields
Fernald	McCormick	Phipps	Sutherland

So Mr. McCORMICK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to offer a substitute for the pending reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed substitute.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the reservation as amended, the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] proposes the following:

The Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations and conditions, anything in the covenant of the League of Nations and the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding:

"When any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire which are also members of the league the United States shall have representatives in the council and assembly and in any labor conference or organization under the league or treaty numerically equal to the aggregate number of representatives of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in such council and assembly of the league and labor conference or organization under the league or treaty; and such representatives of the United States shall have the same powers and rights as the representatives of said member and its self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire; and upon all matters whatsoever, except where a party to a dispute, the United States shall have votes in the council and assembly and in any labor conference or organization under the league or treaty numerically equal to the aggregate vote to which any such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire are entitled.

"Whenever a case referred to the council or assembly involves a dispute between the United States and another member of the league whose self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire are also represented in the council or assembly, or between the United States and any dominion, colony, or part of any other member of the league, neither the disputant members nor any of their said dominions, colonies, or parts of empire shall have a vote upon any phase of the question.

"Whenever the United States is a party to a dispute which is referred to the council or assembly, and can not, because a party, vote upon such dispute, any other member of the council or assembly having self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire also members, upon such dispute to which the United States is a party or upon any phase of the question shall have and cast for itself and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire, all together, but one vote."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the substitute offered by the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN obtained the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order against the reservation.

Mr. PHELAN. I was going to ask consent that the first four lines of my amendment be eliminated, as follows:

The Senate of the United States advises and consents to the ratification of said treaty with the following reservations and conditions, anything in the covenant of the League of Nations and the treaty to the contrary notwithstanding.

I would let the balance remain. If there is no objection, I submit the substitute with the elimination of those lines.

I do not desire further to occupy the attention of the Senate, because earlier in the day I explained the reasons why I offer this as a substitute in lieu of the Lodge reservation No. 14.

This amendment was proposed last November by my colleague, the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who is not present to-day, and I am not aware of his interest in this matter. But I desire to remind the Senate that when it was voted upon last November it received 43 votes against 46, which would indicate that the Senate was about evenly divided on the merits of the two propositions. By proposing this now the Senate is given an opportunity of providing six votes, as far as it is able, for Great Britain and her colonies and six votes for the United States, instead of one vote for the British Empire and her colonies and one vote for the United States.

There are many reasons that might be urged, but I refrain from repeating the reasons. The principal one is this, that these colonies having independent votes will assert their independence and autonomy and be no longer so closely allied to the Empire of Great Britain, which seems to be objectionable to many Senators who spoke on this side and the other side of the Chamber this morning.

The other reason is that the Pacific colonies particularly—New Zealand, Australia, and Canada—understand our Pacific difficulties in dealing with the Orient, and their support would serve to solve these great questions which are impending and which can not be put aside without recourse to arms. If they are equal members of the league, we may with them the better subserve the purposes of the league and avert war and preserve peace in a distracted world. The object is so great and so in harmony with the purposes of the league that I think my substitute should prevail.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this is clearly an amendment of the treaty. That can not be denied and has not been denied by any Senator. Since the Senate voted last November the League of Nations has come into being, and the league covenant can be amended only in the method prescribed in the league covenant itself. That is very clear and must be very clear to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

While I could understand, even though the same condition has arisen, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] offering this amendment at this time, if he were here, because he is opposed to the entire treaty, I must confess my surprise at any friend of the treaty proposing the amendment now, because if this amendment is adopted the United States stays out of the league and can not get into the league unless the amendment is adopted by the methods prescribed in the league covenant.

What is that method? The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is one of the ablest lawyers in the Senate, gave as his view that this amendment could be adopted by acquiescence of all the nations parties to the treaty, and I undertook to say that amendments to the league covenant were analogous to amendments to the Constitution, and drew attention to the absurdity that would follow the Senator's logic carried out to its fullest extent, because if amendments to the league covenant could be made by acquiescence of the different parties, likewise an amendment to the Constitution of the United States when proposed could become effective if the States did not affirmatively object to it. The Senator from Montana in reply stated there was no analogy between amendments to the covenant and amendments to the Constitution. Let us see.

The Constitution provides that an amendment proposed by the Congress shall become effective when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States. The league covenant provides that amendments to the covenant will take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly. I am very sure that upon reflection the able Senator from Montana will not assert that amendments to the covenant can be made by acquiescence, because the language is the same, so far as ratification is concerned, in the league covenant as the language in the Constitution, and the only difference is as to the number required to ratify.

The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], therefore, in proposing this amendment throws an additional obstacle in the way of ratification of the treaty. The Senator from California when he proposes this amendment, although he voted for unconditional ratification last November, now says by his amendment that he desires the United States to remain outside of the league; that this treaty be not ratified unless the league covenant be amended so as to give the United States six votes, or an equal number of votes to those of any other nation.

Why, Mr. President, the pending reservation as amended makes full provision at any time that the council of the league and the members composing the league in the assembly are willing to ratify so as to give the United States an equal number of votes this reservation no longer becomes effective. So the only purpose of the Senator from California, it seems to me, in offering the substitute is so that if they shall not amend the League of Nations he would prevent the United States from becoming a member of the league at all. I can well understand those on this side who are known as bitter enders, or irreconcilables, taking that position, because they desire to defeat the treaty, but it does pass my comprehension how any friend of the treaty can make such a proposition as this.

Just a word more. I voted not for this reservation because it is not a reservation at all but clearly an amendment. It has no business in a separate reservation. I did vote for the Johnson amendment. The League of Nations had not become effective then. We have brought the treaty before the Senate at this time not for the purpose of placing additional obstacles in the way of ratification, but in an endeavor to see if some agreement can not be made to secure the ratification of the treaty. I can not see how any friend of the treaty can justify making a motion that clearly would put additional obstacles, obstacles in addition to those that now remain, to the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], one of the ablest lawyers in this body, asserted that this amendment particularly could be adopted by acquiescence, and I am willing to stand upon his opinion as a lawyer in interpreting the covenant of the league, as well as the universal practice.

What we are dealing with is a treaty of peace with Germany, and inextricably bound up with it is a covenant for a League of Nations. It has been the universal practice in diplomacy for one party to a treaty to make exceptions or reservations or what are tantamount to amendments, in which event the other party to the treaty simply by silence may give its acquiescence, so that the amendment or reservation of the party proposing it becomes effective without formal and express approval. That has been settled here in the debate. There is this significance in the Senator's opposition, however. The amendment which has been tentatively approved—the Lodge amendment to reservation No. 14—provides in this language:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast—

That is the Johnson proposal, which I have renewed—

the United States—

Continues the Lodge amendment—

the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than 1 vote.

That would be very satisfactory, provided we had any assurance that the covenant of the League of Nations would, pursuant to this paragraph, be amended. We have no such assurance, but the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], with considerable insight, discovered what I have just revealed—that this is, to a large extent, a misleading and a vain paragraph. Until 6 votes are given by formal amendment to the covenant, then 1 vote shall prevail——

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. I refuse to yield for a moment. The Senator from Illinois in his amendment provides as follows:

Unless within one year after the filing of the act of ratification, part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States shall cease to be a member of the League of Nations.

The Senate has just voted down that amendment of the Senator from Illinois, and how did the Senator from Wisconsin vote? He voted against it. Therefore, while pleading that the reservation which I have proposed is in effect an amendment and can not, without destroying the league, be adopted, he denied us the only other way, by the Lodge amendment reinforced by the McCormick amendment, which would have promised us, at any rate, that within a year this important provision granting 6 votes to each would become a part of the covenant, otherwise the United States would cease to be a member of the league. Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, since the Senator from California has alluded to me in this handsome fashion, let me welcome Saul among the prophets; but there is this distinction, that whereas the Senator from California, like myself, has discovered that the Lenroot reservation is a delusion and a snare, I have made the same discovery regarding the other reservations which have been adopted. There are Senators here who suggest the classification of insurance; they know the league to be inflammable, and they think by reservations to make it a mere "sprinkled risk."

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from California yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PHELAN. I have concluded, Mr. President.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from California referred to my vote upon the McCormick amendment. I might ask the Senator from California how he voted upon that amendment?

Mr. PHELAN. I voted in favor of the McCormick amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and did not the Senator say, perhaps half an hour ago, that even though voting equality were not secured he would prefer that the United States remain in the League of Nations? Did he not make that statement in reply to me?

Mr. PHELAN. That is my position.

Mr. LENROOT. And yet the Senator voted a little while ago to take the United States out of the League of Nations at the end of one year unless voting equality were granted.

Mr. PHELAN. Well, Mr. President, there are many methods by which one can accomplish one's purpose without going to war or without surrendering his ground. I happen to know, as the Senator knows and as the country knows, that any reservation proposed by the United States will be acceptable to European nations, so eager are they to include the United States in the league. So if we say, "We will get out in a year unless you do this thing which we have provided for by reservation," they will do it; and I am willing to take the chance.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to have the concurrence of the Senator from California as against the statement of the Senator from Nebraska with reference to Canada's objection to this reservation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose we should adopt the substitute offered by the Senator from California and then upon the vote on agreeing to the reservation as amended the substitute should be defeated, we would not have any reservation at all, would we?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is the parliamentary inquiry, and I am of the opinion that that is just what is going on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the opinion of the Chair there would be no reservation under those circumstances.

Mr. BORAH. Now, can the Senator from California assure me that if we vote for the substitute he has enough votes on the other side of the Chamber to keep it in? I am uneasy for fear that the Senator from California may succeed in getting the substitute adopted, and then, according to the vote which was cast a few minutes ago, the substitute would be defeated and we should have no reservation at all. It would be a very bad situation. I do not think the Senator from California wants that and I know that I do not.

Mr. PHELAN. In the event the substitute is defeated there will be no reservation on the subject?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. Is that the parliamentary situation?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is the question.

Mr. PHELAN. In that event, I should support the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. If the substitute is adopted in place of the Lenroot reservation, and then the substitute is defeated, we should not have any reservation at all.

Mr. PHELAN. Well; what does the Senator want from me?

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that he can secure the retention of the substitute in case we adopt it in place of the Lenroot reservation?

Mr. PHELAN. In view of the fact that it has so much merit on its side and that the Senate has already voted 43 to 46, I think, under the pressure of the arguments made this morning and now, that there would be a turnover of at least two or three Senators, which might possibly result in its adoption.

Mr. BORAH. When the Senator speaks about the "pressure of argument" in this Chamber I know that he is humorous.

Mr. President, since the President's letter of yesterday there is not, in some quarters at least, any difference between a "reservationist" and an "irreconcilable"; they are both in the same category; but there is still a vast difference I notice in the voting. If those who are known as "bitter-enders" should put on the Johnson amendment and those who are known as reservationists on the other side of the Chamber should take it off when it comes to the final vote upon it, we would not have any reservation at all.

I do not think that it can be adopted. If the Senator feels that he has any assurance that it will be adopted, I am perfectly willing to vote for it, but I do not want to adopt a substitute now and subsequenly have the substitute killed, and thus have no reservation at all. I think the reservation as perfected now will force the Johnson amendment in the end, for the reason that Canada, Australia, and New Zealand are not going to give up their places in the league; they have announced that they will not give them up, and, indeed, Great Britain has said through her public men that they will not be asked to give up their position; that it is intolerable to think of so doing. The only alternative, therefore, is that Great Britain arrange that the United States have the same number of votes that she has in the league and retain the votes for her dominions, colonies, and so forth. My opinion is that the reservation as drawn will ultimately force an equality of voting between Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, will the Senator persuade his colleagues to vote for the substitute, as it seems to be inevitable?

Mr. BORAH. It seems to be inevitable in case we have the club, but, if we adopt the substitute and then it is killed in this Chamber when we come finally to vote upon it, we have not anything with which to force a recognition of our equality of rights. That is the situation, as I see it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from California to reservation No. 14 as amended.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I am informed that my pair, who is absent, is of the same mind as myself with regard to this amendment. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. My colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent on official business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 73, as follows:

YEAS—4.

Ashurst	France	Norris	Phelan

NAYS—73.

Ball	Glass	McCormick	Simmons

So Mr. PHELAN'S amendment in the nature of a substitute for reservation No. 14 as amended was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon reservation No. 14 as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer a substitute for the reservation as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for proposed reservation No. 14, the following is offered:

That in case of a dispute between members of the league, if one of them have self-governing colonies, dominions, or parts which have representation in the assembly, each and all are to be considered parties to the dispute, and the same shall be the rule if one of the parties to the dispute is a self-governing colony, dominion, or part, in which case all other self-governing colonies, dominions, or parts, as well as the nation as a whole, shall be considered parties to the dispute, and each and all shall be disqualified from having their votes counted in case of any inquiry on said dispute made by the assembly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, by way of explanation, I desire to say that that is the same substitute reservation that I offered last November.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he thinks the substitute he has offered in any way affects the sense of the text of the treaty itself?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, in my opinion it is an interpretation of the treaty, and is legitimate as such.

Mr. REED. That is not quite an answer, if I can get one. Does the Senator think that the treaty will mean without the reservation just what it means with the reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am very certain what it means with the reservation, and that is as far as I care to go.

Mr. REED. Would the Senator say he is equally certain what the treaty would mean without the reservation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is what I think it means; and, if we adopt it, this is what we think it means.

Mr. REED. But if it is not adopted, the Senator thinks the treaty is obscure and doubtful?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I did not say that. I say that this reservation represents what I think the treaty means, and if the Senate of the United States adopts it, it is what the Senate of the United States thinks it means, and if the other nations accept our interpretation that settles it.

Mr. REED. But either one of two or three things must be true. Either the treaty is so obscure that it needs this interpretation in order to make its meaning plain and safe, and if that is true, of course it is a very badly drawn instrument, or if it is not obscure then this interpretation is unnecessary unless the interpretation in fact changes the meaning. The Senator from Nebraska who has drawn the reservation seems to be unable to tell us which of these three propositions is correct. I think it is fair to say that the Senator from Nebraska knows in his heart but does not just like to admit that this treaty is clearly susceptible of the construction that in a controversy between Great Britain and the United States while the British Empire's single vote might stand aside five other votes of the Empire could be cast and hence he offers a reservation which he calls an interpretative reservation.

A good deal has been said about interpretative reservations. A reservation which interprets a thing to mean exactly what it does mean without the interpretation is about the most useless thing on earth. A reservation which interprets a thing to mean something different from what its language imports is in fact an amendment. Now we either ought to have something offered here that amounts to something or else we ought not to have anything offered. The idea of a man standing in the Senate and saying: "This document is plain; our rights are secure; it is all right; nevertheless I propose to interpret it in a certain way, and that is the very way it will be interpreted anyway," is a little bit strange.

We have heard a great deal about interpretative reservations. I say now that any man who will draw a document that needs interpretation had better hire a country lawyer somewhere to draw it for him. A great international document presented here to govern and rule the world, that is supposed to be written for all time, that is to change the course of history, that is to save mankind from destruction, that is to prevent the world being saturated with blood and its fields from being made white with the bones of countless slain, is presented in language so obscure that before we adopt it we must first sit down and interpret it. That is an absurdity.

The plain truth is, and everybody knows it if he will be candid, that this document is clearly susceptible of the construction that even in a controversy between the British Empire and another country the colonies can vote. That is the truth about it, and everybody knows it except the people who have heard certain distinguished gentlemen upon the stump and elsewhere proclaim that the instrument denies any such right. All that I want is to have the American people understand this document. They can not be expected to hire lawyers to construe it and study it and read it and dig out its meaning. They ought to be able to get that meaning from plain statements of fact by their representatives in the Senate. I did hope that the Senator from Nebraska would be candid enough to say that in his opinion the language of the document is dangerous, and that it is necessary to guard against that danger by a plain statement of fact, made at this time, preserving the rights of the United States.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, may I point out that the Senator from Nebraska in his usual manner presents to-day at 3.45 an entirely different standpoint from that which he occupied at the same hour yesterday, when, in the course of the colloquy on the floor, he stated:

Canada is an independent and self-governing country.

And to-day he offers a reservation which deals with Canada as a dependency.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Nebraska what he means by this language:

In which case all other self-governing colonies, dominions, or parts, as well as the nation as a whole, shall be considered parties to the dispute.

Mr. McCORMICK. Which nation as a whole—Canada?

Mr. LENROOT. I want to find out. What does the Senator mean by the expression "as well as the nation as a whole"? [After a pause.] The Senator does not answer. Of course, it is apparent to anyone that the Senator's own reservation, when he speaks of equality with Canada, treats Canada as a part of another nation. By his reservation he would give Canada a share in the vote of the British Empire; and then he insists, in addition, that Canada shall have a vote by herself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything, but there seems to be some curiosity to hear from me on the part of certain Senators.

Undoubtedly any fair interpretation by a friend of the League of Nations would be to the effect that any nation or any part of any nation, or any member having a vote in the assembly, should not sit in judgment where it had an interest. It is perfectly competent, under the circumstances, for the United States to place an interpretation upon this document to the effect that the British Empire and its self-governing colonies should all be debarred from casting a vote in any case in which the United States has a dispute, either with the Empire itself or with any of its self-governing colonies. This my proposed reservation accomplishes. This is not to say that those self-governing colonies would necessarily vote against the United States. Many times a judge is barred from the bench, not because it is known how he would vote, but because it is not considered proper for him even to sit in judgment in such a case.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] seems to be a little curious about Canada again. I want to repeat some things that I said about the Senator from New Hampshire yesterday. I stated here that the Senator from New Hampshire, representing a State which is composed very largely of good citizens who came from Canada, the French-Canadians and Anglo-Saxons, has taken a position in the Senate seeking to deny to Canada her right to represent herself in the assembly of the League of Nations. He has taken a position that those millions of people there, who had a large part in this war, who suffered enormously in the great struggle, shall be compelled to be represented by the Government of the British Empire in the assembly, and shall not be permitted to represent themselves.

He knows, if he has read current history correctly, that Canada, New Zealand, Australia, and South Africa, self-governing dominions and colonies of the British Empire, have been steadily progressing in the direction of complete self-government and independence. He knows that the aspirations of those people for self-government took the form in Paris of a demand for recognition made by Canada, made by Australia, made by New Zealand, made by the South African Union. He knows that Great Britain was compelled to accord recognition to those colonies in the assembly of the League of Nations. He knows that that is a step in the direction of independence on the part of Canada and the others, and he knows that after it has been consented to in this great international document, he, as the Senator from New Hampshire, has entered into a combination to deny it to Canada by a reservation of the United States Senate. He is a party to it. If he can look his own French-Canadian constituents in the face when he goes home and admit to them that he has voted to disbar their relatives and their friends across the Canadian line, voted to deny to them the independence which they seek, voted to compel them to remain under British diplomatic control and keep silent when the nations of the world gather in their assembly—if he can do that and survive among his own constituents, he is a more fortunate Senator than I think he is.

Why should not Canada be independent? Why should not Canada be represented in the assembly of the League of Nations—Canada with her millions of people and her enormous sacrifices in this war? The Senator has not objected to the representation of Bolivia, or Colombia, or Salvador, or Paraguay, or Honduras, or Haiti, or Guatemala, or Ecuador, or Cuba, or China, yet he objects to Canada and wants to compel Canada to remain under the diplomatic control and representation of the British Empire. Why should an American, viewing the efforts that these dominions and self-governing colonies of Great Britain are making toward independence, a citizen of a country which got its independence from Great Britain, put anything in their way? Mr. President, I want to see Canada get that representation. Canada is our neighbor; Canada is our friend; Canada has the same aspirations that we have and the same purposes of self-government that we have.

Mr. President, what would the Senator's attitude be in case Great Britain is compelled to accord to Ireland self-government? Would he want to keep Ireland out of the assembly of the League of Nations? Is there any reason why Ireland, if Ireland succeeds in her ambition to get self-government to the extent that Canada has it, should not be accorded representation? Ireland has more population than our 13 colonies had when they fought and won their independence from Great Britain. I suppose the Senator from New Hampshire would want to deny that boon to Ireland under those circumstances.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MOSES. It was not I, Mr. President, who barred the Irish delegates from the conference at Versailles. It was the President of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely mistaken in that statement, absolutely mistaken. The President attempted to get a hearing for them. But the Senator, if he were consistent, knowing that Ireland aspires to independence, would be compelled to stand here and say that he would favor a reservation to the effect that the United States would not submit to any decision of the assembly if Ireland cast a vote, just as he now stands here and declares that the United States should not submit if Canada cast a vote.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. MOSES. Let us approach the question from another angle.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator can approach it after I get through.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not yielding for any approaching. The Senator can do his own approaching afterwards.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not just now. I prefer to let the Senator do his own approaching in his own way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield further.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything. I presented here something which makes it clear and certain that if the United States has a dispute with the British Empire, or with any self-governing colony of the British Empire, not only the British Empire but every one of the self-governing colonies would be considered a party in interest, and will be debarred from voting. I would like to know what more the United States has a right to demand than that. If their six votes are debarred, and our vote is debarred, that certainly is complete protection. But the Senators here are attempting to go further than that. They are attempting to disfranchise Canada and the other self-governing colonies and dominions, even in cases in which we are not an interested party, simply because they want to disrupt the league, and want to nullify while they are pretending to ratify the treaty.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if I may say so without breach of parliamentary ethics, there is an old Spanish proverb about the waste of lather, and were it not for the volume of words which has been poured out here uselessly this afternoon I would not detain the Senate a moment from the vote which it desires to take.

The Senator from Nebraska for the fortieth time has accused Senators upon this side of seeking to deprive the self-governing dominions of the British Empire of a vote.

For the second time for myself, Mr. President, I deny that, and I call to the Senator's attention a further quotation from the colloquy which he and I had yesterday afternoon, in the course of which I said:

> I have no opposition and no objection to Canada or any other part of the British Empire having 1 or 6 or 20 votes in the assembly of the League of Nations.

That, Mr. President, is my position to-day. But I am unwilling, as an American citizen, to have my country enter any assembly, any organization, any international body with a less voting power than that accorded to any other organized power which there has membership.

With reference to the touching solicitude which the Senator from Nebraska has expressed for those citizens of my State who are of French extraction, I will say to him that I will make my own statement to them in due course of time, and I think it will be satisfactory to them. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that in no vote which I have ever cast in this body have I ever considered any segment of my constituency or any segment of the citizenry of the United States, and I hope, Mr. President, that every Senator on this floor can say that he has voted and spoken and acted in this body in the same manner, because we have seen incidents here when votes and actions and utterances were had solely to placate large segments of a constituency which sprang from a foreign origin.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair I shall have to withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Harrison	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Phelan	Stanley
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	King	Ransdell	Wolcott
Gerry	Kirby	Sheppard
Glass	McKellar	Simmons

NAYS—41.

Brandegee	Gore	McLean	Shields

Borah	Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Underwood
Calder	La Follette	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Fall	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Harding	Newberry	Swanson	Williams

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's substitute for reservation No. 14 was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to reservation No. 14 as amended.

Mr. LODGE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called.) I again announce the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] on account of illness. If present, on this question he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I was requested to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] on official business. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If present, on this question my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is in attendance at a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations, and is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—57.

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	McNary	Sherman
Ball	Gore	Moses	Shields
Borah	Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ga.

Gerry	Jones, N. Mex.	Simmons	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—18.

Calder	La Follette	Ransdell	Underwood
Fall	McCumber	Robinson	Warren
Harding	Newberry	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Harris	Overman	Swanson
Johnson, Calif.	Penrose	Thomas

So reservation No. 14 as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Until part 1, being the covenant of the League of Nations, shall be so amended as to provide that the United States shall be entitled to cast a number of votes equal to that which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate shall be entitled to cast, the United States assumes no obligation to be bound, except in cases where Congress has previously given its consent, by any election, decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly in which any member of the league and its self-governing dominions, colonies, or parts of empire, in the aggregate have cast more than one vote.

The United States assumes no obligation to be bound by any decision, report, or finding of the council or assembly arising out of any dispute between the United States and any member of the league if such member, or any self-governing dominion, colony, empire, or part of empire united with it politically has voted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a draft of a reservation to article 10, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. GORE's proposed reservation is as follows:

The United States assumes no obligation under the treaty to declare or to wage war and assumes no obligation under article 10 to become a party to any economic boycott or armed conflict to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any foreign power, nor to furnish any armed force, money, credit, or other material resource in any such controversy between foreign powers except with the consent of the people expressed in each particular case by a declaration of war or other act or resolution on the part of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order of the Senate, the question now is upon agreeing to reservation No. 2.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, reservation No. 2 is the reservation connected with article 10. I shall not undertake to go on with it this afternoon, as it is getting late. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After 15 minutes the doors were reopened.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 9, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, in response to an urgent appeal from our inner self we seek Thee, the rock of our faith, the inspiration of every laudable ambition, that we may bend our energies to relieve the situation in which we find ourselves, in the aftermath of the World War—the high cost of living, prohibitory in its demands on the poor and middle classes.

Give us relief, we beseech Thee, that we may live and provide for those dependent upon us. In the name of Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL BONUS TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from a man who entered the Army as a private and came out a major, giving reasons why the additional bonus to soldiers and sailors should not be granted at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Louisiana intend to send the letter to the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. ASWELL. I do.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the letter referred to:

LEESVILLE, LA., March 6, 1920.

Hon. JAMES B. ASWELL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DR. ASWELL: I have been reading for several days the press dispatches with reference to the demands being made upon Congress by the different soldiers' organizations for the enacting of legislation looking to the granting of additional bonuses to soldiers and sailors, and while I know you are a very busy man, with little time to listen to me, I want to enter my protest against any such legislation.

I enlisted in the Army in April, 1917, shortly after the declaration of war, and served until after its close, part of the time in France. When I enlisted as a private soldier the pay was $15 per month. Shortly thereafter it was raised to $30 per month, or 100 per cent increase for the private. I served as a major of Infantry and as a major in the Judge Advocate General's Department. I tried to give value received for every cent the Government paid me, and do not now consider that the Government is indebted to me nor that I am indebted to it. It fulfilled its contract with me to the letter and did a little more.

At the time the first bonus was granted—the $60 bonus—there might have been some excuse for that. It might have been argued that men were experiencing difficulty in reentering civil life and civil occupations and needed a little money to tide them over until such time as they could relocate themselves, but now there is no soldier who wants work who can not find it and at good pay. Where, therefore, is the reason for voting this additional bonus that will mean but very little to the individual soldier, but that will mean so much to the Nation, that is now sorely in need of every cent? Taxes are so high that they are, indeed, burdensome. Business is being injured by this excessive burden. Dissatisfaction is rampant all over the Nation and in all classes of people. As I understand it, to grant the bonus another bond issue will have to be floated and taxes again increased. To give to the soldier this additional "money expression" of the good will and appreciation of the Nation only makes him feel that he is an object of charity. It argues that these red-blooded men that put the fear of God into the Huns at Cantigny, Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, and the Argonne are unable to compete with the civilian in making their own living, and this I do not believe to be the fact. My observation of those men makes me believe absolutely that they want no charity; that they are ready to look the world squarely and fairly in the face, and say, "We did only our duty as we saw it, and for you to attempt to pay us in money is but cheapening your appreciation of our work." We fully appreciate the Nation's good will and its expressions of appreciation of a work I believe to have been well done, and I want to always feel that the Nation will continue to appreciate and honor the soldier, but I do not want the country to have the feeling that the American soldier went to Europe, and many of them made the supreme sacrifice, simply for mercenary motives. I do not want the American soldiers of our future wars to feel that they are offering their lives on the chance that Congress will, after it is all over, offer to pay in money for their services. The American soldier is receiving, and will continue to receive, compensation that money can not buy, but if the country attempts to place a money value on that compensation it will be cheapened, and future generations will have no respect for the motives that prompted the American to offer his all on the altar of civilization in the late war.

If the act should be passed, practically every soldier, the writer included, will ask for the bonus, reasoning that there is no reason for his not taking it when all the others are getting it, and that $100, or whatever the amount may be, will not count for anything in the vast total.

If there are those who were wounded or whose health was broken in the service and are not now being properly cared for, I am strongly and wholly in favor of the Government taking every care of them; but so long as a man is able to work and earn his own living I am absolutely and entirely against his being made to feel that he is an object of governmental charity.

I have thought that the plan of the American Legion is good, and that it will have a wholesome effect in America, but if it is the father of this move, and if such things as this are to be its objects, I must say that not only do I believe it will not survive as an organization, but that it will be a liability to the ex-soldier instead of the benefit it could be.

It is not believed that the great mass of ex-soldiers want any more bonus. It is believed that they rather look at the proposition as a bid by the politician for the soldier vote. Could anything be more humiliating to the red-blooded American soldier than to believe that upon his threat to vote against any person who voted against his demand for this bonus that he was paid cash; in other words, that he had been paid for his political influence in cash?

I feel very strongly about this matter, and am wholly and unequivocally against it.

I do not believe that the patriotic men who compose the Congress are going to be bulldozed into saddling this additional burden upon the country. Even if Congress was so spineless as to believe that all ex-soldiers would vote against them for refusing to do this thing, I hope it will have the nerve of its convictions and refuse to do the thing that would seem to me to be a crime against the whole Nation, including the ex-soldier himself.

I have spoken with absolute frankness as to how I feel on the proposition. I believe I am in better position to do this than is the man who is not an ex-soldier, for in his case he might rather undertake the additional burden than have the soldier say that he does not appreciate the soldier. I am an ex-soldier and can never be accused of not having the interest of the ex-soldier at heart; therefore I feel at liberty to frankly express myself on the subject.

Please pardon this lengthy, and probably uninteresting to you, letter. I have no other way of communicating to you my sentiments. I believe you always want to vote the will of your constituents, and you can not do this unless they let you know what that will is. With this idea in view, I have expressed my opinion for whatever it is worth, and now urge you, in voting on these measures, to be guided by what you know to be for the best interests of the whole Nation.

Sincerely, your friend,

W. W. THOMPSON.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 11756. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River between Springfield and West Springfield, in Hampden County, Mass.; and

H. R. 12160. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point a little east of north of Nocona, in Montague County, Tex.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of no quorum. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 261 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, may I be informed as to the state of the time for general debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has 2 hours and 45 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Alabama has 3 hours and 10 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to use some time myself. I would like to be notified at the end of 40 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have never believed that in preparing a bill relating strictly to military legislation either the House or the committee should divide upon partisan lines. I started with the committee in the preparation of a bill with the idea in view of endeavoring to bring in one that we could unanimously support. I regret that the bill was finally so framed that I can not give it my support. I shall briefly undertake to give the reasons why I can not support the bill in its present form.

My first and fundamental objection to the bill is, as reported by the committee, that it departs from the principle that has heretofore been adopted in all Army legislation, whether the Congress was controlled by the Democratic Party or the Republican Party, by which Congress surrenders the right that it has always retained heretofore of fixing the size of the Army and the units of its organization. This principle is surrendered in this bill, and if the very first section of the bill is adopted, then the Congress of the United States leaves it to the General Staff to say how many regiments of Infantry you shall have, how many regiments of Cavalry, and how many regiments of Field Artillery. Congress heretofore has always fixed the number of regiments in the different branches of the service. Under this bill the General Staff may organize 65 regiments of Infantry—the present Infantry strength of the Army. Under this bill the General Staff may organize 29 regiments of Infantry, and under this bill the General Staff may organize 150 regiments of Infantry. I submit that whenever Congress delegates that function and that power to the General Staff and gives up its control over the organization of the Army it means that you might as well have adopted the bill that the General Staff presented to Congress last summer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Last summer the General Staff submitted to Congress a bill the effect of which was to fix the total enlisted strength and the commissioned personnel of the Army, leaving to the General Staff the organization of that total strength into any units of organization which they saw fit; and that was followed with a provision in the bill which gave the War Department a lump-sum appropriation for the support of the Army. Whenever you give the General Staff the power to organize the Army into units of organization as it sees fit, it inevitably follows that you must give to the War Department lump-sum appropriations. The one follows the other just as naturally as night follows day. You can not escape it. That bill presented to the Senate and House Military Committees was repudiated practically unanimously by both those committees. They proceeded then to write a different bill, with the result, in my humble judgment, that this bill, as reported by the House committee, is simply a camouflage of the bill that was presented by the General Staff last summer. What is the difference in effect? I am going to the fundamental objection, the first section of the bill. Under the General Staff bill, which was repudiated by the Military Committee of the House and the Military Committee of the Senate, it was provided that there should be an Army of 580,000 men and some 28,000 officers, and that these men and officers should be organized as the General Staff thought fit. This bill was followed with a lump-sum appropriation. Let us see what is the fundamental difference between that bill of the General Staff last summer and this bill now reported from the Military Committee of the House. There is no lump-sum appropriation in it, of course, because there is no appropriation in this bill. That is to follow later. But the only fundamental difference between the bill presented by the General Staff last summer and the bill as reported by this committee is this: Instead of fixing the total strength of the entire Army and the total number of officers in the entire Army, it fixes the number of officers in the Infantry and the total number of enlisted men in the Infantry, the total number of officers and men in the Cavalry, the total number of officers and men in the Field Artillery, and allows the General Staff to organize the Infantry, the Cavalry, the Field Artillery within those limitations. I say that that is a distinction without a difference. You might as well give to the General Staff the number of men they want and the number of officers they want by totals and let them organize the Army, as well as to say that you are going to give them the total number that shall be in the Infantry, the total number that shall be in the Cavalry, and in the Field Artillery, and then let them organize the Army. It is a distinction without a difference. That is the fundamental objection I have to this bill.

My next objection to this bill is that it creates too many officers. This bill practically provides for a little less than 18,000 officers. It increases the strength of the line of the Army from 175,000 to 250,000, an increase from the enlisted strength of the line of the Army of 75,000 men, which is an increase of something like 40 per cent over the present permanent law. It increases the number of officers provided for under the national-defense act from 11,445 to 17,820, an increase of something like 60 per cent in the officers of the Army. It may be that there should be some slight increase in the commissioned strength of the Army, due to certain corps and certain organizations which were the development of the recent war. But an increase of something like 6,000 officers in the Army of the United States and an authorized increase of only 75,000 in the line is entirely out of all proportion. Under the national-defense act, according to tables promulgated by the General Staff, and which I shall put into the RECORD, you can organize an army of practically 240,000 officers and men. I herewith insert the following table (Exhibit A):

EXHIBIT A.

Mr. DENT. Under this bill you can organize an army of 299,000 officers and men, a difference that in peace times is so infinitesimal as to amount to nothing. As a matter of fact, the chances are—and we might as well acknowledge it—that you will never in ordinary peace times raise an army in this country by volunteer enlistment larger than 240,000, the strength that is authorized under the national-defense act; so that I have reached the conclusion, in view of the fact that this bill has departed from every principle of legislation that has heretofore been adopted by the Congress in the organization of the Army, that the best thing to do at this particular time is to stand upon the national-defense act of June 3, 1916. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Another objection, and a fundamental objection, I have to this bill is that it names the number of colonels, the number of lieutenant colonels, the number of majors, and on down to second lieutenants. There are 599 colonels, I believe, named in this bill. It does not provide where they shall be assigned to duty. Under the principle of this bill—and no advocate of it can deny this statement—the War Department can overload one branch of the service with colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors and deprive some other branch of the service that is not popular with the General Staff of these field officers and give that branch simply subordinate rank. That proposition, I unhesitatingly state, can not be denied by any advocate of this bill. Within the limitation of the numbers fixed by the bill, under this bill the War Department can organize the Army into Field Artillery and absolutely kill the Infantry, and everybody knows, who is familiar with Army legislation and Army appropriation bills, that it costs very much more to equip a regiment of Artillery than it does a regiment of Infantry. Under this bill, I repeat, one branch of the service can be loaded down with colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors and the others deprived of these high ranks, and the service itself put into disrepute.

I prefer, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to follow the lines of the national-defense act, which simply repealed the act of February 2, 1901, in providing the form of legislation for an Army and fixing the strength of each organization and of each unit of the organization, the number of officers from the highest grade to the lowest in each organization, so that Congress will know what it is doing and Congress will know what sort of an Army it is providing for instead of having an Army that may be one thing to-day and another thing to-morrow under the regulations of the General Staff. Another objection that I shall urge to this bill—and at the proper time I propose to offer amendments to meet those views—is that the General Staff in Washington is too large and the powers of the General Staff should be curbed and restored to the duties of its original creation. The original General Staff was provided for the purpose of studying plans of the Army, studying ideas as to how the Army should be organized and equipped. But the General Staff has gone beyond its function and has reached out into the various bureaus and different departments of the Army and taken charge of the administrative functions of the Army which heretofore have been operated by the different bureaus charged specifically with that purpose. I do not see any necessity, Mr. Chairman, I can not find any reason why there should be 93 General Staff officers here in Washington whose sole duty should be simply to plan for the Army, simply to study its details and submit those plans to the Secretary of War to be enforced by the proper bureaus and the proper branches of the service. I shall therefore offer an amendment to reduce the General Staff down to at least 40, which with 5 different subject matters that the General Staff has to study will give them 10 members on each committee. The smaller the number that there are on a committee whose sole duty it is to study and devise plans, every Member of this House knows, the more effective is the work.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask my colleague, Is it not a fact that perhaps the weakest spot in our whole Military Establishment when we got into war was our General Staff, and that was due to the limited number we had of that staff, or rather the size of the staff and the manner in which we had prior to the war selected the officers of which the staff should be composed, and did not we learn a lesson from that that we need a stronger General Staff?

Mr. DENT. I am sorry to state that I can not agree with my colleague on the committee. As a matter of fact, under the law that was in existence at the time we declared war the General Staff was limited to 57 members, and there was a provision in the law that not exceeding one-half of them should be residents of the District of Columbia, and as a further fact, as disclosed by the testimony of Gen. March before the Military Committee of the House, there never was at any time even under that law more than 19 members of the General Staff here in Washington, so that the General Staff never had the total number that was authorized under the national-defense act at any time. My colleague from Illinois will remember that testimony of Gen. March. Now, it may be that the General Staff under that authority did not function, did not perform their duties, but it was not the fault of the law, because they did not take advantage of the law and never had the number the law itself authorized at any time.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is not the same fact true in reference to the whole Army that while the law of 1916 authorized an Army of 175,000 men, they never had them?

Mr. DENT. That is very true; but I will say to the gentleman from Texas that the authorization of 175,000 men under the national-defense act had to come in five annual increments.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. And those five increments were not called until we practically got into the war?

Mr. DENT. That is very true; and it is also true, I will answer further, carrying out the suggestion propounded by the gentleman from Texas, that never at any time prior to the war did the Army ever have the strength that Congress appropriated for and authorized, not at any time under any Congress or any administration.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Can the gentleman state just what the strength was when we entered the war?

Mr. DENT. My recollection of the figures—I have been dealing in figures so much I can not be exactly accurate, but my recollection of the figures is that we had practically 127,000 officers and men when we declared war in April, 1917.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. After all, is it not true that the only permanent end of the so-called Regular Establishment is the officer personnel? Under the statutes themselves that really constitutes the only permanent class, affording a nucleus around which from time to time are gathered the various and varying numbers of enlisted men who go in and out of the Army, and only in occasional instances stay long enough to gain retirement.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman certainly has stated it accurately, because the enlisted man only enlists for a certain period, whereas the officer goes in as a lifetime job.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. When you take the Regular Army, the permanent establishment merely means, after all, the basic law upon which is superimposed the commissioned personnel having a lifetime service.

Mr. DENT. That is true, but that is no argument in favor of having an excessive commissioned personnel. There is no reason on earth for having 18,000 officers when 11,000 officers can handle the number of men we are going to have, and nobody on earth can defend his position in Congress by voting for a bill that will give an excessive number of officers. [Applause.] Now, for instance, under this bill there are, as I recall it, 596 or 599 colonels in the Army. You can not figure out to save your life where you can utilize in the line of the Army more than 150 colonels. You can not figure out to save your life by the most liberal calculation where you can utilize more than 150 colonels in the Staff Corps.

That is 300 colonels, and yet you have 300 extra colonels going around doing nothing. And I challenge any advocate of this bill to tell me what he is going to do with the 300 extra colonels that are provided for in this bill. The average cost of an officer of the Army is $3,600 a year. Why do you want to provide for 300 extra colonels at an average cost to the Government per officer of $3,600 a year, when you have got nothing for them to do? Now, the whole trouble with this bill is—and I am going to tell you the whole trouble—is that it is a camouflage. You can not get around it. It is a camouflage of the General Staff bill that both committees of Congress repudiated months ago.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Concerning the gentleman's reference to a lump-sum appropriation, I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Alabama if he knows anything concerning the item of about $10,000,000 additional pay roll that the Chief of Staff has had more than the committee had an idea of in making appropriations?

Mr. DENT. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman heard anything of it?

Mr. DENT. I have not heard anything about it.

Mr. BLANTON. In other words, the General Staff has had a pay roll of actually about $10,000,000 more than the appropriations seemingly would indicate.

Mr. DENT. I am not familiar with that.

Now, I repeat that exactly the same situation applies to the other high officers that I have mentioned relative to the colonels in the Army. Let me repeat, and then I will pass on to one other subject, when I will finish.

I am opposed to the bill because in the composition of the Army it departs from every principle of legislation that has heretofore been adopted by Congress and makes Congress surrender to the War Department the right to organize the Army, whereas heretofore Congress has always exercised that power itself. I am opposed to it because it has an excessive number of officers, largely more than is necessary for the enlisted men provided for. I am opposed to it because it fixes the total number of officers without assigning them to each branch of the service. These reasons are, in my judgment, sufficient to defeat this bill and refer it back to the committee to be rewritten.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. Before the gentleman leaves the subject of officers, I want to just ask him a question. The gentleman has long been a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and he knows much of the problems confronting that committee. One of them, of course, is the preparedness of our country for war. Now, there has been a good deal of contention as to why we were not prepared for war. Some men asserted it was all due to the fact that we did not have the system of compulsory universal military training and have the boys trained. Others say it was because we lacked trained officers. And I am one member of the committee who felt in the preparation of this bill that we could get men for the Army and train them much more easily than we could officers, and the only justification for officers in this bill is for the preparedness of our country in case of emergency, rather than the fact that we will need every one of these officers every day in peace times. Is that correct?

Mr. DENT. I agree with the general principle that we need a sufficient number of officers for training purposes, but the gentleman certainly will not contend that we want to increase the strength of the Army by 60 per cent of officers for that purpose. Under this bill the detached officers' list, I believe, is about 2,000. Under the present law it is about 1,000. You double it. I am not raising any specific objection to a sufficient number of officers to go with the National Guard and with the different schools and colleges of this country that have adopted the Reserve Officers' Training Corps system, and I am willing to give you a sufficient number of officers for that. I am willing to amend the bill to meet that particular purpose, but I do not propose to have 600 colonels hanging around here when we need only 300.

Mr. KAHN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman give me the time to show him exactly where these 599 colonels are needed, or would the gentleman prefer I should do it in my time? I have here a list showing exactly where the entire 599 officers are needed.

Mr. DENT. I would be very glad if the chairman of the committee, my colleague, would give that in his own time. I think perhaps that is in the report he submitted to the House. That is what the War Department says it is going to do, but there is no legislation to compel them to do it. That is all there is in that. That is what the War Department says to-day they are willing to do, but there is no legislation to say where they are going to be placed, and that is exactly what I am objecting to.

Mr. BEE. Has the gentleman time to answer a question?

Mr. DENT. I hope so.

Mr. BEE. I am very much interested in the gentleman's exposition of this matter from his great knowledge and experience in it, and, of course, we Members who are not on the Military Affairs Committee must gather our knowledge from you gentlemen. I am struck with the statement about the organization. I notice on page 24 of the bill it says:

> The Infantry shall consist of one Chief of Infantry, with the rank of major general; 4,200 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 110,000 enlisted men, organized in the Infantry units.

What I want to ask the gentleman now is what the effect of that provision will be about fixing the number of Infantry officers as stated in the bill and fixing the enlisted personnel of the Infantry at 110,000 men? Would that be subject to change by the Chief of Staff in the face of the positive provision of the law which says that there shall be 110,000 infantrymen and so many cavalrymen and so many of field artillery?

Mr. DENT. Of course the organizations could not exceed the total number fixed by the law. The gentleman is well aware of that, and I so stated. The organizations can not exceed the total number of officers and the total number of enlisted men, but within that total the War Department can organize any number of regiments it sees fit.

Mr. BEE. Then I understand the gentleman's position is that under this provision on page 24 they would not be required to have 110,000 infantrymen, but might reduce them to 50,000 instead of having 110,000?

Mr. DENT. Why, certainly.

Mr. BEE. That is what I wanted to understand.

Mr. DENT. And they could not go beyond that number, but could use any number within that limitation.

Mr. KAHN. There is the limit of 10 per cent.

Mr. DENT. I think the gentleman from California is mistaken about that 10 per cent proposition. I think I am familiar with that. As the bill was originally presented to the committee it provided that the War Department at any time—in 24 hours, every other day if it saw fit—could assign 20 per cent of one branch of the service to another branch of the service.

To-day they might assign 20 per cent of the Infantry to the Field Artillery. To-morrow they might assign 20 per cent to the Cavalry. I fought that bill as originally presented in the committee, and the committee finally adopted a suggestion of mine to limit it to 10 per cent and to stop the War Department when they made that change, so that they could not make it every 24 hours, as the bill would permit, as originally framed down in the General Staff.

Mr. KAHN. On page 8 of the bill, if the gentleman will allow me, it says that the President may increase or diminish the number of officers or enlisted men assigned to any branch by not more than the total of 10 per cent.

Mr. DENT. Yes; I noticed that.

Mr. KAHN. So that he could not reduce the Infantry from 110,000 to 50,000, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE]. The question was replied to by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from California, I think, misunderstood my position. I intended to state, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, that in organizing the Army the War Department could organize the Infantry by 50,000 as an original organization. The War Department could organize the Infantry according to any number within the total limitation fixed by this act, and if they wanted only 50,000 in the Infantry they could organize it accordingly.

Mr. BEE. As to the closing paragraph of section 17 and all the other sections, which state that they may be organized into Cavalry and Infantry units, and so forth, as the President may direct, is that the item in the law which gives the authority to reduce at will the Infantry regiments or increase the Cavalry regiments?

Mr. DENT. I may be misunderstood if I answer the gentleman's question categorically. I repeat what I said a little while ago, that under this bill, the President, through the War Department, might organize the Infantry into 50,000 men as an original proposition. After the organization is made, then the bill provides that there may be a reassignment of the organization only by 10 per cent. In other words, the War Department will fix the number of Infantry under this bill. They need not necessarily fix it at 110,000; they might fix it at 100,000 or they might fix it at 50,000.

Mr. BEE. But in so doing they would not increase the allotted force, and therefore you could not have the same result in the year of having 50,000 Infantry and 20,000 Cavalry?

Mr. DENT. You can not have any more men, of course; neither could you, under the General Staff bill, have more than 579,000 men and officers. But under that bill the 579,000 men and officers were to be organized as the War Department saw fit, and then they would come to Congress and ask for a lump-sum appropriation to carry it into effect.

Now, I was about to forget something that I wished to call the committee's special attention to. The Senate bill practically provides for the same number of officers that the House bill does. There is a difference, to be accurate, of 348 officers. The Senate bill provides for exactly 348 more officers than the House bill does. Now, everybody knows that the Senate bill provides for compulsory military training, and everybody knows that if you have that you have to have more officers. Everybody knows that the committee struck that out of the House bill, and there is a difference of only 348 officers between the Senate bill and the House bill as reported by the committee. The Senate bill contained a provision for compulsory military training, and the House bill eliminated that provision.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that before the war there was a paucity of officers of the United States Army, and in fact graduations at West Point were expedited in order to furnish the different units with the necessary supply of officers, because in many instances a battalion was commanded by a lieutenant because they did not have the requisite number of officers?

Mr. DENT. Well, the word "paucity" may be construed in various ways. Of course, when we had an Army of only 127,000 officers and men when we declared war and decided to increase the Army by about 4,000,000 men, we had a paucity of officers. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEE. I do not think my friend from Alabama was exactly fair in his answer. I could leave out the word "paucity," which seems to have caused difficulty in his mind, and put the question in practically the same form. Is it not a fact that before the war they were calling for more rapid graduations from West Point, because on the border of Mexico, for instance, battalions were being commanded by lieutenants because they did not have a sufficient number of officers to command them? You can answer that question without reference to the word "paucity."

Mr. DENT. I never heard of calling for earlier graduations from West Point until after we had declared war. The proposition to graduate the third-year men or the second-year men only came on after we had declared war.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. DENISON. The gentleman from Alabama called attention just a moment ago to certain comparisons between the committee bill and the Senate bill, which contained provisions for compulsory military training, and called attention particularly to the fact that the same number of officers were provided for in each of the bills.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.
Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?
There was no objection.
Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think there is any intention on the part of the conferees or of anyone in the House to attempt to insert that provision back into the bill—the provision for compulsory military training?
Mr. DENT. I can not answer as to the intention of any Member of the House. I do not know. Probably some Member may offer that as an amendment to this bill. I see no reason why it should not be done if any Member so desires.
Mr. DENISON. Of course, the gentleman will be one of the conferees.
Mr. DENT. I do not know. Usually I am.
Mr. DENISON. If he is, I hope the gentleman will do what he can to prevent that.
Mr. DENT. I am very glad to know that the gentleman agrees with me against universal compulsory military training in any form.
Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it the purpose of my colleague from Alabama, before he is through, to make any reference to the bill in relation to the single lists for promotion?
Mr. DENT. Yes. I am going to refer to it briefly; but I fear I shall not have time.
Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.
Mr. SHERWOOD. How many officers were provided for in the Senate bill for this humbug idea of universal military training?
Mr. DENT. There were about 18,000 officers provided for in the Senate bill and about the same number in this bill. I just called attention to the fact that the Senate bill calls for only 348 more officers than this bill does, and yet it has compulsory training in it.
Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. ALMON. Have you an estimate of how many officers would be required if we had the universal military training?
Mr. DENT. I had some estimates made. There was some testimony before the committee to the effect that it would require at least 5,000 extra officers if we had universal compulsory military training. The ordinary Army officer who will make an estimate will tell you that it takes practically one officer for every 20 men. If you figure that on a basis of 750,000 young men in training, you will see that it would take about 37,000 extra officers for 750,000 young men in training.
Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.
Mr. TOWNER. As I understand it, the gentleman is very strongly opposed to compulsory universal military training?
Mr. DENT. I am.
Mr. TOWNER. I am in accord with the gentleman regarding that matter. Seriously, however, it occurs to me—and I would like to have the gentleman discuss it, if he will—that a system of training by sending officers to the colleges and even to the high schools, and by sending them to the military training camps, and to assist in the education of the National Guard, would require certainly quite a number of officers. Can the gentleman really inform us as to how he arrives at the conclusion that there is an excessive number of officers provided for in the bill, in consideration of that matter?
Mr. DENT. I can state to the gentleman, of course more or less in a general way, that during the present year and last year, as I recall, we had 100,000 young men in the different schools and colleges of this country who were under training under the provisions of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and under the law they were supplied with a sufficient number of officers. The gentleman will recall that under the law it does not necessarily take a commissioned officer to serve in the schools for training purposes. As a matter of fact, a sergeant is sometimes a very much better training officer than a lieutenant or a colonel, and under the law you may send noncommissioned officers as well as commissioned officers to these schools. So I do not think you will have any trouble in getting a sufficient number in view of that fact.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used five additional minutes.
Mr. DENT. I will take two additional minutes.
Mr. TOWNER. I just want to make this suggestion to the gentleman, that in view of the fact that apparently universal military training is not advisable, it would be really in the interest of the view which he takes that all the necessary officers be supplied for meeting the requirements of the other training.
Mr. DENT. I agree with the gentleman that we should have a sufficient number, but we have not had any deficiency, and I repeat that you can take care of that situation, because you can use noncommissioned officers for those purposes, and in many instances they are very much better to train the young men than a colonel would be.
Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. Yes.
Mr. KAHN. The gentleman states that we had sufficient officers to train the boys at the schools.
Mr. DENT. One hundred thousand boys.
Mr. KAHN. The law provided that there should be one instructor for every 500 men at the universities, and yet large universities, like that of Illinois and like that of California, could not get the number of officers that were required to train their cadet corps.
Mr. DENT. That was during the war.
Mr. KAHN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, it was before the war. Illinois University had 2,500 students in their cadet corps. They were entitled to five officers, but they never had them.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.
Mr. DENT. I will use one minute more, Mr. Chairman. I repeat what I said. I am willing to increase this bill so far as officers are concerned in order to meet the demands of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, but I am not willing to have 300 colonels walking around here with nothing to do. [Applause.]
Mr. KAHN. The gentleman admits that he was in error when he said that there were enough officers to meet the demand before the war.
Mr. DENT. No; I do not admit that I was in error, because this is the first information I have had that we did not have enough for the 100,000 young men who were provided for.
Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. DENT. I yield for a minute.
Mr. HULINGS. Does not this bill provide that no active officer shall be detailed for duty in these universities and training camps where a retired officer can take his place?
Mr. DENT. It does.
Mr. HULINGS. Does it not give the Chief of Staff the right to detail or to appoint all the reserve officers that he chooses without limit?
Mr. DENT. It certainly does.
Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have consumed more time than I intended, but there are two or three subjects in this bill that I have not touched upon. I propose to put in the RECORD the statement of my reasons for opposition to universal military training, and also to put in the RECORD a statement showing what the cost of the Army will be if you adopt any such provision. These figures have been prepared carefully for me by an officer of the Army who has been accustomed to making these estimates for many, many years, and I think that they are practically as nearly accurate as can be obtained. [Applause.]
Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD].
Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, that I was elected to this Congress at a special election upon a platform pledged against a large standing Army and universal compulsory military training is well known to many of the Members. [Applause.] That I am at the same time a strong advocate of adequate preparedness for the national defense is not generally known to the Members. However paradoxical that may sound to you, it is nevertheless true. At the time I was chosen a Member of this House at a special election four months ago it was proposed to have a standing Army of 576,000. This bill proposes to have a standing Army exclusive of officers and certain other special troops of 250,000. To my mind that should be still further reduced. Seventy-five thousand was adequate before the World War—the danger is no greater now. It has never been the policy of this country under this dual system to keep a larger standing Army than is necessary for immediate use. If in the opinion of Congress there is danger of wars, and that therefore it is necessary to provide for a greater force to properly safeguard the national defense, then we should provide for a greater and more efficient National Guard rather than create a huge standing Army in time of peace. When we are in full view of war this rule might be varied, as has always been done in this country.

The main objection I have to this bill is that it seeks to build up the standing Army and minimize the National Guard system, while I would build up the National Guard system and minimize the standing Army. With a strong National Guard there would be no necessity for a large standing Army, and likewise no necessity for enforced military training.

I hesitate to advance my judgment against that of the distinguished Military Affairs Committee, Gen. Wood, Secretary Baker, and others, and though I may be alone in my position in so far as this House is concerned, I have the framers of the Constitution and the general public on my side. I believe a platform pledge is something more than a scrap of paper. I therefore feel it my duty to my constituency, myself, and my country to call attention to what to my mind is a departure from our traditional policy against maintaining a large standing Army in times of peace.

The bill does not particularly do that. I am calling attention to the tendency of the times as evidenced by the fact that we have strong support for a larger standing Army. At the time I became a candidate and took the position opposing a large standing Army, the General Staff Army bill was being discussed providing for an Army of 576,000 soldiers. I say I am inveighing more against the tendency to create a large standing Army than against the bill itself.

A standing army of 150,000 would be adequate for the present. It would not be adequate if we were at war, neither would 250,000 be, for that matter. But this bill provides an efficient method of enlarging and training the National Guard, and when that is done, then, I repeat, there is no necessity of this large standing army.

> Congress shall have power: To raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

George Washington said in his farewell address, in speaking of the Union of the States and the increased power derived therefrom—

> Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty.

Alexander Hamilton, in discussing the matter of providing garrisons for the western forts, is quoted in the Federalist papers as saying:

> These garrisons must either be furnished by occasional detachments from the militia or by permanent corps in the pay of the Government. The first is impracticable; and if practicable, would be pernicious. The militia would not long, if at all, submit to be dragged from their occupations and families to perform that most disagreeable duty in times of profound peace. And if they could be prevailed upon or compelled to do it, the increased expenses of a frequent rotation of service, and the loss of labor and disconcertion of the industrious pursuits of individuals, would form conclusive objections to the scheme. It would be as burdensome and injurious to the public as ruinous to private citizens. The latter resource of permanent corps in the pay of the Government amounts to a standing army in time of peace; a small one, indeed, but not the less real for being small.

What a phillipic against the proposed system of universal compulsory training!

It will clearly appear from these quotations from the Constitution and the men who framed it that they intended to provide for a dual system of having an organized militia in each State and a standing army, the same as is provided for by this bill, and the one which it amends. But it is equally clear that they intended that the standing Army in times of peace should be a small one, only large enough for immediate needs and that reliance should be had upon the organized militia to fill the need in case of war, invasion, or insurrection.

It is also evident that they intended that this militia, whether organized as State guards or National Guards as proposed in this bill, should be trained by the respective States by officers appointed by the States, but "according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

These words become significant in the light of the words of George Washington quoted above. This plan was deliberately adopted to avoid the growth of the militaristic spirit in this country—"overgrown military establishments," as he called it. The method adopted by them is an efficacious one and one that should not be abandoned lightly.

The proper and efficient organization of the militia in the respective States not only makes a large standing Army unnecessary and renders universal compulsory military training unnecessary—and right here let me say in passing that I do not believe we can enforce universal military training under the provisions of the Constitution just quoted—but is more economical. It is no trouble to get recruits for the National Guards. They will volunteer. They are trained at or near their homes, where they touch elbows with their neighbors, under officers who are their friends, who do not attempt to lord it over them.

I do not believe that anyone in this House wants a military caste established in this country, but there are those in high places who do, and the insidious forces are at work. I make the prophecy that the next step in the program will be when they fail to recruit the Army to the desired strength, which will happen, they will then demand universal training to bring about the ends desired. I know that those who would build up a military caste in this country have ceaselessly traduced the National Guard. They say, "The National Guard is a joke." Why should it be? Is it not possible that the soldiers could be trained under that system to be as efficient as the Regular Army, by using well-trained officers in doing the training? And this bill provides for that. The facts are that in the World War they held their own with the Regular Army; the famous Rainbow Division was a National Guard division. The first break through the Hindenburg line was made by two American National Guard divisions, according to the statement of Field Marshal Haig. Another National Guard division was dubbed the "Savior of Paris," because it served to stop the German Army in its drive on Paris. In this connection I quote from an editorial of the Daily Oklahoman, the leading newspaper of my State, published at Oklahoma City, March 4, 1920:

> The achievements of the National Guard divisions were among the great surprises of the war. For years many Regular Army officers and enlisted men had looked down upon the members of the National Guard. Even friends of the guardsmen in their own communities often joked about what they called the "tin soldiers." But in spite of these jibes the members of the guard—all volunteers—gave up pleasures again and again to drill during peace in order to be ready to defend their country if war should come. And when the war did come many of these young men were among the first to go to France, and large numbers of them took part in battle before many of the Regulars did. This is not intended to belittle the wonderful record of the Regular Army and of the National Army or drafted divisions, but it is meant to show the importance and the efficiency of the National Guard system as a means of providing a line of defense and offense for the protection of the country. Since universal military training appears to have been shelved by Congress, the reorganization and development of the National Guard should be resumed with renewed vigor. This will give the Nation a powerful auxiliary force to back up and reinforce the Regular Army in case of emergency.

In conclusion allow me to repeat, I differ from the committee only in the means to the end, but to my mind the course advocated by me is not only the most efficacious but the safest way to prevent the insidious encroachment of militarism in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. FREEMAN].

Mr. FREEMAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret that this bill does not provide for universal military training. It is conceded by all of us that in time of war every able-bodied American owes his country the duty of military service. It has been fully demonstrated that armies can not be raised overnight, and that the ordinary citizen without previous military training is absolutely worthless for immediate use as a soldier. Therefore it follows that in time of peace it is the duty of every capable American to render himself able to perform military service should the emergency ever require it. The more that are ready for immediately military service the easier will be the task of each individual, the less will be the risk of failure, the more speedy, the more certain the restoration of peace through victory. In the Sixty-fifth Congress there was a sharp difference of opinion over the adoption of conscription. In view of the record there should be none now. The adoption of the minority report of the Committee on Military Affairs was the most just, the most effective, the most far-reaching piece of legislation ever enacted by this democratic Government of the people. [Applause.]

Whether the pending treaty with the essential reservations is finally adopted or rejected, the United States of America has more than ever become a world-wide power with ever-increasing responsibility. We are bound to be consulted and we ought to have a voice, and an influential voice, in the determination of problems which may seriously affect our interests. If we attempt to speak without power, we run the risk of war or humiliation; if we speak with power, our voice will have adequate weight and authority.

Although for several years I have seen service in the Connecticut National Guard and as an enlisted man in the Spanish War I must confess that I have devoted little time to the study of various plans for a proper military establishment in the United States. But in common with all of you I do know that we live in a great and prosperous country. Through tremendous past sacrifices we to-day are citizens of a country rich in all things, and in view of our vast resources I have always felt that in time of peace we were not doing enough in the proper way to insure protection to our free institutions and to our great national wealth, that we were not doing enough to prevent war or to lessen the tremendous waste of our resources in time of war. I have, of course, realized that the maintenance for many years of an army of only 25,000 was a source of great apparent saving, yet in the last two years we have expended billions upon billions of dollars; we have now a national debt of over twenty-five billions, our young men have suffered hundreds of thousands of casualties, and thousands of our boys now lie under the poppies in the fields of France. Perhaps this awful sacrifice was inevitable. We only know to-day that under the circumstances that we in part had permitted to prevail this sacrifice had become absolutely necessary and unavoidable.

If six years ago we had been prepared for war, if Germany had only known that in a few days instead of over a year we would have been able to raise and equip armies of over 4,000,000 men; that in a few weeks, instead of over a year, we would have been able to land millions upon the shores of France, perhaps this World's War might never have been, and this awful waste of millions of lives and billions of dollars might have been altogether avoided. [Applause.]

I recall in the reading of Washington's Farewell Address the other day by the gentleman from Illinois these words:

> Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

If a suitable establishment for defense was deemed necessary for the original States, with 4,000,000 population, and with limited resources, how much more necessary is a suitable establishment to-day for the defense of a Nation of the world with 110,000,000 population, with riches unlimited and incalculable. Our combined military and naval establishments should be built and maintained solely for the purpose of national defense and never for the purpose of foreign aggression. For the purpose of adequate national defense I believe that we should have an "incomparable" Navy. A Navy of superdreadnoughts and battle cruisers, of destroyers and torpedo boats, of submarines and hydroplanes, sufficient to prevent any nation in the world from being able to transport troops across either the Atlantic or the Pacific. If we make our first line of defense of this strength and power we need never maintain a standing army of any great size. The pending bill authorizes a regular "professional" Army of an enlisted strength of 299,000 men; in my opinion we will never obtain in time of peace such an enlisted strength in such an Army, and in this democratic Republic we never ought to obtain it. I am much interested in a provision in the Wadsworth bill which provides for an annual reduction of the enlisted strength of the Regular Army. I am in favor of an annual reduction of 20 per cent of the enlisted strength, 60,000 discharged at the end of the first year, 50,000 more at the end of the second year, 40,000 at the end of the third year, 30,000 at the end of the fourth year, 25,000 at the end of the fifth year, and so on down until in the regular professional standing Army of the United States there shall be 15,000 to 20,000 commissioned officers, and 12,000 or 15,000 sergeants and warrant officers, and practically no privates or corporals at the same time. In the regular temporary Army of this Republic, in time of peace, there should be always three or four hundred thousand conscripted privates and corporals, enlisted for a period of six months only, denying to all of them the privilege of reenlisting.

The youth of our country are compelled to go to school for years without pay, for their own good and for the welfare of society. With merely nominal pay of $5 a month each one of them should be compelled to serve in the Army for only six months at some time between 18 and 21 years of age. I believe that this policy could be adopted without any real economic loss to the Nation at large. The six months of training in the Regular Army would never be forgotten, and the lessons of loyalty, of patriotism, and of obedience to constituted authority would turn all of them out better men, better citizens, better equipped in every way to perform the duties of civic life, and would make them more ready and more willing to respond to the call of selective conscription should an emergency ever arise. In such an army there will be all classes—the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the son of the workingman, and the son of the millionaire. Only such an army should be the Regular Army in this democratic government of the people. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] be granted the privilege of extending his remarks in the RECORD on the glazed-kid industry. Dr. LAYTON was called home by the serious illness of Mrs. Layton.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON] be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am not prepared to discuss the details of this bill or to present a technical analysis of it in any manner whatever. But I have some thoughts and suggestions that seem important to me. This bill, in my judgment, is the first fruit of the defeat of the League of Nations. It is a great Army program. It provides for a peace-time Army of 299,000 enlisted men and 17,820 officers, besides the National Guard and military training system. It will be followed by a great naval program, and the Secretary of the Navy has already laid before a committee of the Senate two different propositions—one for adoption in case the League of Nations is accepted and the other for adoption in case it is defeated. The latter program, as I roughly sketch it, seems to me to about double the expense of the former.

The world, Mr. Chairman, is brought to its present condition of industrial serfdom by militarism and by war. A war debt of two hundred billions now hangs over the working people of the world, and all the great nations confront the greatest military programs in their history, except Germany and her allies, who have been forbidden to increase theirs by the terms of the Paris treaty. We had thought the world was so war weary that it was ready, if possible, to cease competitive preparations for war and begin a policy of universal reduction of armaments.

Our young boys, when they were sent across the ocean in order to engage in war in Europe, were induced to believe that it was a war against war that we were making, and that if triumphant there would be an agreement made by the great nations of the earth under which the possibility of war in the future would be at least minimized and armaments diminished. Republicans and Democrats alike proclaimed the policy of a concert of great, peace-loving nations in a league to maintain peace and restrain the aggressions of lawless nations. And yet we find this Congress of the greatest Nation on earth, now that we have accomplished our purpose on the battle fields, turns tail in time of peace. This Congress forgets or ignores the fine ideals and policies we proclaimed, and at least one branch of it declines to permit America to participate or bear its part of the burden in the undertaking for the preservation of the peace of the world. We seem ready to return to the old system of international military rivalry, under which we are now holding the masses in chains by debts, taxes, and burdens growing out of wars past or to come. The long struggle of the human race for freedom finds the form of servitude changing, but its reality continued. The coat that slavery wears, the badge of servitude, may change, but the substance seems never to change. And the slave chained to the oars of the galley was never more tied to his burden of slavery than the slave tied to the oars of our tax galley, whose precious burden comes, seven-eighths of it, from war.

There was a visible link that bound the wrist of the galley slave to the oar. There is an invisible link in the power of taxation that binds the limbs of the taxpayers of the world to-day. When we come to the opportunity to decrease the armament of the world, America—great, proud, free, liberty-loving America—shunts off from the path and refuses to take her stand for peace; talks of her sovereignty and liberty while binding the bodies of her people to the juggernaut of militarism more firmly. We do not want a peace league; we are not willing to send a few of our boys across the water to adjust the difficulties of Europe. No; but we will put 299,000 of them in armies of America, when a tithe of that number would be all that would be ever called upon to perform our part in the world's problems of peace. Let me call your attention to what our war preparedness burden means, as briefly as I may. When, before the war, we had less than 100,000 men in our Army, it cost over a hundred millions of dollars to carry them. Now, we have doubled the cost per man. Each man then cost $1,000, and each man now reasonably will be expected to cost not less than $2,000. We have trebled the number of men that we are proposing to put into the Army. We have doubled the cost per man and trebled the number of men, and that means that the Army of the United States under this bill will cost six times what it did before the war, or $600,000,000 a year, and the additional cost that we put into the training of 150,000 young men every year to fit them for the coming wars will run perhaps to another $200,000,000. You have $800,000,000 for the Army, not counting your coast fortifications, if I have it right. An equal sum will be needed for the greater Navy. When you add the Army and Navy together, you are going to have, under the program of peace that is foreshadowed by the conduct of the dominant party in this country, an expenditure for Army and Navy and for war purposes, independently of pensions and of the interest we must pay on the debts we have incurred, of over a billion and a half dollars. That is twice what the whole expenditure of this Government, leaving out the self-sustaining Department of the Post Office, cost on the day we entered this war. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] says the average cost of the Army officer is $3,600. We are to have 18,000 of them. That will make $64,000,000 per year for Army officers alone, or nearly two-thirds of the Army cost before the war.

It is a vast Army machine to maintain in time of peace, but we will perhaps never do with less, if we are to keep always prepared to fight the whole world or any combination of nations.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I have very little time, and if the gentleman will yield me two minutes, I will be very glad to answer his question.

Mr. KAHN. But the gentleman has spoken of the enormous war cost because of the dominant party. I suppose the gentleman means——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will permit me to answer that. I said the policy that seemed to be favored by the dominant party of rejecting every opportunity there was to secure the peace of the world, by denouncing the League of Nations, was leading us to this increased preparedness for war. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman know that the dominant party, as represented by the Secretary of War, has asked for an appropriation for the Army for the fiscal year of $989,000,000?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I am very glad the gentleman said that. Let me answer. The Secretary of War has been so surrounded by the cries for larger and larger armies that he surrendered to the militarists who have been demanding that this burden be put upon our people, and it may be that he is right if we are to have no covenant of nations to keep the peace. But ask the Secretary of War, and he will say that if you adopt the League of Nations you will not need this great Army. The Secretary of War has said that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman. Will he yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I simply want to state in response to the suggestion made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that the estimates for Army appropriations which were submitted to Congress were based upon the War Department General Staff bill and not on the law.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And let me say further that before this League of Nations was submitted, as I remember it, before the peace council at Paris had agreed upon a covenant for a League of Nations to enforce peace the President of the United States was responsible for a tentative bill, at the request of the General Staff, asking for 576,000 men; that would have cost over a billion dollars; but that was contingent upon the fact that America and the world would undertake in no way to lessen the dangers of war. The Secretary of the Navy has also said that without the League of Nations America ought to have the greatest Navy in the world. We have a greater coast and more coast cities, and I trust will have more commerce to defend. I see the underlying motive for the fight upon the League of Nations, not known perhaps to many Members of Congress or realized by them. There is a great combination of those who manufacture materials of war and their allied interests, supplemented by those who live by the trade of war, who are not burdened or bothered by the problems of tax paying and tax gathering, that would saddle the burden upon the nations of the world of an eternal struggle in the preparedness for war that would bind in chains the whole world groaning under this burden, until lo! the end of slavery, instead of coming nigh would be further off, and as the years and the decades and the centuries roll on we will find these chains binding harder and harder and stronger and stronger and these burdens bearing heavier and heavier upon the bodies of the workingmen not only of this country but of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, under the permission given me to extend my remarks I will endeavor to reply to the argument made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] just after I concluded my foregoing remarks. He tries to shift the blame for our stupendous military and naval program to the President and Secretary of War. He says:

> While the President was in Europe in January, February, and March, 1919, writing a constitution for the League of Nations that everybody at that time thought would be enacted, because at that time Republicans and Democrats alike were advocates of a League of Nations; while the President was absent during those months preparing this extraordinary document, his Secretary of War was here in Washington helping prepare an Army reorganization bill which called for 576,000 enlisted men and necessary officers for such a force and carrying a provision for the training of every boy 19 years old in the United States.

I thank the gentleman for that statement, which is entirely true and which, except one part of it, had been stated in my remarks to which he was replying. The part I had not stated was that "at that time everybody thought the league would be enacted, because Republicans and Democrats alike were advocates of the League of Nations." I thank the gentleman for that part of his statement, particularly because it comes not from a defender but from an opponent of the President, not from a Democrat, but from a Republican. I believe the President at that time also believed all parties here would gladly acclaim a league to enforce peace. In the beginning at least he knew that he had the overwhelming backing of public opinion at home. What he thought he had to overcome was the hostility and opposition of the European nations, who were wedded, as he feared, to the old ideas of secret treaties and maintaining the balance of power. He especially feared that France, under the lead of Clemenceau, would be hard to win to his ideas of no more secret treaties and a covenant to enforce peace between all great nations. It was clear to the dullest mind that we could not lessen our own military program, except under a common agreement, and that if he were to secure such an agreement it must be made clear that America would not be behind the foremost, in case the old system of competitive armament was to be continued by the nations. Under these circumstances the big Army bill was prepared and submitted to Congress, but it was well understood it was not to be carried out if the League of Nations came into being and we were a party to it. I do not doubt that the very submission of that bill helped to secure the agreement to the league by England, France, Italy, and Japan, because it showed those nations what they would have to compete with on our part if international competitive armaments were to continue. He won his fight in Paris. And then a change came over things in the United States. Political exigency stepped in. The President was still a power with the people notwithstanding the Republican victory of 1918. He had been wounded; he must be killed or thoroughly discredited by 1920. The Democratic Party had accomplished too much in its amazing volume of wise constructive legislation before the war and in its successful conduct of the war. It would not do to let the President give to the world a treaty so beneficent and full of blessing that it would stand foremost among all the great works of man.

And so a thousand guns were turned upon him and upon the League of Nations. The country has been so covered with hostile propaganda that thousands of good citizens now believe that the very idea of a league of nations to enforce peace was conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity.

I know there are some Democrats that oppose the treaty, but they are few, and, not strangely perhaps, many of them are personally hostile to the President. The country is not fooled. The country knows that the great bulk and strength of the opposition that has blocked and is blocking the peace treaty comes from the Republican Party. It is nearly all personal or political opposition to the President, backed by those interests that would have been affected by cutting down great military programs.

I might stop here with quoting and commenting on articles 8 and 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations.

Article 8 reads as follows:

ARTICLE 8.

> The members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.
> The council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.

Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every 10 years.

After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

The members of the league agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those members of the league which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

The members of the league undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programs, and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to war-like purposes.

Article 10 reads as follows:

ARTICLE 10.

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Now, it is perfectly evident even, I presume, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] that with these two articles agreed to by the great nations, including the United States, every great war program of preparedness adopted by every great nation would be reduced, and it is perfectly apparent that neither Japan nor England nor Italy nor France will or can adopt a policy of reduction if the United States is to increase her war preparations. That is why I said this bill was the first fruits of the policy of the Republican Party in defeating the League of Nations.

But, Mr. Chairman, the most natural thing about the whole propaganda against the League of Nations is that it says little or nothing about article 8, but directs its whole attack against article 10, without which article 8 would be completely ineffective or even foolish. In keeping with the policy of the opponents of any worth-while League of Nations to confuse the public and shift the blame for failure to ratify the peace treaty they are frequently proclaiming that they, too, want a League of Nations, but not the one submitted by the Paris council. And they urge us to ratify the other parts of the treaty but let the "covenant of the league" wait for a future convention. Mr. Chairman, what evil may come from waiting?

First, England, France, Italy, and Japan must, as we are now doing, prepare to meet the future. This morning's Post—March 11—shows Admiral Jellicoe urging a navy for Canada. He clearly wants a great navy for Canada. In the same paper Andre Tardieu admits that France has more soldiers in her army than before the war. In justifying this larger army he uses this significant language:

Second, the United States promised us their guarantee in case of unprovoked attack, as well by the treaty of Versailles as by the special treaty between them and us, and neither of those treaties is ratified.

Defeat the treaty and the league, abandon disarmament now, postpone it to a future day, which may be 1 year or more likely 10 years or never, and we must all go back to the old competitive system of big armies and navies and vast munitions, and the private and Government manufacture of guns, battleships, fortifications, and war machinery. The past tells us what a harvest of golden wealth the private makers of these things would reap, while we wait and while the masses toil. Before the Great War statistics showed that over 72 per cent of the expenses of the Government of the United States raised from taxation had been spent in war and preparing for war and the paying for past wars. There was maintenance of the Army and Navy in peace and war, fortifications and pensions and bounties and interest on war debts, and yet we were blessed among nations of the earth because our war burdens were lighter than those of any other great nation. Now we have piled up a fixed burden of debt and coming bounties and pensions which looms large in comparison with other national debts, and even with our incomparable resources. Our debt will be some $30,000,000,000, and the interest and sinking fund of 1 per cent on that alone will reach nearly $2,000,000,000 a year. Adding this to the other expenses growing out of the war and our continuing the competitive system of preparedness for war, we must spend annually from four to five billions of dollars. By disarmament or a reduction of armament we can cut this down by over a billion dollars a year, and yet men say, "Wait; not yet. Let us build our great Navy and organize our great Army first." When we have done this who can say that the armies and navies and private interests fattening on them will let the world disarm? I take no stock in the argument that there is nothing compulsory in articles 8 and 10. If the nations obligate themselves to reduce their armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety, it devolves on the League of Nations to enforce the obligation by common action, and without some such action and concert not one of the leagued nations would feel safe to reduce its own armament. Mutual suspicion and distrust would rule the secret councils of every nation, and secret or open endeavors of each nation for its own advantages or superiority would continue as in the past.

In answer to all this, we are told that by entering the league we part with some of our sovereignty, and they tell us this with hands lifted in holy horror. We do part with our sovereign right to make unjust and cruel war, to measure our right by our might, or to make war without first stating our cause for war before a council of the nations, and we bind ourselves together for mutual protection against any lawless nation. After all, it is the old question—how much of our pride, our separate sovereignty, if you will, we are willing to sacrifice for the ultimate welfare of ourselves. It is the old question that individuals answered when organized government began, that nations always answer in the formation of every treaty. It was the question earnestly asked by our fathers when they formed the Union and agreed that the States would stand together against a foreign invader. The human race may well shudder at the military menace of the future. God Almighty with a strong arm brought the Hebrews out from Egyptian bondage, but who will bring all the children of men out from under the bondage of wars and preparing for wars?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I feel myself somewhat embarrassed in taking the position that I feel bound to take upon this bill. There are many things in the bill that I most heartily approve, but there are some things in this bill that I think should be abolished. There should be amendments made, and I shall try to consider some of them under the five-minute rule. I am thoroughly in favor of a highly trained army of professional soldiers in the country, an army that shall be a pattern and a model to which the American citizen soldiery may aspire. In the event of war the Regular Army never will be large enough to defend the country, because the country will not support a large standing Army. [Applause.] The defense of the country must always depend upon the citizen soldiers, the militia of the country. It is obvious, then, that we should have professional soldiers, trained to the minute, able to keep abreast of or to surpass in the complex knowledge of warfare the soldiers of any other nation, who shall serve as models to which the citizen soldier may look for example and tuition. But the Army proposed by this bill is not large enough to guard the country in time of war, and it is twice as large as it ought to be in time of peace. [Applause.] This bill purports to be an act to amend the act of 1916, but the father of that act would not recognize his amended offspring. The act of 1916 was enacted when the world was ablaze with war. For nearly two years Europe had been at war, and it was perfectly well understood at that time by many people that we were in great danger of being drawn into that war in spite of the heralded assurance that "the President would keep us out of war."

Yet under these circumstances a Regular Army of 175,000 men was considered sufficient. Now, when the world is war-worn and when for years to come we will probably have no need for soldiers, unless under a league of nations we should find ourselves obligated to send American armies to fight in European quarrels not of our instigation or concern, now we find this bill provides for 299,000 enlisted men and 17,820 officers. Gentlemen, you are fixing up a bigger load than the people of this country are willing to carry. [Applause.] You ought to cut the enlisted force in two and trim out a lot of these major generals and brigadier generals and officers of high rank. [Applause.] According to the bill you have an officer for every 17 enlisted men. But that is not the worst feature of the bill. The bill creates a military autocrat. The President and the Secretary of War are mere figureheads alongside of the Chief of Staff. It looks to me as though the bill's principal purpose is to create this wonderful officer. In the language of the bill he recruits, he equips, organizes, supplies, makes the plans, and executes and coordinates the work of the Military Establishment, and I believe he will do this according to his own whim.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield? I wonder if the gentleman will not be satisfied inasmuch as he is a Republican?

Mr. HULINGS. I do not know what he is or might be. I understand he has recently got to be a Republican, he did not use to be so much of a Republican, like some fellows up there in New York they swap back and forth. [Applause.] Of course, everything will be done in the name of the President, but the Chief of Staff does the organizing, appointing, and executing. He orders a board that arranges the officers in two classes, those to be retained and those to be discharged, and there is no appeal from that board. He organizes—that is, he appoints—all the officers. He appoints reserve officers in such number as he prescribes.

In time of peace he may order reserve officers on duty at full pay. How many? There is no limit unless the President should get cross. He can, he must detail retired officers, in addition to what is on the active list, for service at the colleges and schools on full pay when they can be found. If they can not be found, he can appoint officers from the active list. There is practically no limit to the authority to load up the roster with officers on full pay. The bill transfers the powers of the Military Establishment to the control of the General Staff, dominated by one man. The Secretary of War is a civil officer and he is the instrument by which the Congress and the people manage and control the Army, officers and men, but under this bill it will be a mighty strong Secretary of War who will not find himself as putty under the influence and power of the Chief of Staff. As I said in the beginning, I favor a highly trained Army, but when war comes the country must rely upon the militia, and the militia is defined in the act of June 16—that is not repealed by this act—as all the able-bodied men in the country between the ages of 18 and 45, and divided into three classes—the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the unorganized militia. Now, if the National Guard is a part of the militia, as it is plainly defined to be, then by the Constitution the President is the Commander in Chief of the militia when called into service, reserving to the States the right to appoint the officers and the training of the militia, but by this bill the President—that is, the Chief of Staff—appoints all the officers, and every shred of authority or control of the National Guard is taken from the State and lodged in the department at Washington. And there is grave doubt of the constitutionality of the proposed measure. For years the Regular Establishment have striven to destroy the National Guard, and by the operation of this bill the Regulars will have simply swallowed the National Guard. The militia, in spite of the arrogance, unlawful and contemptuous treatment by the Regulars in all our wars, has been the backbone of our military power. Of the 17 divisions of the Regular Army, 7 went overseas, 5 of them got to the front.

One-half of the enlisted strength of those five divisions were men who joined after war was declared, and the splendid work done by those five divisions was not wholly due to the superior efficiency of Regular Army training. The National Guard sent 11 divisions to the front, and of the National Army, the drafted men, 17 divisions went overseas. Now, whatever may be due to the valor of the Regulars, there was no body of troops under the American flag superior in valor or in the discharge of arduous duty than the "iron men," the Twenty-eighth Division of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, and I protest against the provisions of this bill that would take away from Pennsylvania and its splendid men who built up that organization the control of the National Guard of Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there are many things in this bill that I think should be remedied in the debate under the five-minute rule to which I will not allude at this time, and, Mr. Chairman, I surrender back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG]. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to use the time allotted to me to discuss the need for a separate Air Service. I had hoped that this bill would make some provision along that line, and it does make provision for its betterment by providing the same increased pay now being paid aviators in the Navy; a chief of the Air Service with the rank of major general, with 1,514 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, and 16,000 enlisted men. That, I think, will greatly develop the present Army Air Service. But we need an air service separate and apart from either the Navy or the Army. We need an air service that is dominated and controlled by men who know how to fly, by men who understand the conditions under which the men must work, who do fly air machines, who will study the manufacture and needs from that standpoint, and will develop the very best type of aeroplanes and hydroplanes for every branch of service, with fields and stations where they are needed. If we are engaged in another war the Air Service is going to be highly important. To-day we have an air service for the Army, we have an air service for the Navy, and we have an air service in the Agricultural Department to fly over the forests and look after forest fires, and we have an air service in the Post Office Department.

With all these air services there comes a duplication of organization, which breeds jealousy between the different branches that has a tendency to retard development, and over and above that, there is the jealousy that I think has been plainly exhibited by the General Staff toward the Air Service. One thing that came out in the war was that in the development of the Air Service the Army and the Navy did not cooperate, did not work together to secure the best results. During the war my own son was an aeroplane pilot, and was in service at Little Silver, N. J., engaged in the development of the wireless telephone. They could secure from France and England and Italy any report of the development of the wireless telephone service, but they could not get from the Navy any report of the advancement it had made. Now, think of it. Here we were at war, with all branches of the service working overtime to secure victory, yet either jealousy or duplication of organization and a conflict of authority prevented developments made in the greatly needed wireless telephone by one branch of our own Army from being used by another arm of the service.

The great failure of the war was our aeroplane service, not because of any failure of the men in the Air Service—for there never was a more glorious record made than by those brave fellows who, despite the unsafe and dangerous character of the planes furnished them, despite the hundreds of their comrades killed at the training fields, accepted the awful risks, became expert flyers, and when sent to France won many battles in the air with the discarded aeroplanes of our Allies—but because of contracts given to men who knew nothing of aeronautics, because men were placed in command of a service they knew nothing of; hence it is we now have committees appointed to investigate our failure reporting that though we spent $1,051,000,000 we did not produce a single fighting plane.

Now, since the war we have found that the Army Air Service has been spending a great deal of money, and causing the death of many of our splendid young men, by pulling off stunts like the race between here and California, where there were about 10 men killed and several hundred thousand dollars' worth of aeroplanes destroyed. What possible purpose could be attained by that? If they wanted to make some test as to endurance and to try out planes, they could have made the test by sending one or two men on such a trip. But, no; they must pull off a race. Now it is suggested we should have an air mail service to Alaska. They are still killing men and spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to no purpose.

Last week there were killed in Panama two young men, Lieut. Foreman, from Baltimore, Md., and Lieut. Vaughn, from Texas. It seems to me from the way those men were killed that it was almost murder. These two young men were on the transport that carried our congressional delegation to Panama during the Christmas adjournment of Congress. They were splendid young fellows. You could not meet them without feeling proud that America had such young men in its Air Service. They said to us, "We are going to stay in the Air Service until after this session of Congress, and if we are provided with a separate Air Service we will remain in it permanently; otherwise, we intend to get out of it as all the other good flyers are doing."

When we reached Panama we were taken through the Canal and out to the fortifications; we were taken over to the coaling station, and we were taken over to the hydroplane station, but we were very carefully kept from an inspection of France Field, which is the aeroplane field. But my son and I went past it and it is a disgrace to this Nation.

It was partly overgrown with weeds, and in talking to the boys we discovered that there was no other landing field within 200 miles. As we left my son said to me, "It is simply murder to ask those boys to fly down here, with the obsolete planes they have and with no other landing field within 200 miles, because," as he explained, "when they get out of a radius of 5 miles from France Field they are absolutely at the mercy of the gasoline engine. If any of the spark plugs fail, if anything happens to reduce the speed of the aeroplane, they must land, which means absolute death to them. Panama is a country of hills and jungles, and to attempt to make a forced landing will mean their death."

And here within two months from that time these two men were killed. Doing what? The report says they were ordered to carry the mail 200 miles from France Field. To order men to fly such planes over such a country for 200 miles was to order them to their death. We need, above all things, aeroplane protection for that canal. It has no such protection now. We have a very elaborate hydroplane field down there, and much money is being spent for the naval branch of the Air Service there, but suppose an enemy's fleet would approach that canal and launch aeroplanes from their decks? All these hydroplanes could do would be to make the report, and run back to the hangars. Where would our protection be? The planes down there are old-style training planes and observation planes.

There is not a combat plane there. There is no protection given to that canal from the air. Two or three aeroplanes from battleships could drop bombs on those locks and absolutely tie up that passageway to the Pacific. It seems to me that it is time we had a united air service with a secretary of air service, as we have a Secretary of the Army and of the Navy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. I see that the hands of the clock above the Speaker's desk are still, and I wondered if it is the purpose of the proponents of this bill that it shall stand there as the sun above the mountain at the command of Joshua, until they had slaughtered the enemies of Israel. Is it the purpose of the proponents of this bill to stop the clock until the innocents who oppose it are slaughtered? Otherwise, it distracts the attention of the committee when the chairman has to look at this clock in order to ascertain the time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCARTHUR. I want to suggest to the gentleman that that is a daylight-saving clock.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I had not intended to take any time in general debate on this bill, and I would not have changed my mind on this subject had it not been for the speech that was made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] a few moments ago. He is objecting to this bill because of the number of enlisted men and officers for which provision is made. He says that if the Republican Party had indorsed the proposition of a League of Nations, as advocated by the President of the United States, a great standing army with the officer personnel of this magnitude would have been unnecessary.

I do not know why the gentleman from Texas should make such an extravagant statement as that when he remembers the recent history of our country. While the President was absent in Europe during the months of January, February, and March, 1919, writing a constitution for the League of Nations that everybody at that time thought would be enacted, because at that time Republicans and Democrats alike were advocates of a League of Nations; while the President was absent during those months preparing this extraordinary document, his Secretary of War was here in Washington helping prepare an army reorganization bill which called for 576,000 enlisted men and necessary officers for such a force, and carrying a provision in that same bill for the training of every boy in the United States who had attained the age of 19 years, provided his health and family circumstances would permit of such training. With this in mind, and with this bill lying upon the table of every Member of Congress, I can not understand why the gentleman from Texas should say that had it not been for the Republicans of the Senate there would be no need of a bill of the character that is presented for our consideration to-day.

The bill prepared by the Secretary of War, under the instructions, if you please, of the President of the United States, who was at the very moment writing this League of Nations, carried a command for almost twice the number of enlisted men asked for by the bill before us now, with compulsory military training of the 19-year-old boys of this country. Such statements as have been made, not only by the gentleman from Texas, but by other men throughout this country along the same line, are so rotten that the nauseating stench penetrates into every home throughout our country. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Alabama can use some of his time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRINSON].

Mr. BRINSON. Mr. Chairman, the papers have from time to time contained much interesting news concerning plans for an enlarged National Army. We have been entertained and edified by a number of able speeches delivered in this Congress dealing with the matter of Army reorganization.

The Senate committee has reported a bill, very comprehensive in character and including in it an ambitious scheme for compulsory military training.

The House bill reported out by the Military Affairs Committee comes to us with the original provision for compulsory military training eliminated, but with the statement that a bill providing for this compulsory training will be brought in shortly and pushed to a vote.

A majority of the Committee on Military Affairs voted a short time ago to incorporate the compulsory feature in the bill, but presumably this majority has yielded to a situation shaping itself unfavorably toward this new venture in our military system.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the sober judgment of the American people will not approve this large increase of the Army at this time.

The time is too short since our entry into the World War for the people to have forgotten that much of the spirit which nerved the arms of our boys in that great adventure and which inspired the labors and sacrifices of those at home was built upon the proclaimed faith of our leaders that this war was fought to end wars, and its winning would herald a long era of, if not perpetual, peace.

How disappointing must be the long debates in another body to those who thought they saw the near realization of Tennyson's dream:

Till the war drum throbbed no longer, and the battle flags were furled
In the parliament of man, the federation of the world.

How surely must the thought of broken faith come to the minds of the people when they shall learn that upon the heels of a victory which should usher in a long era of international good will there is brought out of committee a plan for a larger Military Establishment and vaster appropriations for war preparations than was ever contemplated even when the nations of Europe were taxing themselves to the utmost to prepare against the certain day of tremendous war.

I want to consider only and briefly the provision for compulsory military training which is included in the Senate bill, and which has been decided on by the Committee on Military Affairs, but which the exigency of the situation, considered politically, suggests the consideration of in a separate bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Bearing out the gentleman's statement, he will find, on page 43 of the bill, a proviso to the effect that—except at State institutions described in this section, no units shall be established or maintained in an educational institution until the authorities of the same agree to establish and maintain a two years' compulsory training system.

That bears out the gentleman's statement there, that this leads up to a compulsory military training proposition?

Mr. BRINSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman is referring to the paragraph in the bill, he will find that the words are "elective or compulsory."

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Yes, "elective or compulsory," as directed by the Secretary of War, and we all know what that means.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If you know your Secretary of War as we do, yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I hold no brief for him.

Mr. BRINSON. In the first place, I submit this compulsory training is unnecessary.

This war was not an altogether unmixed evil. Horrible as it was in its inception and motive, savage and brutal as it was in its prosecution, it yet taught us lessons—impressed truths which may well be treasured as its compensating features, and should be studied because of their value to this and succeeding generations. Among other things, it seems to me, it taught with compelling force that military training in this country is unnecessary.

The American boy can in an incredibly short time, under competent direction, be converted into the best soldier of the world. He does not require long training. Experiences of other countries and rules that govern other nations have no conclusive bearing upon any contemplated American policy.

The ardor and spirit and easy adaptation to any condition of surroundings make the American youth the world's best material for the fighting man. Their readiness to respond to the country's call in every time of need is an element of great strength to this Republic. The patriotism which always prompts instant response to the Nation's call has its explanation in love of our institutions and an intelligent appreciation of their meaning to this Nation and the world.

The history of our country shows that while the men of mature judgment have always formulated the policies of the Nation, at every crisis the young men have come speedily to the colors, and upon their ready and willing shoulders have fallen the burden and the honor of making good those policies and of realizing the fine ideals of the elder statesmen.

The World War just ended offers no exception. The older men in the cabinets and legislative bodies framed the laws, negotiated the treaties, shaped the policies of the Nation; but when grim war must be resorted to the young untrained (for the most part) men were called from farm and store and shop and office—called to the drill ground and the camp, and then, after brief training, to the active fields of war. It was the impact of this fresh, spirited body of American boys, with scant training, which saved the highly trained troops of the Allies from rout and which pushed the efficient soldiers of Germany back steadily to the border.

No more effective service was rendered by any troops in the war than by the American boys in the Argonne Forest, with but a few months of training behind them.

Did any American doubt the final result of the war when our citizen soldiery had landed in France? If so, he has read American history to little profit. There are qualities inherent in the American soldier, clearly noticeable from the early days of our country's history—qualities not so generally found in the soldiers of any other country.

The American soldier has a spirit of daring, coupled with a practical understanding of values in war, possessed by no other soldier. His fine initiative is an expression of this. Very often the private soldier thinks as accurately and is as capable as his officer. The death of all the officers would not necessarily mean defeat as it would in every other army of the world.

The virtue of our American democracy is splendidly vindicated in the American Army.

This applies to the Navy as well, and the recognition of this fact by the great Secretary who presided over our Navy may bring upon his head the anathemas of certain gentlemen, lavishly adorned with gold lace; but the sober judgment of America approves his views and finds them thoroughly in accord with the genius and spirit of our institutions. Mr. Daniels's vision of a democratized Navy is fast approaching realization and no reaction is possible.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINSON. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I presume the gentleman refers to the gold lace which the Army officers used to wear some years ago. But you will notice from the uniforms of the Army officers sitting up there in the gallery that they are clothed as fighting men.

Mr. BRINSON. Yes. Those men are wearing the uniform of service. They are not wearing the uniform we sometimes see in New York City.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. There is not enough gold lace to go around.

Mr. BRINSON. No. There is probably not enough to go around. When democracy puts its hands to the plow it never turns back. When the American soldier moves into action it is not merely the command of the officer but his own intelligence, his own heart, and impulses which impel him forward.

Can he be successfully resisted? He never has been. He never will be. He has lost only one war, and—paradoxical as it may sound—he lost that to himself, when the strength of the North prevailed over the weakened, the well-nigh prostrate South.

Every section of our Nation now is indissolubly bound together. When the blood of the boys from the North and South mixed in the soil of France an unbreakable cement was formed, and no sectional agitator will ever break it asunder or weaken it by undermining the faith of one in the loyalty and fidelity of the other.

Ties of comradeship and fraternity formed in the trenches or on the shell-furrowed fields of France will remain unbroken.

Those American boys, sons of men who followed Lee and Grant, moved with resistless force against an enemy trained to the limit, but an enemy whose military system and methods were the antipodes of ours. Each man in the American uniform—the private soldier as intensely as the officer—felt the impelling motive of a high and holy mission.

This spirit, Mr. Chairman, will safeguard our Nation, though all drill grounds be furrowed by the plow of peaceful industry.

What highly trained and efficient product of the school or drill ground has matched the heroic and calmly executed exploit of Sergt. York?

Although at the start a conscientious objector to all wars, yet this fine specimen of American manhood, when convinced of the justice of the war, gave himself unreservedly to his country's cause, and while in modest station, by rapid and accurate thought and courageous action, brought unaided a larger toll of dead and captured than any man of any army on either side.

Lack of need of this compulsory military training is seen, I think, in the fact that we have now available for military service and will have for several years—certainly long enough to test the League of Nations—between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 well-trained American boys, every one of whom is capable of splendid service should the need arise.

Two facts—either one of which is sufficient—will guarantee a long era of peace:

First. The exhausted people of Europe, all of whose energies must be spent in rebuilding a ravaged world.

Second. The existence in this country of a large trained body of men whose record overseas and here showed them to be the world's best fighting men.

A second reason why at this time we should not embark upon this policy of compulsory training is the large cost it would entail. The chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate estimates that the cost of the Military Establishment proposed in the Senate bill will be $609,806,000 for the first year, there being a slight decrease each year thereafter for six years. The War Department estimates the expenditures at $34,000,000 a year more than Senator WADSWORTH, chairman of the committee, while the minority report of the Senate Military Affairs Committee estimates the cost at more than double these estimates, or $1,314,143,000 annually. The Republican leader of the House estimates the cost of this establishment, as proposed in the Senate bill, at approximately $1,000,000,000.

Whichever estimate is correct, it is quite evident that the cost of this ambitious military system is stupendous. The military training is a very large item—$600,000,000—based upon an estimate of $60 for each of the 10,000,000 men for four months each year.

At this time, with a Nation facing a large deficit, with taxes exceedingly burdensome, a program of military expansion is proposed which might well find favor with nations whose histories recount wars in fast succession through the centuries and whose claims to glory have largely been based on the conquest and subjugation of alien peoples.

Should the compulsory military provision prevail—whether included in this bill or proposed in a separate measure—a very heavy loss will fall upon the individual citizen and the industries of this country.

The withdrawal from the farms and other industries of 1,000,000 young men each year for four months will bring serious economic disturbance to this Nation.

This phase of the question has been given little consideration, but I think it merits our very serious thought. Production—production to the limit—offers some relief to the sorely pressed consumer. When the active agents in the system of production are curtailed, the output, of necessity, is curtailed.

During the period of the war the farmers without murmuring gave their sons to the service of the country. Those at home labored with zeal and energy to supply the shortage of labor and feed and clothe most of the world. It is not fair that during peace times demand shall be made on them each year for their sons to give themselves to training in the art of war while the arts of peace are so insistently calling them.

Finally, I submit, this program, if it shall succeed, will inevitably effect a change in the temper and spirit and ambition of our people.

From a peace-loving people we shall gradually—through constant touch and sight of this powerful establishment with its magnificent trappings—be led into the paths our fathers sought to avoid. Into our nostrils the breath of the militaristic spirit will come.

Conscious power too often breeds zeal for its use. Conquest follows close on its heels. Democracy and conquest do not harmonize.

The men who founded this Nation had prophetic vision. They saw beyond their own times and the generation just ahead. They builded not alone for that day and this, but for all the future. Shall we forsake the path plainly blazed by them for us?

Shall we, in fear of a world impoverished by war, forget the teachings of our fathers, turn from the counsels of democracy, forsake the traditional policies, the cherished principles of our national life, and embark upon a course of action wholly at variance with that charted for us by the founders of the Republic? A world in need of our peaceful ministry appeals to our national conscience and to our pride in our national mission.

The swords may not just yet be beat into plowshares, but Isaiah's prophecy is nearing realization. What nation is so fit to lead as America? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this is a most interesting bill, and yet I notice that there are so few Members present. It is rather a sad commentary on our legislative condition that a bill alleged to be for the reorganization of the Army should be brought in here to the House and under such circumstances discussed in general debate by the men who have studied it, not for three months, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] indicated in his speech yesterday, but for more than nine months, long enough time to have produced a real something from the committee, with so few Members to listen. It may be that the bill is of such a character that the membership of this House would not even care to listen to its discussion. I must confess that there are many things in the bill that fill me with so much disgust that I dislike very much to talk about it.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I want to offer this suggestion: That it is possible that the membership of the House have such absolute confidence in the judgment and patriotism of the committee that they are willing to leave it to them largely.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is rather complimentary for the gentleman to suggest that, but I think perhaps the gentleman will admit that he is a little far afield when he realizes that the committee is divided into three groups on the proposition and that the bill is reported out by only a bare partisan majority and that it does not represent anything like the unanimous opinion of the committee.

It is called a reorganization bill. What does it reorganize? What does it do? The very title of the bill indicates that it is an amendment of the national defense act, commonly called the Hay bill, and they have picked out some few sections of the Hay bill but cut the very life and force out of that great piece of legislation which the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House have stood here for four years and defended as being the greatest piece of military legislation ever put on the statute books of any nation in the world in time of peace. The very things in that bill that made it a great bill, the things that made it possible for men who love the country and believe in its Army and have believed in the force and power of the American people to support that bill have been cut from it. Its vitals have been taken away.

After we declared war some people criticized the Congress for not having put this country in a better state of preparedness, and that criticism came in great volumes from the Republican side of this House. But even the Republicans on the committee stood here in the well of this House and defended the bill, and said that the bill had not had opportunity to function, and that if the war had been long enough away, if the bill had been passed a few years before, so that its provisions could have been made operative and the great provisions of the Hay bill could have been put into effect, we would not have found this country in that sad state of unpreparedness that we were in when we declared war, because they said under the system of enlistment men joined the Army to be three years with the colors and four years with the reserve, and that if the law had been in effect for the seven years we would have had seven times as many men as you could get in one single year to enlist in the Army ready to respond to the country's call, who would enter the Army prepared and trained and equipped to defend the country in its hour of need.

What does this bill do to that great provision? It carries provisions repealing the Regular Army enlisted reserve. You will have no enlisted reserve of the Regular Army of the United States after this bill becomes a law. And it is going to become a law, because the Republicans, the men who clamored and claimed that this country should be prepared, have never stood for preparedness in the history of this country in time of peace.

Following the Civil War, when we had the greatest organized land force in this world, under Republican control they cut the vitals out of the Army organization of this country and reduced it to 25,000 men. And now, after this war, when we had the greatest Army that has ever been organized in the history of the world—4,200,000 of the finest soldiers ever put into uniform by any country—the Republican control, with almost a strict partisan vote in the committee, reports out a bill that will in effect reduce the Army of the United States to somewhere from 100,000 to 150,000 men.

It is true that the bill provides that the enlisted strength of the Army shall be 299,000 men and nearly 18,000 officers, but how are you going to get the men? Upon what are you going to depend to get these men in time of peace to come and join the United States Army? You are going to depend upon a recruiting service. What is it going to cost you and what is it going to produce? By past experience we can judge of the future. When the Hay bill was in effect we had a recruiting service which was composed of 1 colonel, 6 majors, 24 captains, 4 first lieutenants from the active list of the Regular Army, and 6 retired colonels, 4 retired lieutenant colonels, 16 retired majors, 16 retired captains, 4 retired first lieutenants, and 1,617 enlisted men, sergeants, corporals, and privates. That recruiting service got men to join the Army, but it cost us $59.98 for every man that we got into the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In a moment I will.

Now, what is the situation? What is the recruiting service of the present day? What is the recruiting service that this bill is going to produce or continue? Let us see. In place of 1 colonel on the active list you will have 56, or we have them now. Instead of no lieutenant colonels on the active list, we will have 34; instead of 6 majors, we will have 76; instead of 24 captains, we will have 94; instead of 40 lieutenants, we will have 55 first lieutenants; and instead of no second lieutenants, we will have 24, or a total of 339 officers in the place of 35. On the retired list, instead of 6 colonels, we will have 3 colonels; of lieutenant colonels, instead of 4 we will have 7; instead of 16 majors, we will have 2; instead of 16 captains, we will have 14; in the place of the 4 first lieutenants, we will have 4; or 30 retired men in the place of 46, a saving of 16 in one place and an increase of 304 in the other. As I told you a few minutes ago, the enlisted men in the recruiting service under the Hay bill were 1,617, while to-day the enlisted men are 2,391.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I promised to yield first to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman has answered the question that I desired to ask.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman know that one of the troubles in getting men to enlist was the Prussianized, tyrannical conduct of the officers toward the men in the last war? I have talked to a number of them who expressed a desire to reenlist, but who did not want to subject themselves to such tyrannical, oppressive, and outrageous treatment, and I do not blame them.

Mr. CALDWELL. I can not entirely agree with the gentleman, as I will explain later.

Now, gentlemen, under the system of enlistment adopted under the Hay bill it cost us $59.98 for every man who was enlisted in the United States Army. With ten times the overhead charge, I ask you what will it cost us for each man enlisted under this Army destruction bill, not an Army reorganization bill? What will it cost us if they have ten times the overhead expense? And that does not include a nickel for transportation to and from the place of enlistment. It does not carry a nickel for the man discharged and sent to his home. Under the Hay bill you sent him home once in three years. Under this bill you will send him home every year, and you will pay his transportation both ways. When you get through with his training what are you going to have? Are you going to have an Army of 299,000 trained soldiers? Let us see. With this system of enlistment that they have reported what are we getting? We have some figures on that. In the year from March 1, 1919, to March 1, 1920, they got 171,499 men, and during the last five weeks, during the great drive, with this overhead expense we got 10,185 in five weeks, or just a little over 2,000 a week. How many weeks are there in a year? Fifty-two. If you get 2,000 a week for 52 weeks you have 104,000 men. You have an enlistment period of one year, so that you will have an Army of 104,000 men plus the few who go in for the three-year enlistment, one-half of whom will have a training of an average of three months. With an Army of from 104,000 to 150,000 green men, you have 18,000 officers. What are you going to do with them? You have 104,000 men in five divisions, and you have officers for nine divisions, besides those on the detached list, and all of these other things.

Imagine a review of the United States Army, with four divisions of officers, 4 major generals, 12 brigadier generals, with all the colonels and majors and captains and lieutenants and second lieutenants marching up Pennsylvania Avenue without a single cook to keep them fat, not a private soldier to act as dog robber for the officers, the female nurses wearing the insignia of second lieutenants, and the men chaplains without rank. Well, perhaps in the minds of those that reported this bill their humble calling does not warrant respect. An Army reorganization bill! Is it not a pippin? And here, after the greatest war of all times, when America sent her young manhood over there to fight for the cause of humanity, how did she send them? Some of my Democratic friends over there who are against universal training will tell you. "Mr. Bryan told us that a million men would spring to arms overnight, and they did." Yes; and they sent those poor boys across to the other side, a great many of them without ever having told them how to load a gun. When I was over there a captain who had seen service in the trenches told me of cases where men in the trenches, ready to go over the top in a few minutes before the zero hour, said, "Captain, I do not mind going over, but will you not please show me how to load the gun so that I can shoot when I get over there?"

In my district there was a boy who was drafted and was sent to three camps and then shipped across, and was buried in the trenches in France within five weeks from the day he was drafted, and he never had a gun in his hands before he was called by the draft.

Figures from Fort Slocum, N. Y., show that out of 10 men taken in the ordinary enlistment 7 of them never had a gun in their hands before in their lives. Yet here at this time when this country is still technically at war, when all the world is a seething volcano, when no man knows when the next outbreak will be, when no man knows what hour the clock will strike and the men of America will be sent again to defend the flag of our country, you, under the tutelage of men who are against training and were against the war, come in here and destroy the military bill designed before the war, paying no attention to the great lesson taught by this great holocaust. Shame on you men sent here to defend and protect the country, who will destroy the only means of defense we have and give us nothing in its place, so to speak.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from New York will undoubtedly admit that if the case he cited is true that there was a boy from his district who did not know how to load his gun, that such an incident was absolutely inexcusable in this last war, and that the officer who was called upon to furnish troops for replacement and sent this young man should have been court-martialed.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then you will have to court-martial your Republican friend Peyton C. March, for he issued the order that kept the units here and required untrained men to be sent over as replacements to the other side. It did not happen in one case but in hundreds of cases, and any officer who served in the trenches in France will be able to point out repeated instances.

I want to say that in nearly every instance when they found it out the boys were sent to the rear, but in many instances the poor boy who had never been given an opportunity to train himself was sent to his death because of the neglect of legislation of this country.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. CRAGO. I have been trying religiously to follow the line of logic of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman will have time to criticize my remarks after I get through. I do not care to have him interrupt me for that purpose now.

Mr. CRAGO. I was not criticizing the gentleman.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will confine his interruption to a question and not to criticism, I will yield.

Mr. CRAGO. I want to know if the gentleman considers the national-defense act of June 3, 1916, a more effective military code than the bill presented to the House now?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do in many respects.

Mr. CRAGO. But the gentleman has stated that we may not get as many men under this law as the old law.

Mr. CALDWELL. It will destroy the Army reserve.

Mr. CRAGO. Would the gentleman be willing to pledge his committee——

Mr. CALDWELL. I can not pledge anybody but myself. I voted in committee, and the gentleman can state how he voted—I voted for the Kahn proposition for universal military training. I will say that if I can get in under the rules of the House, I propose to offer as an amendment word for word, letter for letter, and punctuation for punctuation, the identical proposition of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. I am going to give the universal training advocates of this Congress an opportunity to vote on it, and those against it to stand up and be counted, so that the people may know who shall come back and who shall stay at home.

Mr. CRAGO. All I was trying to do was to apply the logic of the gentleman from New York to the two bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the gentleman from Alabama, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CALDWELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, what else besides effective organization would universal training do for the boys? Everybody admits that the average man who went into the Army under the draft gained from 4 to 10 pounds in 4 to 10 weeks. They got bigger, broader, and stronger, and those who know anything about the Army know that when a man arrived there and he could not speak our common language, that he was put into a school and taught to speak the language of the United States. They know that if he could not read or write, he was sent to school and taught to read and write.

The stories told by Gen. Hahn and other men who went across the sea bear out the proposition that the Army continued as a school, because Gen. Hahn told me that while his men were actually in the trenches defending the line their schools continued, and that the greatest joy of his life was to see those men who had learned to read and write for the first time writing their first letters home to their families.

Are you going to say that the only means this country has of teaching these people to speak the English language, who came here without having learned it before they came, or who were born in communities where they speak other than the English language, shall be denied them and that we shall not take advantage of this opportunity to enable them to learn our own tongue? Are you going to say that you deny them an opportunity, which some sections of this country do not provide in their common schools, to learn to read and write the English language?

Then, too, look at what it does for the physical side of the man. Out of the first 1,600,000 men called into the draft 69,000 of them were found to be suffering from venereal disease. In that proportion, more than 150,000 of the young men of this country who were called in that war had venereal disease. Of the 4,200,000 men discharged from the Army not one was suffering from a communicable form of venereal disease—not one. Go to France, where the boys were, where the 2,100,000 men were who defended our country. In every village and town and hamlet and city where these men were quartered there was on every corner a signpost pointing to the prophylaxis station. Every man who went there filled out a card, and in 10 days from the time he filled out that card his captain gave him a strong arm inspection. The records were kept that long and then destroyed. Be it said for the morals of the American boy that out of a company of 250 the average number of men who visited those stations was less than 10, and that the highest in all units that went across to France in any one single month was 30. The American Army was the most moral army that ever went into war at any time in the history of the world. They were crusaders, fighting for humanity and America, clean of mind and clean of body in the midst of the greatest and most horrible temptations that ever surrounded any body of men in any conflict in the world.

We sent over there with them thousands of American women. No woman was permitted to go who had a near relative in the Army. They went without protection, except the protection of the American soldier. We sent thousands of canteen workers, of Red Cross girls, of Y. M. C. A. girls, telephone girls, typists, stenographers; and be it said to the everlasting credit of the American manhood that wore the uniform of the United States soldier and as proof of the virtue of American women there is not on record in the War Department a single instance where an illegitimate child was born to one of those noble women. Ours are the most manly, the cleanest, the most virtuous people who ever fought for any cause in the history of the world. Yet with this demonstration of the strengthening of the physique, of the improvement of the morals and the protection of the country, the pacifists of this House would deny to the people of this country the privilege of training every young man in order that he might be a gentleman and a soldier in every sense of the word! It is a scandal and a shame that men should throw away an opportunity such as this.

What would be your fear? Would you be afraid of that bugaboo called militarism? Who are these militarists? Your son and my son. Am I afraid of my son because I give him a six-shooter and put it into his pocket? Will he not protect me rather than oppress me? If it is everybody's son, is not everybody protected? Is it because some people are so afraid of the negro? I lived in a neighborhood where the negroes outnumbered the white people ten to one. I was not afraid, going about singly, open-handed without any gun or ammunition. Why should I be afraid of him if he had a gun and I had one, too? If I train him, I train him in a white man's camp; I give him a white man's gun, and when he gets through with it I take it and put it in a white man's arsenal. And the white man is getting trained at the same time. Why should I be afraid of the trained negro without a gun when I have a trained white man with a gun to fight him whenever he is called upon to do it? It is an indictment of the southern people of this country to say that you refuse to train the youth of America because of the negro.

What else? Because it costs money? It costs $59 for every man who enlisted under the voluntary enlistment before the war. Under this bill you will have ten times the overhead charge, $30 a month for the cheapest man; and under this bill the private solder in many instances will draw more than $100 a month. Add up the expense, total it all, and you have an Army of 125,000 men costing you a half a billion dollars a year, and then on the other side figure the cost of equipment and clothes on the average to the man that you would get under universal training. Five dollars is his pay, and he will be well paid because of the training that he gets. Added together, when you do so, you will find that your universal training proposition will cost you less than any kind of a decent Regular Army will cost.

What is the excuse for this pigheadedness, this reactionary method the people here have shown? Ah, forsooth, you have heard some politician say that the Middle West is against it, and the Democrats want the Middle West and the Republicans want the Middle West, and both think they have it, too. But I want to tell you something as a man who has studied some politics in his life, and that is that politicians think they make the issue, politicians struggle to make the issue, but there has not been a campaign for the national election in my time in which any issue made by a politician was ever voted on by the people. The people make the issue, and, mark my words, between now and election day the people will make an issue in this election and there will be the biggest surprised bunch of people on both sides of this House you ever saw in your life. I would not be surprised but that every man, Democrat and Republican, who has a contest at the other end of the Capitol will be defeated. It does not make any difference which side they are on. The American people have made up their minds that they want things done and not talked about, and the man who is afraid to do things is the man who is going to be turned out. I assure you that when you are trying to play politics with the American defense you are playing with a two-edged sword, and that you will get it in a place where you are not looking for it, and that you will get it a plenty, too.

There are some other things about this bill that I want to talk about.

If there were any excuse for an Army reorganization bill, and there is, it would be the excuse that the country demands that at this time we take advantage of many of the lessons learned in this war. What are they?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 10 minutes more if the gentleman will give it to me. I think our side has about an hour to spare.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. DENT asked me to yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman from California give me 10 minutes?

Mr. KAHN. My time is pretty well allotted, but I yield the gentleman five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. What are they? We had hard and fast rules passed by the Congress of the United States when we got into war so that we could not function in our military matters that were required. Did we require them to pass any further hard and fast rules binding the War Department and the President of the United States and the Army? No. Legislation was passed, originating in another body at the other end of the Capitol, known as the Overman Act. Under it a great many mistakes were made. But they got results, and I want to say to this House and to the people of this country that I am willing to forgive the President and the War Department and the Army and every man in America for the mistakes that were made because of the great victory that we accomplished notwithstanding the cost. [Applause.] Now, one of the things they found to be the greatest handicap that the country had was transportation, transportation of the Army, transportation of the supplies, transportation of its matériel, and under the archaic system of handling those things through the Quartermaster Corps there was congestion at the factory, there was congestion on the railroads, there was congestion at the port of debarkation, there was congestion in the ships, there was congestion over on the other side, and congestion all the way to the front, and then we created new corps to take care of that situation. Then the line straightened out. The material that was made in the factory found its way rapidly across the sea to the soldiers in the trenches. What do you do in this bill? Do you take advantage of that lesson? Have you any desire to avoid such a catastrophe in the next war as we had in the beginning of this one? Has the Republican Party learned anything by the Great War in the matter of the transportation of material and troops? Is there anything in this bill carrying out that idea? No.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman was a member of the subcommittee that drew the first draft of this bill, was he not?

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, yes; the gentleman is perfectly familiar with it; but the gentleman voted against reporting out this bill, too, and he voted for universal training, too. Will the gentleman say the same thing? Does the gentleman say he voted for universal training?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. CALDWELL. All right. Under a resolution which was passed in the committee, no member of the committee is authorized to say how anybody else voted on any subject in this bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I voted for universal training, and then when the leadership of the House determined that it were best not to bring it up in this bill the gentleman from California voted to take it up as a separate measure.

Mr. CALDWELL. Not to have it in this bill?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is all I want.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FISHER. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five additional minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to go on and discuss some other features of this bill, but to do so would take more than five minutes. Suffice it to say, gentlemen, that I do not believe that there are very many things in this bill that would meet with my hearty approval. There is one thing——

Mr. KAHN rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. Excuse me. I have only five minutes. There is one thing, however, in the bill that does meet with my approval, and I hope that part of the bill will be adopted. That is the proposition of promotion from a single list. I think that is a very large advance, and I think it is a thing that should have been done a long time ago. I was in favor of it at the time the Hay bill was passed; and I believe if the Hay bill had carried a provision of that kind we would have saved to the men who went across the sea to defend the country in this Great War a great many heartburnings that they suffered there on account of the promotion by selection that was adopted in this war. So under these circumstances I can give my indorsement to that provision of the bill; but there is little else in this bill, which is not an Army reorganization bill; it is simply a bill to destroy the effectiveness of the Hay bill, and I therefore am against the bill, and I hope it does not pass.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when this bill comes before the House for action to-morrow or the day after I expect to offer as an amendment, line 13, section 8, page 16 of the bill, House bill 367, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, which is the so-called Chamberlain-Johnson court-martial bill, introduced in the Senate by the Senator from Oregon and by myself in the House. Undoubtedly at that time anybody who is opposed to any court-martial reform, or at least opposed to it at this time, will make the point of order that the section is not germane to the bill. I simply mention that because if at that time the ruling is adverse—and I am willing to concede that the Chairman, who is one of the greatest Chairmen we have ever had in this body and one of the fairest, may, in following the strict precedents, be forced to hold the point of order good—it will be necessary to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Because of the fact that it is the only opportunity that Congress will have for a long time, or has had since the war, to secure any court-martial reform, I am compelled to take this action. If I thought there was the slightest opportunity that any committee would give this matter consideration I should not try to force it on this bill at this particular time. Notice has been served on me by the War Department and the General

Staff, and by the high and mighty Members of the House connected with the General Staff, that there was never going to be any consideration of this court-martial bill. Unless we take this procedure, which I concede is not the orderly procedure that ought to be followed in the House, we are going to have an army organization measure which makes six or seven major generals, makes much other rank, and does not do one thing for court-martial reform or military justice. I do not believe that this House or the Republican majority in this House can take the attitude that we are going to wait here for a year and a half to pass out of committees all kinds of bills making major generals and lieutenant generals, and other kinds of officers, without doing one thing for the enlisted men. And I am perfectly satisfied if there were some reform of the Articles of War by this committee of laws relating to military justice we would not have the situation as described by the gentleman from New York when he says you can not secure 2,000 men a week through the recruiting service. You will never be able to secure an army, and the General Staff will not be able to secure one, until we get away from the reactionary army attitude and give the ordinary civilian soldiers some of the things in the line of military justice which they think they ought to receive.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will yield for a question, but can not yield for a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman afraid he will get in bad with those "high and mighty Army officers" who are now listening to him from the gallery?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am frank to say that since December, 1918, I have not cared a continental about the General Staff of the Army or what any of them think of me, except as one man hopes to merit the opinion of another; but prior to that time I will say that I was very meek and very timid because of the Articles of War and the fact that we were in war, and because I knew that an ordinary man did not have any chance for trial and appeal; and I think the gentleman would have taken that same attitude had he been in my position.

Mr. BLANTON. I am with the gentleman in his proposed reform of court-martial proceedings.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The existing court-martial system is atrocious to the Prussian degree. It subjects every man in the Army to the whim, caprice, or ill will of officers. That is known to the junior officers of the Army. I think it is known by the General Staff. I think they would have been very happy to have given some measure of reform in the Articles of War and military justice if they had not gotten on the wrong side about a year ago and had been afraid all the time to admit they were wrong. Now, any officers may prefer a charge at will against any enlisted man. The record shows that 92 per cent of all charges preferred are tried and 89½ per cent of all men tried are convicted after a trial that would be a farce were it not a tragedy for its victim. This system does not design to grade offenses, but applies the harshest penalties without discrimination. The records show that for all offenses, including the most trivial, the average sentence to confinement was upward of seven years. Under such a lawless system proper regard for law and justice disappears, and instead we have the brutish barbarities that were inflicted upon our soldiers in the prison camps in France, and to a lesser degree here at home, barbarities that are admitted and conceded by the General Staff, by the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces. And to a lesser degree we had some of the same things at home. Now, the inevitable results of this law have humiliated us and shamed us before the world, and it is really time we ought to change the system, which has been handed down from the time the soldier was a slave and a serf, and do as France has done, as England has done, and as Italy has done.

I am going to take up the proposed revision which has been suggested by the Judge Advocate General. I do not think this has been called to the attention of the Members of the House. It is the Senate committee print of the Articles of War, printed for the use of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs of the Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, and it gives some of the ideas that the War Department itself now claims it desires to put into force and effect. Now, the Secretary of War, the General Staff, and the Judge Advocate General stood absolutely pat and held that the system was absolutely right, until very recently, when they have proposed these changes, and I want to call them to the attention of the gentlemen of the House, because I am not able in the time I have to read the things that should be read in order to give full information concerning this law. Anyone who wants to know the facts may read pages 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this Senate document, and he will find what the War Department claims their bill will do.

Now, they say to begin with, and this gives their idea of the court-martial proposition:

> The army that wins battles and perpetuates nations is a great machine in which every individual must perform his allotted task, else other units in the machine are put out of gear.

We all agree with them in that.

And then they say:

> With armies on the march or in battle, always in motion or preparing to move, meticulous fairness in collecting evidence is not always attainable, and if the army is to be efficient, it is of the utmost importance that other possible offenders be deterred.

In other words, they say of an army on the march, "You do not need to get the kind of evidence that will conclusively prove a man is guilty." They simply say, "To deter other offenders, you must try your man and convict him, whether he is guilty or not."

I think that is only a slip of the pen of the gentleman who wrote this. It is the old Prussian system that has broken down the Army. Many of us who want to get decent military training, although we come from a part of the country that does not want a great Army, know that the people are absolutely against anything savoring of militarism, and that we take our political life in our hands when we vote for such a law, for we know it will be condemned by the people, but this military autocracy believes that things ought to be done that civilians do not agree ought to be done. If they had horse sense, they would correct the Articles of War, and if they did not know the laws were all right, they would reform them. Unless they do, they can not get men to go into the Army, and an army can not be secured until some of the things are granted which the common, every-day civilians—4,000,000 of them who have seen service—think are needed.

Now, I want to mention another feature, and I must hasten along in the little time that I have. These gentlemen, who desire to stand by the old law, say:

> An appeal in courts-martial proceedings, in order to be compatible with military efficiency, must be heard and determined with a promptness which has proved unattainable in nonmilitary criminal procedure.

I can follow them in that. But then they add:

> To secure promptness it may be necessary in many cases to have the appellate tribunal function in the general vicinity of the operations of the Army; but the appellate tribunal, for the attainment of the purposes above stated, necessarily composed of military legal experts, must be free from any control of, or connection with, the organization which has conducted the proceedings to be reviewed.

I can not follow them because of their reversal in view.

A comparison of all the statements issued will show that which they have had in their mind. I know that my time is practically exhausted, and I shall have to take advantage of the leave to extend, but I want to call attention to just one thing more that I think is significant, to show what is in the minds of the men who are fighting this reform in the Articles of War. They say:

> In legislating in view of the experiences of the World War, it is necessary to take into consideration, and bear in mind, not only the experiences of our own Army but those of other armies as well. Our troops, fortunately, were never, in this war, faced with those conditions which most searchingly test the morale and discipline of an army. During the entire period while we were in the war our Army was inspired by its certainty of victory. We had no such experience as the British retreat from Mons, or as the French had before Verdun, or the Russians during the retreat of 1915.
> We can not be certain of immunity from such trying experiences in some future war, and prudence requires that the possibility of such emergencies be kept in mind in framing legislation for the Army.

That sounds to me as if the man who wrote that must have been about 4,000 miles from the front. [Laughter.]

Then they draw from that statement the deduction that in order to prepare for some supposititious war that we may have in the future, you must stay by this old system and allow it to function exactly as it did in this war.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEE. I wanted to ask the gentleman if, in the reform of courts-martial, he did not think that one reform ought to be the stopping of the practice of closing the doors against the defendant and his counsel during the time of the deliberation upon the evidence, or during the time, not of consultation on the verdict by the jury, but shutting the doors and putting his counsel and everybody else out while they deliberated whether a certain piece of evidence ought to be admitted or rejected?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman is a lawyer, and a good one, and he knows that that procedure would not be allowed to stand in any court that claims to deal out justice.

Mr. BEE. I have always thought that that part of the Articles of War ought to be changed.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The man who drew the proposed law for the Judge Advocate General reverses himself from the time that he said "This law is absolutely good," that "It ought not to be changed," that "It has functioned beautifully," and then names right there, on pages 3 and 4, 31 changes which he says we ought, perhaps, to put into force and effect. Number 3 says:

Under the proposed revision commanding officers will be brought more frequently into personal contact with alleged offenders.

That is what we have been urging from day to day and from week to week and from month to month. Again they say:

4. Disciplinary punishments, properly limited, are preferred to trial.
5. Neither trial nor punishment on trivial charges, no action by a court when disciplinary action is sufficient, no trial by either special or general court-martial when an inferior court can properly dispose of the case.

They say now they have written that into their bill. I can not help asking why in the world they could not let us write it into the bill a year ago, unless they are going to stand pat on the Prussian system and attempt to confuse us. That standing pat is the thing which has to-day gotten this Congress into a position where I doubt if you can pass an Army reorganization bill. That has caused a revulsion that has come from the citizen soldiery on account of the shortsightedness of the officers of the Army who stood pat a year ago. Now they are willing to give way a little here and there and crawl under our tent, so that they can prevent all the legislation which we want.

My time has expired, and I can only say that I hope you will vote with me to pass the court-martial law and Articles of War amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what good this committee or Members of the House expect to come from a 10-hour discussion of the great military reorganization bill in the presence of only 34 Members of Congress now present. I am not going to waste my breath talking to the usual attendance of 34 Members of Congress, as every one of us have already made up our minds, and after making a remark or two I am going to yield back some of my time and later extend my remarks in the RECORD under the privilege granted, and then discuss the bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not the time to yield. If the gentleman wants to question my statement as to the number of Members here, I will yield.

Mr. DENISON. I was just going to remind the gentleman of that passage of Scripture where it is stated that "where two or three are gathered together"——

Mr. BLANTON. I do not yield for that. We few here are the ones usually gathered together. In the last proposal by the gentleman who has just taken his seat, Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota, who saw distinguished service in the war, there should be added some provision that would prevent the General Staff from putting into effect any rules and regulations that prevent men in the service from bringing proper complaint of mistreatment to their Representatives. There is not a single Member of Congress who during the war did not at some time have complaints made to him; complaints of gross, cruel mistreatment concerning the most trivial affairs and charges where our constituents were subjected to the severest penalty for the most trivial departures from the rules of good conduct. There was a rule and regulation in force all during the war which prevented a private in the service from bringing any complaint to his Congressman or his Senator. If a man in the service is thus absolutely hog-tied, so that some petty officer over him could subject him to every kind of mistreatment, and he is prevented from bringing proper complaint to his Representative, it is a disgrace to the service. If he can not make proper complaint to his Representative, to whom can he go? I ask the Members of Congress that question. I know that a great majority of our officers are good men, men in the highest sense of of the word, who would not mistreat a man under them. But we have had numerous instances during the war where some little petty officer who was big with his own importance saw fit to maltreat and impose in an improper way upon men in the service. Ask the private who has come home from France how much love he has for his officer. In not very many cases you will find that they have a great regard for their officers; in some cases you will find that they have an actual hatred for the men who were over them in the war.

This would not interfere with proper discipline. I believe in proper discipline in the Army, in school, and everywhere else. But are you going to cut them off entirely from proper redress? We should put into this bill a provision which would prevent the General Staff from again putting into effect such a rule and regulation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON].

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a part of my remarks not on the bill, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that during a portion of his remarks he may proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, and I want simply to express here the fact that I am glad that the committee omitted the provision which it was at first thought would be included, the provision for compulsory universal military training. Without regard to the merits of that question, I think it would be unwise to enact it into legislation at this time. Therefore I am glad that this bill for the reorganization of the Army does not include a provision of that kind.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few observations of a general nature with reference to the attitude of the President toward Congress, as compared with the attitude of other Presidents who have preceded him, and what I think has been its influence and results in recent days.

Not many months ago—it was soon after the President went to Paris the second time, I think—I happened to read an article in one of the metropolitan magazines in which Mr. Wilson, George Washington, and President Lincoln were designated by the effervescent eulogist as the American triumvirate, the three great characters in American history. And even here in this Chamber I have heard partisan expressions of similar sentiments by those who would enhance the President's place in the world by such fulsome comparisons. Since then the scenes have shifted from Versailles to the great American forum, and things have happened here at home.

The light has been turned on; the American people have been aroused from the repose into which they had been lulled by reaction from the exertions of war and by the glittering profusion of presidential pronouncements that appealed to their craving for peace in the world.

We have learned the folly—the utter folly—of nominating men to the halls of fame, to the chamber of immortals, while they are yet living and moving and having their being here among common mortals.

In view of what has happened since the President first went to Paris—shades of our fathers—think of the comparison. I would not think of saying aught that was disrespectful of any man, much less of the President of my country. But think for a moment of associating now the name of Mr. Wilson with that of the honored Father of his Country and with that of him who saved it from dissolution and closed his career as a martyr to his own country's cause.

Such a comparison would arouse resentment were it not in fact so very amusing.

Why, every recorded act of Washington's life, every word he wrote, was devoted to the cause of political liberty and the establishment of a strong, just, and independent government in America that would secure the blessings of liberty to his countrymen and their posterity.

Lincoln's public life was wholly devoted to the cause of human liberty and the preservation of the Union as one Government, inseparable and free. Both were, above all, intensely American.

Through their lives and labors there was woven this sentiment, which should be engraven in the hearts of us all: America united and free, strong and just, friendly with but independent of all other nations.

He would be bold indeed who would now venture to assert what place history will assign to President Wilson.

My own opinion is that of him it will be said he devoted his greatest efforts, first, to the achievement of high political place for himself, and then, of course, to the realization of that elusive dream of the ages, the establishment of a superstate or world government, in which he would have his own country but one of the subordinate or constituent parts.

Washington and Lincoln were called to the Presidency by great events and issues in which they had themselves taken a controlling part.

But Mr. Wilson was made President by the three great colonels—Col. House, Col. Harvey, and Col. Bryan. Now two of them are apologizing for what they did, and the third would say even more, I suppose, if he had ever been known to say anything at all.

Washington accepted a second honor at the hands of his countrymen with reluctance. He longed for the shades of retirement and refused a third term as President.

Mr. Wilson was elected the first time by a division in the Republican Party, the second time on a false and deceptive issue of peace, and now wishes to break the last remaining precedent and unwritten law of the land by running for the Presidency the third time. Having twice reached the highest place within the gift of his own country and made himself, as he believes, dictator of its destiny, he has felt that his labors were too much encompassed; that his time and talents were too much limited by the affairs of his own country alone; that the voice of the world was calling him, and the heart of the world was wooing him to espouse its cause.

President Wilson himself brought on the great issue with which his name will be associated in history; brought it on by the prestige and the power of the high office with which he had twice been honored by the American people. He took up the Old World dream of a League of Nations, a dream that has found expression in various proposed plans after every war that has been fought in the last 500 years. And having found fertile soil for his plans with the war-weary and willing nations of Europe, he has refused to let his own country have peace unless it accept without amendment this proposed league, which he thinks will bring about the federation of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, the fathers were surely inspired with wisdom when they provided in the Constitution that the President could make no treaty with a foreign nation without the advice and consent of the Senate. The Senators have brought upon themselves the anger of the throne and the criticism of the internationalist press and propagandists; but they have surrounded the league covenant with such reservations as will Americanize it and save our sovereignty and independence and preserve our domestic affairs and our traditional policies from the interference of other nations.

Those who still love our flag above all others, and who still believe in the great principles and policies of government that have made our Nation great, shudder to think what would have happened under the leadership of the President had his power not been limited by this wise provision in the Constitution, or even had his interpretation of it as a mere right of formal ratification been acquiesced in by the Senate.

The American people have yet to be heard from. They will speak in no uncertain terms when the policy of the President to surrender those wise precepts of all the Presidents who have gone before him and entangle our destiny with the destinies of Europe, are presented to them for decision. And in my humble judgment those who hereafter may have occasion to compare President Wilson with Washington and Lincoln will do so perhaps in the same spirit in which a certain Irishman told another Irishman that he reminded him of Grover Cleveland; that was because he was so different from him.

One of the most interesting and most significant occasions I have witnessed since I became a Member was the reading of Washington's Farewell Address in this Chamber on the recent anniversary of his birth. Heretofore this ceremony has been observed in a sort of dignified but perfunctory way; but this year the wise warnings of Washington seemed to have new life breathed into them. They seemed to have been written with true prophetic vision for this day of our history. They fell, too, upon responsive ears in this Chamber, for many times during the reading of the address the more pertinent parts were received with cheers and applause.

Was it not as significant as it was remarkable that the following warning written by Washington 124 years ago should have been received by the Members rising in their places and cheering as though Washington, living again, was addressing them.

Let me quote what he said:

> The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith: Here let us stop.
> Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.
> Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.
> Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?
> It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

That, Mr. Chairman, by common consent has been the covenant of our foreign policy from the days of Washington until the days of Wilson. It is a remarkable fact, it seems to me, that every American statesman from that day until this who has deserved the name of statesman has declared his allegiance to that policy. It has been the basis of our happiness as a people and of our greatness as a nation.

And he does not understand the temper of the American people who did not see significance in the action of the great majority of the Members of this House rising and greeting with applause and approval the reading of those words from Washington.

And yet there were some few on the Democratic side who on that occasion settled down in their seats and sat mute and immovable when this part of Washington's Address was read.

Why was it so? Can it be possible that there are those among our Democratic colleagues who do not approve this warning of Washington as to our foreign policy through fear of presidential disfavor? Can it be that there are Democrats here who, to please the afflicted man in the White House, withhold their approval of this warning from our first President that has been the corner stone of our foreign policy for more than an hundred years?

Washington was not a Republican, nor was he a Democrat. He was an American; and the message he gave us in his Farewell Address was a message of Americanism, which none of us, whatever may be our political inclinations, can afford to disregard.

I have said all of our statesmen, from Washington to Wilson, have accepted this message of Washington as the true American policy.

Jefferson, the most voluminous writer of all our statesmen, declared time and again his allegiance to the foreign policy thus stated by Washington. Likewise Webster and that great Democrat, President Jackson.

And President Lincoln, in his second message to Congress, said.

> In this unusual agitation we have forborne from taking part in any controversy between foreign States, and between parties or factions in such States. We have attempted no propagandism and acknowledged no revolution. But we have left to each nation the exclusive conduct and management of its own affairs.

President Grant, in his second message to Congress, said:

> We are asked by the new Government to use our offices, jointly, with those of European powers in the interests of peace. Answer was made that the established policy and true interests of the United States forbade them to interfere in European questions jointly with European powers.

In 1884 James G. Blaine made this declaration and had it put in the Republican national platform:

> The Republican Party favors a policy which shall keep us from entangling alliances with foreign nations, and which gives us the right to exact that foreign nations shall refrain from meddling in American affairs. * * *

In his first inaugural address, President McKinley said:

> We have cherished the policy of noninterference with the affairs of foreign Governments, wisely inaugurated by Washington, keeping ourselves free from entanglement, either as allies or foes, content to leave undisturbed with them the settlement of their own concerns.

I could, if I had the time, quote similar sentiments from President Cleveland and others, but why do so when all are alike?

No American President, nor any American statesman, ever dared to advocate throwing overboard this compass, given to us by Washington, which has guided our Nation safely from all the broils and entanglements of Europe, until President Wilson, who, obsessed with the belief that he has been called to lead the world, has declared that there must be a new order of things; that the policy of Washington and the other fathers must be discarded, and that we must join with other nations in a federation of the world.

In his great speech at the New York State convention recently Elihu Root declared that one of the most important issues of the next national campaign and one of the most important purposes of the Republican Party would be to get rid of the dictatorship at Washington.

No one can doubt, Mr. Chairman, that since his first inauguration President Wilson has been asserting with more and more persistence his right of absolute authority and domination not only in the affairs of his own party but in the various functions of government. Nor is there any doubt that during his second term, and particularly since we entered the war, there has been established here a practical dictatorship. This has been due to two distinct causes—the necessities of war and the personal views of President Wilson himself. We all recognize the necessity for the concentration of power in the Chief Executive during war. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and being charged by law with the duty of prosecuting the war, and being held responsible for the successful performance of that duty, he must of necessity be given unusual powers while that emergency exists.

But those who attribute the present dictatorship of our Chief Executive to the necessities of war alone but half understand the situation. Those who have read President Wilson's lectures, his writings, and his speeches, and who are familiar with the political views he has always entertained, will well understand the attitude of the President throughout his entire tenure of high office in assuming a dominating and dictatorial power over Congress and all other branches of the Government.

I have had occasion recently to read again his earliest writings and his later lectures delivered before he entered the political arena. I must confess I was surprised to learn his views and get his estimates of Congress and the Presidency. Time and again in his earlier writings he expresses a sort of contempt for Congress. For instance, in one of his early essays, when he was still a young man, he used this expression:

> Only a single glance is necessary to discover how utterly committee government must fail to give effect to public opinion. In the first place, the exclusion of debate prevents the intelligent formation of opinion on the part of the Nation at large; in the second place, public opinion, when once formed, finds it impossible to exercise any immediate control over the action of its representatives. There is no one in Congress to speak for the Nation. Congress is a conglomeration of inharmonious elements; a collection of men representing each his neighborhood, each his local interest; an alarmingly large proportion of its legislation is "special"; all of it is at best only a limping compromise between the conflicting interests of the innumerable localities represented. There is no guiding or harmonizing power. Are the people in favor of a particular policy—what means have they of forcing it upon the sovereign legislature at Washington? None but the most imperfect. If they return representatives who favor it (and this is the most they can do), these representatives being under no directing power will find a mutual agreement impracticable among so many and will finally settle upon some policy which satisfies nobody, removes no difficulty, and makes little definite or valuable provison for the future.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENISON. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does the gentleman from Illinois think it exactly fair to wait until everybody has exhausted his time on the Democratic side and then make a speech out of order along this line?

Mr. DENISON. I was not aware that everybody had exhausted his time on the Democratic side.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that I have 71 minutes remaining.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then I beg pardon of the gentleman from Illinois. I was misinformed, as I understood all the time had been consumed.

Mr. DENISON. On the other hand, the President has always had an exaggerated and imperial idea of the office of President. He has believed that the President is the only real representative of the people in our Government. Let me quote from his book on "Constitutional Government in the United States." He says:

> Members of the House and Senate are representatives of localities, are voted for only by sections of voters or by local bodies of electors, like the members of the State legislatures. There is no national party choice except that of President. No one else represents the people as a whole, exercising a national choice; and inasmuch as his strictly executive duties are in fact subordinated, so far at any rate as all detail is concerned, the President represents not so much the party's governing efficiency as its controlling ideals and principles. He is not so much part of its organization as its vital link of connection with the thinking nation. He can dominate his party by being spokesman for the real sentiment and purpose of the country, by giving direction to opinion, by giving the country at once the information and the statements of policy which will enable it to form its judgments alike of parties and of men.
> For he is also the political leader of the Nation, or has it in his choice to be. The Nation as a whole has chosen him and is conscious that it has no other political spokesman. His is the only national voice in affairs. Let him once win the admiration and confidence of the country, and no other single force can withstand him, no combination of forces will easily overpower him. His position takes the imagination of the country. He is the representative of no constituency, but of the whole people. When he speaks in his true character, he speaks for no special interest. If he rightly interpret the national thought and boldly insist upon it, he is irresistible, and the country never feels the zest of action so much as when its President is of such insight and caliber. Its instinct is for unified action, and it craves a single leader. It is for this reason that it will often prefer to choose a man rather than a party. A President whom it trusts can not only lead it, but form it to his own views. * * *
> The President may also, if he will, stand within the party counsels and use the advantage of his power and personal force to control its actual programs. He may be both the leader of his party and the leader of the Nation, or he may be one or the other. If he lead the Nation, his party can hardly resist him. His office is anything he has the sagacity and force to make it.

Again, he says in the same book:

> Some of our Presidents have deliberately held themselves off from using the full power they might legitimately have used, because of conscientious scruples, because they were more theorists than statesmen. They have held the strict literary theory of the Constitution, the Whig theory, the Newtonian theory, and have acted as if they thought that Pennsylvania Avenue should have been even longer than it is; that there should be no intimate communication of any kind between the Capitol and the White House; that the President as a man was no more at liberty to lead the Houses of Congress by persuasion than he was at liberty as President to dominate them by authority, supposing that he had, what he has not, authority enough to dominate them. But the makers of the Constitution were not enacting Whig theory, they were not making laws with the expectation that not the laws themselves, but their opinions, known by future historians to lie back of them, should govern the constitutional action of the country. They were statesmen, not pedants, and their laws are sufficient to keep us to the paths they set us upon. The President is at liberty, both in law and conscience, to be as big a man as he can. His capacity will set the limit; and if Congress be overborne by him it will be no fault of the makers of the Constitution, it will be from no lack of constitutional powers on its part, but only because the President has the Nation behind him and Congress has not.

Mr. CANNON. What is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. DENISON. From the President's book on Constitutional Government.

Mr. CANNON. By this President?

Mr. DENISON. Yes; our President, Mr. Wilson.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I regret exceedingly to make a point of order against the gentleman from Illinois; he is always so obliging and courteous; but what is the use of having a rule with a provision in it in regard to debate unless we are going to live up to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas may have been out of the Hall temporarily or not listening when permission was given by the committee for the gentleman from Illinois to proceed out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. That permission can not be given in violation of the rule that was adopted by the House, which controls this committee. I do not like to do it, but I will ask the gentleman if there is much more politics in his remarks?

Mr. DENISON. I am only quoting historical statements of the President.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the rest of the speech on the bill?

Mr. DENISON. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Some other time, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to hear the gentleman speak, but there is a rule passed by the House controlling this committee outside of which it can not go even by unanimous consent, and I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee has given consent for the gentleman from Illinois to speak out of order for a portion of the time allotted to him.

Mr. BLANTON. With 25 or 30 men here, when the House adopted the rule with 150.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to see the Chair make a ruling of that kind. I do not object to the gentleman from Illinois proceeding, but the committee is controlled by the rule. We can not change the conditions under which we sit, and I do not think the Chair wants to make a ruling of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The general rules of the House prescribe that when an amendment is offered debate shall be confined to that amendment, and yet it has become the confirmed practice of the Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent to allow Members to proceed out of order.

Mr. CARAWAY. With all deference to the Chair, I must dissent.

Mr. DENISON. Please indulge me while I read this additional passage:

> Our President must always henceforth be one of the great powers of the world whether he act greatly and wisely or not, and the best statesmen we can produce will be needed to fill the office of Secretary of State. We have but begun to see the presidential office in this light, but it is the light which will more and more beat upon it, and more and more determine its character and its effect upon the politics of the Nation. We can never hide our President again as a mere domestic officer. We can never again see him the mere executive he was in the thirties and forties. He must stand always at the front of our affairs, and the office will be as big and as influential as the man who occupies it.

Some day, if I may have the time, I want to read here Webster's reply to this theory, first advanced by President Jackson, that the President is the "representative of the whole people." With his unanswerable logic and his profound knowledge of the principles of our Constitution, he completely refuted the theory that the President is the representative as well as the Chief Executive of the whole people.

These views expressed so often by President Wilson thro much light upon his attitude toward Congress and explain h exaggerated ideas of his own place in the world and h assumption of authority to tell Congress what it must and must not do.

I have spoken of a comparison between President Wilson and Washington and Lincoln. Let me show briefly how some of our great statesmen considered their relations toward the Congress as compared with the views entertained by President Wilson.

In his Farewell Address to the Nation, Washington used these significant words, warning those who were to follow him of the dangers of encroachment by the President upon the proper powers of Congress:

It is important likewise that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Jefferson, the great Democrat, once wrote to Washington as follows:

As I never had the desire to influence the Members (of Congress), so neither had I any other means than my friendships, which I valued too highly to risk by usurpations on their freedom of judgment and the conscientious pursuit of their own sense of duty.

There has been saved to us at least one expression of Lincoln's views on the proper attitude of the President toward Congress. In a paper written to Gen. Taylor in 1848, when Lincoln was supporting Taylor as a candidate for President, he said:

Finally, were I President, I should desire the legislation of the country to rest with Congress, uninfluenced by the Executive, in its origin or progress, and undisturbed by the veto except in very special and clear cases.

In his great speech delivered in the Senate on "The Presidential Protest," Webster said:

Through all this history of the contest for liberty, Executive power has been regarded as a lion which must be caged. So far from being the object of enlightened popular trust, so far from being considered the natural protector of popular right, it has been dreaded, uniformly, always dreaded, as the great source of its danger.

Our security is in our watchfulness of Executive power. It was the Constitution of this department which was infinitely the most difficult part in the great work of creating our present Government. To give to the Executive department such power as should make it useful and yet not such as should render it dangerous; to make it efficient, independent, and strong, and yet to prevent it from sweeping away everything by its union of military and civil authority, by the influence of patronage, and office, and favor—this, indeed, was difficult. They who had the work to do saw the difficulty, and we see it; and if we would maintain our system, we shall act wisely to that end, by preserving every restraint and every guard which the Constitution has provided. And when we, and those who come after us, have done all that we can do, and all that they can do, it will be well for us and for them, if some popular Executive, by the power of patronage and party, and the power, too, of that very popularity, shall not hereafter prove an overmatch for all other branches of the Government.

In harmony with President Wilson's views as to the power of his office and his right to control the deliberations of Congress, he has even attempted by the use of his personal and official influence to interfere in elections and dictate who should and should not be elected to the House and Senate in several instances which, of course, are well known to us all.

No greater danger can threaten our Republic than for the President to use the great power of his office to fill Congress with his fawning favorites or to destroy those who dare to differ with him.

President Buchanan tried to do the same thing. He was dissatisfied with the way Senator Stephen A. Douglas had voted on some measure in the Senate, and in 1848, when Douglas was a candidate for reelection, the President interposed and tried to defeat him. In one of his great debates with Lincoln, delivered at Alton, Ill., Senator Douglas made the following forceful statement, which ought to commend itself forcefully to us all:

And now this warfare is made on me because I would not surrender my conviction of duty, because I would not abandon my constituency, and receive the orders of the executive authorities how I should vote in the Senate of the United States.

I hold that an attempt to control the Senate on the part of the Executive is subversive of the principles of our Constitution. The executive department is independent of the Senate and the Senate is independent of the President. In matters of legislation the President has a veto on the action of the Senate, and in appointments and treaties the Senate has a veto on the action of the President. He has no more right to tell me how I shall vote on his appointments than I have to tell him whether he shall veto or approve a bill that the Senate has passed. Whenever you recognize the right of the Executive to say to a Senator, "Do this or I will take off the heads of your friends," you convert this Government from a Republic into a despotism. Whenever you recognize the right of a President to say to a Member of Congress, "Vote as I tell you or I will bring a power to bear against you at home which will crush you," you destroy the independence of the Representative and convert him into a tool of Executive power.

To these expressions, Mr. Chairman, from our greatest Presidents and from some of our greatest statesmen, might be added many more of like character from others whom we have been taught to honor and respect, all showing that from our first President until our last one, with the possible exception of Andrew Jackson, no President has asserted this predominating power of the President under our Constitution, nor has any, with the exception above named, claimed and exercised the right to interfere with the deliberations of Congress and dictate what legislation should or should not be considered or passed.

It remained for Mr. Wilson to throw these views of our former statesmen into the discard, to proclaim with a sort of pride his contempt for the precedents of his predecessors, to disregard the checks and balances between the constitutional functions of the executive and legislative departments of our Government, and to encroach upon the constitutional rights and privileges of the Congress by using his personal and political influence and the prestige of his high office to control, coerce, or intimidate Members in the discharge of their duties.

But President Wilson has only been putting into practice the views he expressed in his book on "Constitutional Government." He stated then and he believes now that—

The Nation as a whole has chosen the President and is conscious that it has no other political spokesman. His is the only national choice in affairs. Let him once win the admiration and confidence of the country and no single force can withstand him; no combination of forces will easily overpower him.

He stated then and he evidently believes now that—

The President whom the Nation trusts can not only lead it but form it to his own views. * * * He may be both the leader of his party and the leader of the Nation, or he may be one or the other. If he lead the Nation, his party can hardly resist him. His office is anything he has the sagacity and the force to make it.

Now, I think the time has come when the American people ought to know the facts. They ought to be fully informed as to how this new doctrine of the President, this doctrine by which he believes himself and not the Congress to represent the people, this doctrine by which he believes he has the right to interfere with the constitutional prerogatives of the Congress and tell them what they should or should not do, has led to unfortunate results and has cost the people fabulous millions in waste and ineffective expenditures of the public funds during the prosecution of the war.

Early in 1917, after our country entered the war, many of us knew that the expenditures necessary for the prosecution of the war would run into many billions of dollars, but few of us realized that there would be required the staggering amounts that were afterwards appropriated. Wisdom and common sense suggested that Congress should be kept informed and should have at least some supervision over this vast expenditure of money.

On April 9, 1917, Senator Weeks, of Massachusetts, introduced in the Senate, and my colleague, Mr. MADDEN, introduced in the House a joint resolution providing for the appointment of a joint committee of the House and Senate on war expenditures. At that time both the House and the Senate were in control of the Democratic Party. This committee on war expenditures was to be wholly nonpartisan and to consist of a majority of Democrats to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, and was to advise and counsel with the President, if their advice and counsel was desired by him, and with the heads of the departments that were to expend the vast appropriations. But the Democratic majority in the Senate would not allow the Weeks resolution to come to a vote in the Senate, nor would the majority in the House allow the Madden resolution to come to a vote in the House.

On July 21, 1917, Senator Weeks offered his resolution as an amendment to the Lever food-control act, then under consideration in the Senate, and Senator OWEN, of Oklahoma, offered a substitute in the following language:

SEC. 23. A joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be appointed, composed of five Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and two Republicans, and five Members of the House of Representatives, including three Democrats and two Republicans, to be known as "the joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war."

It shall be the duty of said committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive departments, and it shall be the duty of the executive departments, on request, to keep said committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.

Such committee shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war, with a view to safeguarding expenditures, and shall report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion, or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress.

The membership of such committee shall be designated by the respective committees of the Senate and House which select the members of the regular standing committees.

Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise, and to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary; and to pay the necessary expenses of such committee there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

This substitute offered by a Democratic Senator was entirely satisfactory to Senator Weeks, and was accepted by him. The question came to a vote in the Senate, and was carried by a vote of 53 to 31. The food-control act with this amendment to it then went to conference, and while in conference the President decided that it was time to exert his influence on the proposed legislation and prevent the appointment of this joint committee on war expenditures.

He accordingly addressed a letter to the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Lever, chairman of the conferees on the part of the House, in which he said among other things:

Section 23, if enacted into law, would render my task in conducting the war practically impossible. * * * The constant supervision of executive action which it admits amounts to nothing less than an assumption on the part of the legislative body of the executive work of the administration. * * * I sincerely hope that upon consideration of this matter both Houses of Congress will see that my objections rest upon indisputable grounds, and I could only interpret the final adoption of section 23 as arising from lack of confidence in myself.

This letter was that day published in all of the papers throughout the country, and all of the power and prestige of the President was brought to bear to influence and compel the conferees to strike that provision from the bill and to prevent Congress from enacting it into law.

The provision for the appointment of this committee was accordingly stricken out of the bill in conference. And when the bill was returned to the Senate a number of Senators opposed its final passage because the provision for the appointment of the joint committee on war expenditures had been stricken from it.

Among those who spoke on this subject on that occasion was Senator Hardwick, of Georgia. In his speech, delivered on August 6, 1917, the Senator from Georgia rose to the stature of the great statesmen of our earlier days. Among other things, he said:

But how on earth anybody could object to Congress appointing a joint committee to go over the expenditures, to see as far as we can how the money that we appropriate is spent, and to see that it should be spent in no other way except as the law provides, and economically spent—I say, how anyone anywhere could oppose any such proposition is beyond my comprehension.

It seems to me that any President of the United States would be more than glad to share responsibility of this kind with a joint committee of Congress. It seems to me that any executive of any country on this earth, carrying the awful load of responsibility in respect to matters of this kind that the Executive must carry, and carrying it as he must, with the aid of hundreds and thousands of men whom he must appoint to help exercise the Executive authority, would be glad to have Congress look into these expenditures and do all it can to keep everything right and straight.

So I can not understand the opposition to the appointment of a joint congressional committee, whose functions shall be limited entirely and solely to the expenditures of the money that Congress has appropriated. I can not see why the conferees should have found it necessary to again abandon the position that the Senate had taken by an overwhelming vote.

And again, upon being interrupted by Senator GORE with a statement of certain facts, the Senator from Georgia said:

Mr. President, the Senator from Oklahoma might specify, I presume, to even a greater extent than he has done. His specification is but an illustration, and a very brilliant one, too, of the necessity for this committee. What amazes me beyond comprehension is how any Executive can object to it. Prying around! They had better want somebody to pry around before the lid blows off. Snoop about! Every friend of the President of the United States in this Chamber and in this land had better pray that he may have all the assistance that it is possible for him to have from every honorable source to keep these expenditures down to an honest and legitimate basis, to keep down grafting and stealing. I say that we have fallen upon evil days, and the Congress of the United States has sunk to a low estate if we can not claim the right to see how the money which we appropriate is being spent, and whether or not it is being honestly spent, without being charged with being Paul Prys and snoopers.

But the country was at war; the President used his influence and dictated to the Senate, and the food-control act, without the provision for the appointment of this joint committee, was passed by the Senate.

When it was called up for consideration in the House, the Republicans, under the leadership of my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the present Speaker [Mr. GILLETT] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] and others, endeavored in every way known to parliamentary practice to get a separate vote upon the Senate amendment providing for the appointment of this committee. But the Democratic majority, under the leadership of Mr. Lever, and aided by the best parliamentarians on that side of the House, prevented the question from being submitted to the House for a separate vote, and the House was compelled to bow to the will of the President and his followers in the House and pass the bill with the provision for the appointment of this joint committee on war expenditures omitted from it.

Afterwards, as the appropriations for war expenditures mounted higher and higher and rumors of wastefulness and graft and improvident expenditures of the public funds began to be reported in the public press and known to all of us, the Republicans in the House on numerous occasions offered amendments to various bond bills and revenue bills reported by the Ways and Means Committee providing for the appointment of a joint committee on war expenditures.

I find in looking through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of those days that on one occasion such an amendment was offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

On another occasion, on September 5, 1917, a similar amendment was offered by the present Speaker [Mr. GILLETT]. And on the same day still another similar amendment was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Moore.

On each occasion points of order on technical grounds were made against the amendment by Democratic Members of the House and sustained.

Very able arguments for the appointment of such a committee in the interest of the Public Treasury were made on these occasions by Mr. GILLETT, Mr. Moore, by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], and by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and by others.

The House and the country were warned time and again that the public funds were being wasted; that the money appropriated for the urgent necessities of the war was being invested in wild and visionary schemes which would accomplish no results in the prosecution of this war.

But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and others on the Democratic side, skilled parliamentarians all of them, were ever on hand to prevent the question from being submitted to the House for a vote by making points of order on every such proposal.

So that, Mr. Chairman, every effort made by the Republican side of the House to secure the appointment of a joint committee on war expenditures was skillfully defeated by our Democratic colleagues, acting under the whip and the dominating power of the President, and we were never even allowed an opportunity to go on record with a vote upon the proposition.

I do not think anyone doubts that if the President had not interfered, if he had not used the power and prestige of his high office as well as his personal influence to prevent the appointment of this committee, it would have been appointed with little, if any, opposition in either House of Congress; and, being composed of the majority of the President's own party, it would have cooperated with the President and with the heads of the departments in the vast expenditures appropriated by Congress, and billions of dollars of the people's money might have been saved.

Now, what was the result of this encroachment of the President upon the prerogatives of the House? Of the Democratic Senators who voted for the appointment of this Joint Committee on Expenditures, but two, as I am informed—the Senator from Georgia, Mr. Hardwick, and the Senator from Mississippi, Mr. Vardaman—have been up for reelection. And in each case the President intervened with all of the powerful influence of the Chief Executive and successfully helped to bring about their defeat for reelection. On the other hand, the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. Lever, to whom the President addressed his letter of protest and who successfully maneuvered the bill so that the House could have no opportunity to express its view upon this important question, has since then been elevated by the President by an appointment to the National Farm Loan Board.

The country must well know, and I presume our Democratic friends will not deny it, that the responsibility for the defeat of this proposal for a joint committee of Congress to supervise war contracts and expenditures was defeated by the influence of the President, aided by the members of the Democratic Party, who had control of the House and Senate and were willing to surrender their judgment and their prerogatives to his dictation.

Well, war expenditures mounted higher and higher as time passed and the country does not yet realize the staggering amounts that Congress has appropriated for the prosecution of the war. Still less does the country realize the immense sums that have been wasted and fraudulently and ineffectively expended through mismanagement and incompetency and dishonesty on the part of those charged with that responsibility.

The total appropriations by Congress for the fiscal years 1917 to 1920 were as follows:

1919	27,092,094,720.75
Total	54,948,063,892.93

The above amount of appropriations for the year 1920 must be increased by $125,000,000, which have been appropriated in two deficiency bills that have been passed since the present session of Congress began, and by $200,000,000, which was carried in the railroad bill recently passed. These amounts added to the total appropriation of $54,948,063,892.93 makes total appropriations for the years 1917 to 1920, up to this time, amount to $55,273,063,892.93. It is almost impossible to comprehend these figures. When we remember that the total amount appropriated and spent by our Government from the beginning of Washington's administration in 1789 up to our entry in the World War on April 6, 1917, was approximately only $40,000,000,000, we can appreciate the staggering amounts that have had to be appropriated by Congress and disbursed by the various executive branches of the Government since we entered the war.

Of course, we have not expended all of the amount that has been appropriated. I am advised by the Treasury Department that from April 6, 1917, to February 29, 1920, there has been actually paid out of the Treasury by the various executive branches of the Government the sum of $36,918,000,000.

Secretary GLASS has stated in a letter addressed to the House Committee on Ways and Means that the amount of expenditures that may properly be attributed to the war can be properly ascertained by deducting from the total expenditures made during the period of the war the approximate amount that would have been required to pay the legitimate Government expenditures if we had not been in war. The very best estimate of normal Government expenditures during this period, if we had not been in the war, is $1,000,000,000 a year, or eighty-three and one-third million dollars per month. Deducting, therefore, from the $36,918,000,000, the amount that has been actually disbursed from the Public Treasury since we entered the war a sum equal to eighty-three and one-third million dollars per month, which would have been required for Government expenditures had we not been engaged in war, there is left the total sum of approximately $34,000,000,000, which represents the actual expenditures from the Public Treasury for actual war purposes between April 6, 1917, when we entered the war, and January 29, 1920.

From April 6, 1917, up to February 29, 1920, we have collected by taxes from the people the sum of $13,099,000,000 and we have borrowed from the people the sum of approximately $24,000,000,000 by the issuance and sale of bonds.

When we stop to think that the making of war contracts, the purchasing of supplies, and the execution of all other necessary transactions required for the expenditure of this vast sum of $34,000,000,000 has been in the hands of men many of whom have been educated and trained for military and naval service and have had no business experience whatever, many of whom have been working all their lives on salaries and are inexperienced in the transaction of large affairs, it is inconceivable, it is appalling, to think that the President could have been unwilling for a committee of Congress, composed of able and experienced public men elected by the people, and a majority of whom would have been of the President's own political party, to advise and counsel with those who were to expend these vast amounts of the public funds and keep themselves informed and report to the Congress from time to time the manner in which such funds were being expended. Instead of objecting to the appointment of such a committee, the President should have welcomed it. Had he been a man less impressed with his own place and power, less swayed by what he thought to be his own destiny, he would have welcomed the opportunity of having an able committee of Congress share with him this great responsibility.

But the President said that he could only interpret the appointment of such a committee as arising from a lack of confidence in himself. And the Democratic majority of Congress, under the dictation and personal influence of the President, showed its confidence in the President by allowing him to have absolutely his own way and letting his appointees spend the people's money without check or supervision or accounting. And what has been the result? The very thing that was predicted by Senator Weeks and by Senator Hardwick and by various Members of the House has happened. There has been an orgy of waste, of extravagance, of dishonesty, of fraud in the disbursement of these billions taken by taxes and borrowed from the people, that not only surpasses anything ever recorded in the history of any Government, but exceeds the wildest stretches of the imagination.

Since the war has ended and Congress has passed under the control of the Republican Party, of course special committees on war expenditures have been appointed and, since the beginning of this Congress last spring, have been engaged in investigating this waste and the looting of the Public Treasury. And when their investigations are completed and the results are fully disclosed to the American people there will be a political, if not an actual, revolution.

Mr. Chairman, I am advised by the members of these investigating committees that there has been expended during the war period by the War Department alone approximately $18,000,000,000. And of this amount practically $9,000,000,000 has been wasted, lost, or foolishly expended on projects that were wholly useless and ineffective in the prosecution of the war.

For instance, the War Department expended approximately $150,000,000 in the construction of port terminals at Charleston, Norfolk, Boston, and other places, and not one dollar of this expenditure aided us in the prosecution of the war, because not one ship sailed from the terminals that were constructed from these funds.

The investigation has disclosed that $20,000,000 was expended in the construction of a port terminal in a bog and swamp 10 miles up the river from Charleston, S. C., and after that amount was expended in the construction of the terminal it could not be reached by ships until the river was dredged for that purpose.

The War Department expended approximately $120,000,000 in the construction of nitrate plants, and yet not a pound of nitrate from these plants was used in the prosecution of the war.

Practically $100,000,000 of this amount was expended at Muscle Shoals and Sheffield, Ala., and every dollar of that amount was lost so far as the prosecution of this war was concerned, and now the War Department wants additional appropriations in order to complete those plants to be used for the manufacture of fertilizer.

The War Department expended approximately $160,000,000 on the construction of powder plants, and not a pound of powder manufactured by the Government at these plants was used in the war. Over $70,000,000 was expended on the powder plant at Nitro, W. Va., and recently the entire plant was sold for something over $8,000,000, and the probability is that the Government will never get very much of the $8,000,000.

We expended approximately $1,000,000,000 on shells, and yet only 17,000 American shells were fired by the American forces during the war. The insignificance of 17,000 shells is realized when we are informed that frequently the American forces fired a half million shells on a single morning barrage.

We expended approximately $1,051,000,000 in preparation for the manufacture of aeroplanes, and yet we did not produce a single fighting plane. We did not produce a purely bombing plane. We only produced and sent to the front in France 213 observation planes, which might be used for light day bombing.

We spent approximately $100,000,000 in the manufacture of American tanks, and yet the first American tank did not reach France until the 20th of November, after the armistice was signed.

We spent approximately $117,000,000 in the manufacture of gas, and there was never a pound of gas fired on the battle front in American shells.

We expended approximately $478,000,000 in the manufacture of guns, and we only succeeded in getting forty-eight 4.7-inch guns and twenty-four 8-inch howitzers, or a total of 72 American guns, to the battle front.

Similar illustrations of waste and ineffective expenditures could be recited ad nauseam if one but had the time.

When these investigations have been completed, when the light of truth has been turned on them, it will be found that at least half of the $18,000,000,000 expended by the War Department has been either wasted or unwisely and ineffectively expended.

And the same is true at least to some extent in the Navy Department. I am informed that the War and Navy Departments have expended nearly $250,000,000 within a radius of 25 miles of Norfolk, Va., in the construction of cantonments, warehouses, and training stations; and it is now ascertained that it is impossible to get sufficient water there to supply the necessities of those plants. The Navy Department expended $7,000,000 on a naval training camp in a swamp near Norfolk after the armistice was signed and the war was over; and every dollar of it will be lost.

It is inconceivable that such an orgy of wasteful and unwise expenditures could have been possible if there had been a committee of Congressmen and Senators actively engaged during the war period in scrutinizing contracts and advising with the heads of the departments and reporting all such contracts and expenditures to the President and the Congress. It would have been wiser to have had a proper committee to prevent, if possible, the waste of public money than to have the committees we now have investigating the waste after the money has been lost.

The people may as well understand who is responsible for the awful conditions which these investigations are disclosing. When the Republicans wanted the congressional committee to prevent it as far as possible, the President said it would show a lack of confidence in him, and the Democratic majority said it was nothing but partisan politics.

And now, when the public money has been wasted and the Treasury has been looted by methods compared with which the practices of the James brothers, Cole Younger and his gang, and the Daltons of pioneer days seem tame and uninteresting; now when the investigating committees are investigating and reporting these appalling facts to the people, our Democratic friends here are shouting and protesting that it is nothing but partisan politics to discredit the President and the Secretary of War.

Last Friday, when arrangements were made for a report from the subcommittee investigating the expenditures on aviation, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made vigorous attacks on the Republican majority for what they claim was an attempt to discredit the President.

But that will not work. The people know very well that such attacks are all staged. Let us be honest and let the people understand that the ablest and most eloquent Members among our Democratic colleagues will, as a matter of course, make denunciatory speeches and throw out a regular smoke screen to conceal the facts from the people whenever any of the subcommittees investigating war expenditures make their reports and expose the reeking rottenness and wanton waste of the War Department in expending the public funds.

I charge that the waste and ineffective investments of such a considerable part of the $34,000,000,000 of war expenditures has been due largely to the autocratic and dictatorial encroachment by the President on the constitutional privileges of Congress and the servile submission of the Democratic majority in the House, which together prevented any action being taken to prevent or at least lessen the probability of such waste.

But, as I have shown, this autocratic attitude of the President toward Congress is his deliberate view of the prerogatives of his position in the world.

For has he not said in his work on "Constitutional Government":

> His is the only national voice in affairs. Let him once win the admiration and confidence of the country and no single force can withstand him.

Has he not said in the same book:

> The President can never again be the mere domestic figure he has been throughout so large a part of our history. * * * Our President must always henceforth be one of the great powers of the world, whether he act greatly and wisely or not. * * *

And the people will soon understand, if indeed they do not now know it, that the President's autocratic attitude toward the Senate is responsible for the fact that peace has not been made with our enemies and we are still where we were a year and a half ago. The President appointed himself practically the sole commissioner from this country to the peace conference. He arranged for the constitution of the League of Nations in the proposed treaty of peace without consultation or advice with the Senate and submitted it upon his return to this country with the ultimatum that it must be accepted without change if the country would have peace.

This again is but in harmony with the President's view that he is a world figure to whose views all others must give way.

When President Wilson delivered his first war message to Congress, he thought that the force of his phrases would so shake the German Empire as to cause them to ask for peace.

In his subsequent address to Congress the President sought to distinguish between the German Government and the German people, excoriating the former and cajoling the latter, and believed again that the force of his phrases would cause the German people to overthrow their Government, organize a republic, and ask for peace.

Again in a later message to Congress the President praised Count Cernin, of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, for his peaceful purposes and sought again by the force of his phrases to cause the Austro-Hungarian Empire to repudiate its alliance with Germany and sue for a separate peace. But it did not do it.

Later the President issued from the White House the so-called 14 commandments as a code for the settlement of all the conflicting claims and turbulent troubles of the world, and he believed that his proposals would be the basis of peace. But every one of them was rejected by the council at Versailles.

The President returned with the treaty of peace and the League of Nations covenant and informed the Senate that they must accept it without change. But they did not.

When the President's proposal for the settlement of the Adriatic question and the granting of the port of Fiume to the Jugo-Slav Republic was rejected by the Italian Government the President issued his famous address to the Italian people, believing that the Italian people would bow to him, accept his views, and drive their own Government to agree with him. But they did not.

All of us remember, I am sure, the President's famous coup just before the election in 1918, when we were still at war, in which he addressed the American people and told them that he wanted a Congress of Democrats who would be good and do as he said, and that he did not want to be annoyed with Republicans who might refuse to obey his orders. The immediate response was a Republican House and Senate.

Finally, when he was convinced that the Senate would not bow to his dictation and accept the League of Nations covenant without amendment, the President with all the pomp and circumstance of a Cæsar announced that he would have none of such an obstreperous Senate, and that he would appeal to the people. So he made his famous swing through the West and to the Pacific coast, asking the people to repudiate their representatives in the Senate and drive them to do his will. The result is well known. His attitude has probably resulted in the defeat of the treaty.

Mr. Chairman, there is no place in this country for autocratic power. The checks and balances of our Constitution must be preserved, and the executive and legislative branches of our Government must each respect the prerogatives of the other if the Republic long endures.

And there is irony and remarkable coincidence in the fulfillment by the President of his own prophecy, which I quote without comment from page 71 of his book on Constitutional Government:

> There are illegitimate means by which the President may influence the action of Congress. He may bargain with Members, not only with regard to appointments but also with regard to legislative measures. He may use his local patronage to assist Members to get or retain their seats. He may interpose his powerful influence, in one covert way or another, in contests for places in the Senate. He may also overbear Congress by arbitrary acts which ignore the laws or virtually override them. He may even substitute his own orders for acts of Congress which he wants but can not get. Such things are not only deeply immoral, they are destructive of the fundamental understandings of constitutional government and therefore of constitutional government itself. They are sure, moreover, in a country of free public opinion to bring their own punishment, to destroy both the fame and the power of the man who dares to practice them.

During Mr. DENISON'S remarks the following occurred:

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POU. My genial friend from Illinois, I understand, obtained permission to speak out of order. I make the point of order, however, that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can not give that unanimous consent. The rules of the House are clear upon it. I call the attention of the Chair to the decision which has been rendered time and again, that when a special rule fixes the time the Committee of the Whole can not extend that time. Neither can the Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent give permission to speak out of order if the point of order is made, which I make now.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was not made when the request was granted.

Mr. POU. I make the point of order now. It can be made at any time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the House is not estopped by Members failing to be present in the meeting of the committee. That is the very object of the rule—to prescribe the action of the committee and limit it to a consideration of the matter specified by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. From time out of mind, so far as the present occupant of the chair knows, and certainly during his experience in the House, it has been the rule of the House that debate be confined to the pending amendment in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and yet, as every Member knows, permission is often granted for a Member to speak out of order in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, the distinction is this: The special rule of the House provides in terms that the debates shall be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The general rules of the House provide that also.

Mr. POU. And it has been held time and again that by unanimous consent the special order of the House can not be set aside in Committee of the Whole. If the Committee of the Whole can give permission to speak out of order, likewise the 10 hours could be extended to 15 or 20 hours. Of course, that can not be done under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that if the committee is willing to sit and hear debate not on the bill during the time that has been allotted by the House, and no one objects to it, the committee would have that right.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman hear me on that point?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. That is the very basis of the rule. The House has the right to fix the rules under which a committee shall consider the bill. From the parliamentary point of view the House is absent. It is in committee. And under the interpretation of the Chair, the House being absent, having said that the committee can go ahead and consider a certain bill, under certain limitations, then it would require all Members of the House to be present in order to protect itself. Members go away, understanding that nothing except this bill is going to be considered by the committee, and if the ruling of the Chair is followed to its logical conclusion, the committee by unanimous consent, without rising, could absolutely take up some other bill and not consider the pending bill. That would be the logical conclusion of the Chair's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not so ruled. The committee upon request, submitted in the regular way, gave the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] permission to proceed out of order during a portion of the time allotted to him by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. He was proceeding to do so when the point of order was made, and under the practice of the House unbroken, so far as the present occupant of the chair now recalls——

Mr. WINGO. Oh, I would state to the Chair that it is not unbroken. This question has arisen before, and I happen to have been the offending Member at the time. I did not complain then, but if that is going to be the ruling of the Chair, if the House can not be protected by its own rules and can not limit debate in Committee of the Whole to the subject matter, I am going to make the point of order of no quorum and bring the House here. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had his right, of course, at the time the request was made.

Mr. WINGO. But I could not exercise the right. I expected the committee to obey the rule of the House as it was laid down. I expected no new matter to come up, and I was in the cloakroom conferring on another bill. If I had known that new matter would come up I would have been here. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-eight Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," and finding itself without a quorum he had directed the roll to be called, whereupon 270 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WINGO rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Arkansas rise?

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand the gentleman from North Carolina withdraws his point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] has withdrawn his request to proceed and has yielded back the remainder of his time. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his point of order?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. WINGO. My understanding was that it would be withdrawn and the point remain undecided. I am willing to have the matter dropped, but in view of the fact that during this Congress at the extra session, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was in the chair, the Chair ruled that it was not in order to submit a request for unanimous consent to speak out of order during general debate. I recall that decision, because I was the Member overruled. The question having been raised, I do not want the statement of the Chair to go unchallenged that the precedents support his suggested ruling. The precedents are to the contrary, and on reflection I am sure the Chair will rule to the contrary.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee——

Mr. QUIN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement before he starts? The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is going to use part of his time himself after Mr. RAKER has finished, and I hope that gentlemen will wait to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my remarks will be directed to the medical department of the bill—the Army Nurse Corps. I desire to discuss this feature of the bill, which I will read:

Provided, That hereafter the members of the Army Nurse Corps shall have relative rank as follows: The superintendent shall have the relative rank of major; the assistant superintendents, director, and assistant directors the relative rank of captain; chief nurses, the relative rank of first lieutenant; and nurses, the relative rank of second lieutenant; and as regards medical and sanitary matters and all other work within the line of their professional duties shall have and shall be regarded as having authority in and about military hospitals next after the medical officers of the Army.

One bar on a shoulder strap is worth two regulations in a book.

This provision of the bill carries the provisions of the bills H. R. 11246 and H. R. 12696 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, and H. R. 2492 of the Sixty-sixth Congress in regard to rank for nurses in the Medical Corps of the Army.

The provisions of H. R. 2492, introduced by myself on May 23, 1919, are as follows:

A bill to grant rank to the Army Nurse Corps, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the members of the Army Nurse Corps shall have relative rank as follows: The superintendent shall have the relative rank of major; the assistant superintendents, director, and assistant directors the relative rank of captain; chief nurses the relative rank of first lieutenant; and nurses the relative rank of second lieutenant; and as regards medical and sanitary matters and all other work within the line of their professional duties shall have and shall be regarded as having authority in and about military hospitals next after the medical officers of the Army, and shall wear the insignia of the rank in the Army to which their rank corresponds.

It will be noted that this bill carries the same provisions as H. R. 2492.

Extensive hearings were had by the Committee on Military Affairs last year upon this subject (H. R. 12698, 65th Cong.) Many communications have been received and first-hand information has been given to the committee by the nurses who have been abroad and had experience in this work. The universal sentiment is that the nurses should have rank. The Military Committee has made it relative rank, with which they are satisfied, to the end that the service might be improved. The nurses are in charge of the hospital, of course under the doctor, but those in the hospital—the orderlies and others—assume command over the nurses and in many instances fail to obey their orders. That has been demonstrated, and letter after letter could be placed before the House showing wherein they have neglected, failed, and even refused to obey the nurses. It has been shown that even men left that line for a failure to comply with the request and direction of the nurses.

No one is better qualified, no one is better equipped to know what the patients should have and the care and treatment that should be given them than the nurses. Instead of requiring the patients to work under the direction of an orderly and the others it should be up to the nurse. She should have full direction and command of those under her to the end that proper and efficient service should be rendered or maintained. I think the following is conclusive upon that subject. Gen. Pershing, in appearing before the committee, made the following statement, found on page 1438 of the hearings:

The Army Nurse Corps has performed most excellent service abroad. It contained many women of superior ability, and it seems to me, as a recognition of the splendid service of the American women in that corps, they should be given some rank, or, at least, assimilated status. The bestowal of authority upon them would give the Nurse Corps a military status necessary to carry out the instructions of the medical officers and would also have the effect of attracting to the corps the best class of women.

Further speaking upon this subject we find another statement from Gen. Pershing, page 1470 to page 1472, in which he recapitulates that statement and goes further in detail, and I ask to have that inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

Gen. PERSHING. I can see no serious objection to placing it as a part of that department in time of peace, but in war time it would have to be an independent organization.

Senator WADSWORTH. The next topic, as I remember it, that the General took up this morning, was that of granting commissions in a limited way to nurses in the Army Nursing Corps.

Mr. KAHN. This morning you said you would recommend the giving of the rank to the Army nurses. Was not the custom among the other countries that participated in the war to give nurses the relative rank and pay of some officer in the Army, but not to designate them as lieutenants or captains, and so forth?

Gen. PERSHING. I think that is the practice in the British service.

Mr. KAHN. In the British service?

Gen. PERSHING. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Did it work out satisfactorily?

Gen. PERSHING. As far as I know, it has been very satisfactory to the British.

Mr. KAHN. Do you think it would be better to create some special rank for the Nurse Corps rather than the ranks that prevail in the combat troops of the Army?

Gen. PERSHING. Well, I have thought about it a good deal, and it is rather a puzzling question, Mr. Chairman. Whatever would give the nurses a position by which they could enforce compliance with their instructions is what should be done. You find a good many men in the hospitals who are not inclined to obey the orders of a nurse, fellows who are perhaps not any too well disciplined under any circumstances, and the nurses have had in many cases a rather hard time in getting along with some of those men. I am only interested in getting them a standing that will enable them to carry out their duties efficiently.

Mr. KAHN. In favor of giving them some rank, but you have no preference as to what it will be?

Gen. PERSHING. I must say, I have not.

Mr. GREENE. Is it not an axiom of the service that any man who is carrying an order of his superior in that duty to another person carries the order of the superior regardless of rank, and if the order is disobeyed he is disobeying the order of the superior?

Gen. PERSHING. There is a lot of conflict involved in that question.

Mr. GREENE. I understand there is. I am speaking only of the general principle. If you designate somebody in a hospital to do something irrespective of grade or rank, that order would have to be carried out, and anybody who sought to interfere would be disobeying the order?

Gen. PERSHING. That very frequently happens.

Mr. GREENE. Does it make any difference how many stages of rank intervene between you and the one to whom the order is directed, as to who it is brought by when it comes from the one source, the one who could give such an order?

Gen. PERSHING. In those cases where certain duties are allotted to juniors, they are in a better position to carry out those duties if they have the rank which would naturally give them control over the persons who are under control.

Mr. GREENE. The order gives them control, however?

Gen. PERSHING. I can not say it always does.

Mr. GREENE. Officially it does?

Gen. PERSHING. There is a great deal of difference between giving an order and having it carried out. If an officer is ordered to execute an order involving some one of superior rank, who questions the order, and there is no one on the spot to settle the difference, it involves some difficulty.

Mr. GREENE. Would the giving of military rank such as is embodied with the combat troops to people in hospitals tend eventually to win them away to more regard for their rank than for the duty they were assigned to? It has been found, I believe, in the service that while a dentist is a first lieutenant, he will stand back of the chair and draw a tooth, but as he begins to go up the grades he is more interested in assigning somebody else to that function than he is to performing it himself. Is not that same thing true in regard to veterinarians and other people who are not distinctly military men but are engaged in civilian auxiliary functions attached to the Army? Is there not danger in permitting military rank and grade to be scattered too promiscuously through those services?

Gen. PERSHING. You refer to the dental rank?

Mr. GREENE. I only used that as an illustration. We all have to come to the dentist sooner or later, and the Army finds it out as soon as anybody else.

Gen. PERSHING. I know certain colonels in the Dental Corps who do not hesitate to draw teeth.

Mr. GREENE. Are those exceptions that prove the rule, General?

Gen. PERSHING. Well, this whole question is a very interesting one, but if you require certain things to be done by a military individual which compels him to exercise authority over others he must have, or he is better off if he has, the rank to do it. If he actually speaks for his superior and by his authority, rank does not matter so much.

Mr. GREENE. Then if you apply that logically, the sentry on post No. 2 should have the same rank, and yet everybody knows it is death to anyone to disobey his orders.

Gen. PERSHING. That is the reason we give him a gun.

Mr. GREENE. But he is a private.

Gen. PERSHING. If we would give nurses guns, we would not need to give them rank.

Mr. GREENE. I dare say. This question is interesting in this sense, that when we try to establish military grades of greater numbers than we have now we are confronted with the popular misunderstanding of the subject which makes them fail to distinguish between men of different rank.

Gen. PERSHING. I quite appreciate your point in the matter, and the same criticism is very frequently made by the Army people themselves; but as I said with reference to this question of giving rank to nurses, the only point I would make is to place them in a position where they might not be embarrassed so much in the performance of their duties.

Senator WADSWORTH. As I understand it, General, they request a little sign of rank, an insignia, something to indicate the authority they have, to meet an emergency, which does not come up very often, but sometimes is very important.

Gen. PERSHING. Yes.

This question was asked the general, and I think it is quite conclusive on the question of rank, as this bill provides for the nurse service:

Mr. GREENE. I only used that as an illustration. We all have to come to the dentist sooner or later, and the Army finds it out as soon as anybody else.

Gen. PERSHING. I know certain colonels in the Dental Corps who do not hesitate to draw teeth.

Mr. GREENE. Are those exceptions that prove the rule, General?

Gen. PERSHING. Well, this whole question is a very interesting one, but if you require certain things to be done by a military individual which compels him to exercise authority over others, he must have, or he is better off if he has, the rank to do it. If he actually speaks for his superior and by his authority, rank does not matter so much.

Mr. GREENE. Then, if you apply that logically, the sentry on post No. 2 should have the same rank, and yet everybody knows it is death to anyone to disobey his orders.

Gen. PERSHING. That is the reason we give him a gun.

Mr. GREENE. But he is a private.

Gen. PERSHING. If we would give nurses guns, we would not need to give them rank.

That shows the necessity of authority to exercise that judgment and carry out what is desired. In addition to that, the entire work has shown that where rank has been extended to nurses better results have been obtained. The Canadian Government extended rank to their nurses. The Australian Government extended rank to their nurses. While England did not extend rank, it gave them a better status. No one who has talked with these English, Canadian, or Australian nurses but can help realize the advantages that obtained to the service and the good that followed and the justice to the nurses by giving them this rank. The same will apply to their service. These highly educated and thoroughly equipped women who have charge of our hospitals, who have so much responsibility upon their hands, should have no doubt that everyone under them in the hospital should obey their instructions and should follow their commands. The nurse is better equipped, better qualified to know what those directions should be and know what should be given to various patients and the various treatments than anyone else. Men refused to carry out the nurses' orders during the service at night——

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. RAKER. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. Right on that point, in case a private soldier would refuse to carry out the order of a nurse would the gentleman have the private soldier court-martialed?

Mr. RAKER. Well, I would have to know the facts and circumstances in the matter like any other case in authority. The superior authority must govern; the superior officer governs and the inferior officer must obey.

THE WORLD WAR PROVES ARMY NURSE SYSTEM DANGEROUSLY FAULTY.

The receding tide of the World War has left exposed certain alarming conditions, conditions that must be done away with if we are to benefit to the full by this war, which has cost so much.

The dangerous faultiness of our Army nurse system is one of the most serious of these conditions. This statement surprises you—you who have heard inspiring tales of our nurses "over there." Those tales are true, every one of them, for the courage, devotion, and skill of our Army nurses have been beyond praise. It has been because of their heroism and in spite of our nurse system that their work has been good. But surely where the lives of our boys are concerned we are not satisfied with something merely good, we want full efficiency; nor are we Prussian enough to be willing to owe what efficiency we have largely to the unnecessary self-sacrifice of our nurses.

Yet that is the history of our Army Nurse Corps during the World War. Hardly were we well in when the existence of dangerous faults became obvious. So apparent were the menacing defects that the nursing world was stirred to seek correctives. Miss Delano, director of the Red Cross department of nursing, which was recruiting the nurses for the Army, and Miss Nutting, chairman of the committee on nursing of the Council of National Defense, repeatedly urged upon the War Department the immediate need of changes in the system and rank for the nurses—the clear definition of their status and authority. They were supported in their efforts by the nursing profession and by Miss Thompson herself, superintendent of the Army Nurse Corps, as well as by an interested and intelligent medical and law opinion. But only halfway measures resulted, and these were unsuccessful.

FUNDAMENTAL CAUSE OF THE DANGEROUS FAULTS OF THE ARMY NURSE SYSTEM.

Finally the War Department became convinced of the fact that the Nurse Corps had realized almost from the beginning that the root of the trouble lay in the fact that, though the nurses must assume the grave responsibility of carrying out the doctors' orders by means of untrained and constantly shifting orderlies, they possessed no definite nor established authority over those orderlies.

In the rush and strain of war, the nurses' position, always of great importance, becomes vital. The doctors, overworked and overtaxed, must depend on them, not only for the carrying out of their orders in regard to the medical treatment of patients, but also for control over those patients and the hospitals in general. Often one round of the hospital a day is all the doctor can manage. The rest of the time the nurses are responsible for every person and thing in that hospital. How is it possible for them to live up to that responsibility if they are not given adequate authority over those they are expected to control? During the great drives, a nurse often has as many as 70 patients in her ward. To assist her in the care of these patients, she has to depend on orderlies, who are, as a rule, completely untrained in medical knowledge and sometimes even in common cleanliness. A nurse has neither time nor vitality for explanations to orderlies; her patients need all she has. She should have the right to command these orderlies, since valuable lives depend on the quick and accurate carrying out of her orders. In a military world based on authority, without authority she is almost helpless.

WAR DEPARTMENT ISSUES ORDER GIVING ARMY NURSES GRADE OF "NURSE."

Satisfied at last that the welfare of our sick and wounded boys demanded some position of authority for the nurse, the War Department created the grade of "nurse," which placed the Army nurse above all noncommissioned officers and below the West Point cadet.

But, unfortunately, this regulation did not clearly define the nurse's authority nor did it rank her as an officer. And it made the mistake of placing all nurses in the same grade. Though there is a great difference in the positions of superintending, directing, chief, head, and staff nurses, this regulation places them all in the same grade, which classification is not only contrary to the Army system of graded rank but, manifestly, against common sense. Likewise, it fails to give the nurse the right to use the Army efficiency method of indicating rank, the wearing of the rank's insignia.

That the Army considers the wearing of rank insignia necessary is shown by the fact that every male commissioned or noncommissioned officer wears on his shoulder strap or sleeve the insignia of his rank.

Though for a while the second lieutenants wore no insignia, it was found necessary to give them a gold bar. The reason for this is very simple. In the Army, immediate, unquestioning obedience is required, often from men who do not understand Army regulations. There isn't time to show these men printed documents establishing the officer's right to command, so a system of symbols—of insignia—that even the most stupid, the most untrained, can understand is used. It is an efficiency method that every well-organized army in the world has found indispensable. Is there any reason why the Nurse Corps shouldn't profit by it? For in no branch of the service is quick, unquestioning obedience more needed.

COMMITTEE FORMED TO SECURE RANK FOR NURSES.

Realizing that the War Department did not intend to give the Nurse Corps further help and realizing also that any action of that department was subject to repeal at any time, certain patriotic persons, roused by the inefficient organization of so important a branch of our National Army, determined to secure rank for nurses from Congress.

A committee, of which ex-President Taft consented to become honorary chairman, was formed in October, 1918. This committee, composed of the heads of all the large nursing organizations and other persons of national importance, immediately set to work to win rank for nurses as an efficiency measure for our Army.

RELATIVE RANK.

The committee, anxious not to make mistakes nor even to take any unnecessary chances on this important piece of legislation, investigated and followed the army nurse systems of both Canada and Australia, where army nurses have had relative rank for several years.

By relative rank is meant approximate rank. In the case of the Canadian and Australian nurses it meant rank without commission or emoluments but with full pay, the dignity incident to the name of the rank, the right to wear the rank's insignia, and to exercise authority in medical and sanitary matters in military hospitals next after the medical officers of the army.

In both these great countries, where conditions are so similar to our own, it was found that the advantages resulting from the granting of rank to nurses had exceeded the highest expectations. The surgeons general of both countries were loud in their praises of the system; of how well it had stood the test of the most terrible war in history; of its success in removing the very weaknesses from which our system was suffering.

HISTORY OF THE LEWIS-RAKER BILL.

As a result of this and other investigations the committee decided to follow the successful action of our allies and introduce into Congress a bill giving only relative rank to nurses. And, since the Nurse Corps wanted rank not primarily to benefit themselves but to promote the efficiency of the nurse service, it was decided to ask for no increase in pay. The bill conferred on the Nurse Corps only (1) the dignity incident to the name of the rank, and (2) the right to wear the rank's insignia, and (3) the eligibility to exercise authority as regards all medical and sanitary matters in and about military hospitals next after the medical officers of the Army.

Nor did the bill grant any higher rank than that of major. It gave to the superintendent of the Nurse Corps the rank of major, to the directing nurses the rank of captain, to the chief nurses the rank of first lieutenant, to the staff nurses the rank of second lieutenant. The bill was introduced into the Senate by Senator Lewis, into the House by Representative RAKER.

Every effort was made to get this bill through Congress—first on its own merits, then as a rider to the Army appropriation bill. But the attempt was unsuccessful, as even the appropriation bill failed of passage.

THE JONES-RAKER BILL.

With the assembling of the extra session of the Sixty-sixth Congress (May, 1919), the bill in exactly the same form again was introduced into Congress—into the Senate by Senator JONES, since Senator Lewis was not returned, and into the House by Representative RAKER. It is now under consideration by the Military Affairs Committees of the Senate and the House.

WAR DEPARTMENT FAILS TO SUPPORT JONES-RAKER BILL.

Though this bill is a purely patriotic piece of legislation, aiming to benefit not one group of women but the whole Nation by insuring better nursing service for those who risk their lives for our country, the War Department has refrained from supporting it. This is unfortunate, as the approval of the department would mean undoubtedly the bill's speedy passage. But certainly it is no reflection on the merits of the bill, for the War Department has always opposed all legislation giving established military position to the professional corps attached to the Army.

It took the doctors almost a hundred years to be recognized as part of the Army and to win the right to the lower grades of rank, and their victory was achieved over the head of the War Department. So, too, with their recent acquisition of the higher grades of rank.

Dentists and veterinarians had a similar experience in gaining acknowledgment as part of the Army and the right to the lower grades of rank.

Likewise the nurses themselves, after the Spanish War, obtained establishment as part of the Army in spite of the opposition of the War Department.

Therefore, considering this unvarying attitude of opposition to established military position for all professional corps attached to the Army, we refuse to consider the disapproval of this department as a stigma on the bill. To prove this we will examine in detail their objections.

OBJECTIONS OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT TO THE JONES-RAKER BILL.

1. There might be confusion of authority between the Medical and Nurse Corps.

But the bill plainly states that the nurses shall have authority only after the medical officers of the Army. As this definitely places the Nurse Corps under the authority of the Medical Corps, where is there chance for confusion and conflict?

2. The bill would increase the cost of the Army at a time when the taxpayer is already overburdened.

This is a mistake. Since the bill grants only relative rank without the pay that accompanies the rank there will not be one cent's increase in expense for the taxpayer. The Nurse Corps will receive exactly the pay it was receiving before the bill was passed.

3. The bill would make every nurse an officer.

That is true, and for the same reason that every doctor is an officer—because this position of recognized authority is necessary for efficient work. Both doctors and nurses must be in a position to demand quick and complete obedience from those through whom they work. And this is even more necessary for the nurses than for the doctors, because the doctors work largely through the nurses, who are educated experts, while the nurses must work through the orderlies, who are, as a rule, completely untrained in hospital and medical matters.

Also the objection is brought forward that the bill would create too many second lieutenants. But with no increase of the Army would it create as many second lieutenants in the Nurse Corps as there would be first lieutenants on full pay in the Medical Corps. The creation of a number of second lieutenants in the Nurse Corps had no unfortunate results in Canada and Australia.

4. A feeling of separation, distance, unfriendliness might arise between the nurses and the enlisted men who were their patients if the nurses should become officers.

Not the slightest indication of such a condition has resulted from the granting of rank to Canadian and Australian nurses. On the contrary, since under this system the nurses have more time and strength to give their patients, the relations between the nurses and all patients have been improved.

5. The alleged inferiority of some Army nurses makes them unfit to become officers.

The standard of the Army Nurse Corps is very high. The nurses are required to be not only graduates but also graduates of the best hospital schools. Those who know the history of nursing for the last 20 years know that these schools have been steadily raising their standards both for the nursing and the general educational curriculum. Then, too, the nurses must be registered, which means they must have passed their State registration examination. Further, on entering the Army, they must not only pass a physical test like the enlisted men's and a mental and physical test like the officers', but they must also satisfy moral requirements such as no other corps in the Army has to meet.

During the most strenuous part of the war the physical and mental standards of the Nurse Corps were slightly lowered, as was the case in every branch of the service, but immediately on the signing of the armistice its normal standards were resumed. Surely, instead of being considered less fit to be officers than other branches of the service, the Nurse Corps should be considered more fit. And the heroic service rendered by our nurses in the war proves them to be a body of women the officers' world should be proud to welcome.

6. It is feared that nurses, if given the privileges of rank, would lose their heads and become licentious.

This sounds as though American nurses were as unaccustomed to freedom as the inmates of a Turkish harem. Canadian and Australian nurses, who, on the whole, are less accustomed to freedom than our own, have shown not the slightest signs of being demoralized by having relative rank. Why, then, should we fear for our nurses? To show the high moral standard maintained by our Nurse Corps in this war, out of almost 22,000 nurses who served their country, only 1 was court-martialed (and that not for immorality) and fewer than 30 were dishonorably discharged. Surely we can trust such women to make noble use of any privileges given them, especially as they are asking for these privileges to benefit not themselves but others.

7. The womanhood of the nurse gives her more power than the highest rank could confer.

This is the old, old argument that has met woman at every step of her way. If every woman were beautiful, tactful, charming; if every man were courteous, well-bred, chivalrous, this statement might be true, though we venture to call your attention to the dangers of a power based solely on personal charm. But, with conditions as they are, nurses need something more than the fact that they are women to give them sufficient authority and standing to insure our sick and wounded proper care at all times. A mass of testimony in the possession of the committee proves this beyond the shadow of a doubt. This testimony shows with painful clearness that in this war our Nurse Corps had to endure almost unbelievable hardships in trying, without the possession of the proper authority, efficiently to care for its patients, and has often been unsuccessful in spite of the most heroic self-sacrifice.

SUPPORTERS OF RELATIVE RANK FOR NURSES.

The committee on rank for nurses has discovered that, though the War Department is opposed, there is much popular support for a movement that is of such vital national importance.

ADVOCATES IN THE ARMY MEDICAL CORPS.

In one month 1,000 medical officers indorsed the Jones-Raker bill. Many eminent physicians and surgeons who, during the war, were high on the staff of the Surgeon General, are among its supporters. Some of these are Col. William H. Welch, of Johns Hopkins; Col. Charles Mayo and Col. William Mayo, of Rochester, Minn.; Col. Victor C. Vaughan, of Ann Arbor.

GENERAL MEDICAL BOARD OF THE COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE.

The executive committee of this body devoted a session to the consideration of the principle of rank for nurses and voted unanimously for it. Its chairman, Col. Franklin H. Martin, of Chicago, says the bill can not pass too soon.

HOSPITALS AND NURSING ORGANIZATIONS.

The heads of all the big hospitals in the country, the American Nurses' Association, the National Organization of Public Health Nursing, the National League for Nursing Education, and the American Hospital Association are warmly advocating the bill.

LAY ORGANIZATIONS.

The bill has received the indorsement and support of the Vassar Alumnæ Association, many chambers of commerce, the Daughters of the American Revolution, the woman's committee of the Council of National Defense, numerous State and city federations, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, hundreds of chapters of the Red Cross, besides countless clubs and committees.

NOW IS THE TIME TO GIVE RANK TO NURSES.

Though the World War is at an end, the need of an efficient nurse corps isn't.

There are still 36,000 sick and wounded soldiers in our military hospitals.

The Congress is about to reorganize our Army from the ground up.

The Nurse Corps will form an important part of the Army.

If the rest of the Army is to be reorganized, why not the Nurse Corps?

Medical officers who have been at the front with her, Congressmen who have seen her at work under fire, and, above all, the soldiers whose lives she has saved declare with one voice that the Army nurse not only deserves but needs rank; that not only her welfare but her full efficiency depends on it.

The passage of the Jones-Raker bill will give her rank and a position of assured efficiency in our new Army.

We have given the Army nurse medals of honor in reward for the noble work she has done. Let us now give her rank to help her in the noble work she is about to do.

EMINENT OPINIONS.

Hon. William Howard Taft, former President of the United States of America and Commander in Chief of the Army:

"Trained nurses in the Army should have military rank and commissions. Privates in the Medical Corps, called orderlies, but with little professional training, must help the nurses in their duties. Tasks requiring physical strength and no skill must be done by them, and the nurses must tell them why and when. In an army rank counts much in enforcing order and discipline, and organization is impossible without it. Therefore Army nurses should be given rank. The fact that nurses are women is no reason for withholding it. It is given in the British Army and works well. Why not in ours?

"I was three months in a military hospital in Manila after a serious operation. I was attended by women nurses and by orderlies also. I know by observation and experience how much it interfered with the work of the nurses and the comfort of the patients that the nurses could not give military orders to the orderlies. The nurses need military rank to do their work. Let us brush Mr. Tite Barnacle aside."

Maj. Gen. E. F. Glenn, commander of the Eighty-third Division in France and now commanding officer of Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio:

"Competent nurses were quite as esssential as the doughboy who carried the gun. Of course the utilization of female nurses in our Army is of comparatively recent origin, but we have them both in peace and war, and their services are so absolutely essential that we must continue to utilize them.

"This necessary use of female nurses quite naturally raises a question of responsibility in regard to control that must be determined. By this I mean that if female nurses in the Army are to be held responsible, as they should and must be, for the proper performance of the duties that devolve upon them, they must be invested with authority and power of control not only of patients but also of all those who serve in the care of these patients. By this I mean that if a female nurse is placed in charge of a ward and is to be held responsible, as she should be, for the proper care of the patients and discipline within the ward, then she must be invested with an official grade, duly authorized by the Government, which carries with it the power to enforce her instructions and orders upon all subordinates in that ward.

"This new condition of utilization of female nurses implies that there must be an organization of the Nurse Corps, through which we can secure team work; and in military affairs this implies that the nurses must be graded and given military rank. For instance, in each hospital there should be the chief nurse with the necessary assistants to replace or assist her, and there must be nurses in each of the wards with power of control, as stated, over those wards—in other words, an organization such as each and every large institution must provide in order to secure results. This I have just designated as securing 'team work.'

"I make no suggestion as to what grade the chief nurses should have. These details should be determined in so far as the Army is concerned by the Medical Department; but I am quite clear in my own mind that the nurses must be graded and accorded military rank if you are ever to secure that efficiency which the importance of the work demands."

Dr. Henry Noble MacCracken, president of Vassar College:

"I believe in rank as a necessary means to the nurse's highest efficiency. She needs it as a safeguard and a protection.

"As an educator I also believe that the granting of rank to nurses will have a reflex influence; that it will greatly lift and dignify the whole nursing profession; that it will markedly change the attitude of physicians toward nurses, and that it will have a strong influence upon the progress of the movement to put woman in her natural position by the side of man.

"The arrival of peace brings with it no permanent assurance of a return in size of the American Army to anything approaching its personnel at the outbreak of hostilities. There must still be an American Army able to perform a part worthy of America in protecting the liberties of the world. There must also necessarily be an Army Nurse Corps with that Army. But as the stimulus of a World War is removed the service with the American forces must be made attractive to the very best type of American men and women by every just means of recognition and of honor. Certainly the members of the Army Nurse Corps should receive every inducement in this strenuous period of world readjustment that we ever before thought wise to afford them in the exhilarating fight against the Germans.

"I am therefore heartily in favor of obtaining from Congress proper rank and honor which is due the members of the Army Nurse Corps."

WHAT MEDICAL OFFICERS SAY.

Maj. Gen. William C. Gorgas, until October, 1918, Surgeon General United States Army:

"I think a woman who has the education and the position in executive control of 30,000 other educated women should have the grade, pay, and position of major. I would recommend two or three assistants at the head of the Nurse Corps, to be commissioned as captains, and I would recommend commissions of first lieutenant for every chief nurse in a hospital."

Maj. Gen. R. H. Fetherston, surgeon general of the Australian Army: "As regards status and authority, the first Australian nurses worked under regulations for about 12 months. The power conferred on nurses by these regulations was very soon found to be insufficient and unsatisfactory when working for and with citizen soldiers. Continual disputes arose as to the scope of the nurses' powers and authority, more particularly with noncommissioned officers and orderlies. In hospitals with a firm commanding officer in sympathy with female nurses all went well. With others not so firm there was trouble in working, and delay occurred in nurses' getting their instructions carried out; while in hospitals where the commanding officer did not like female nurses the position of the female staff became unbearable and there were continual appeals to higher authorities.

"This was the state of affairs when I visited the Australian hospitals abroad some 12 months after the beginning of the war. On inquiry I found that the Australian nurses received little or no consideration from those over them and that few extended to them the courtesies due to an officer. I inquired into the working of the Canadian system of giving military rank to nurses. Canadian nurses were in some cases working alongside Australian nurses. I found the fact of their wearing badges of rank as officers at once classed them as such and showed what they were entitled to. I inquired into any disabilities from such rank and found that those which were mentioned were purely sentimental or financial.

"Upon my return to Australia I recommended the . . . system of relative rank for adoption. My recommendation was approved and brought into force early in 1916. The system has been found to work most smoothly and with great benefit to the military hospitals. The wearing of badges at once settled the status and authority of the nurse and showed that in her particular sphere of work her orders were to be obeyed. The discipline of the wards and hospitals generally was markedly improved. No friction now arises with noncommissioned officers and orderlies. The nursing service is contented and not troubled with petty insults and annoyances as before. Incidentally another improvement has manifested itself in the general demeanor of the nurses.

"It has been said that a nurse should be able to control her ward and that if she can not do so she is not competent for her position. In theory and perhaps in civil life this is correct, but in military practice it is found in Australian hospitals that there are soldiers who pay no respect to orders issued by women, but who do so when the women are wearing badges of rank.

"Nearly 1,600 Australian nurses are working in imperial hospitals and wearing the badges of rank as in Australia, and no complaints have ever been received as regards their rank or any difficulties which have arisen from such; nursing authorities have expressed their view upon the value of rank and wish that the same could be given to imperial nurses." (Excerpt from a report on the Australian Army Nursing Service made Apr. 25, 1918, for the information of the Surgeon General of the United States Army.)

Col. Victor C. Vaughan, of the Surgeon General's staff throughout the war, president of the Medical Veterans of the World War, and dean of the department of medicine and surgery of the University of Michigan:

"We can not take care of our soldiers without nurses, and without rank the nurses are not thoroughly efficient. If our soldiers are to have the care they should, their nurses must be equipped with rank. There has to be somebody whose word is unquestioned. There is no time to argue. In a civilian hospital the authority of the nurse is understood and unquestioned. But in the Army, where the personnel is changing every day, that is impossible. Lack of rank is sometimes the cause of loss of life among the soldiers for whom the nurses are trying to care."

Col. William J. Mayo, of Rochester, Minn., late of the Surgeon General's staff:

"I believe that nurses should have relative military rank. Authority in the Army goes with rank. Without rank there is no authority. Without authority the nurse can not exercise to the full those influences which in civil life have made her one of the greatest agents for good of modern civilization. I believe the bulk of the bill brought forward here (the Jones-Raker bill) represents a real step in advance, and I believe the soldier will be better taken care of in this way than under present conditions."

Col. Franklin Martin, Chicago, Ill., chairman of the general medical board of the Council of National Defense, member of the advisory commission, and president of the American College of Surgeons:

"Until we can give our nurses the authority that they must exercise, the authority they are supposed to use in the care of the sick, and until we give them some visible evidence of that authority, we have disorganization where we should have organization. I believe every physician who has practiced in hospitals and every reserve officer in the Army and in the Navy feel that this rank should be granted to the nurses."

Col. Richard C. Cabot, Boston, Mass., Medical Corps, United States Army:

"I am heartily in favor of rank for nurses. They did more than we, the doctors, did, and as we were officers, they should be."

Col. Hugh M. Flint, McCloud, Calif., late colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army, commanding officer Mobile Hospital No. 39, American Expeditionary Forces:

"May I express my enthusiastic support of the Jones-Raker bill for relative rank for Army nurses? The training of the nurses, the contribution which they make to the sick and wounded and their position in the hospital machine give them responsibilities and duties which are equivalent to those of officers. It is therefore wise that their position be recognized and that they be given a rank which will enable them to have the necessary authority over the enlisted men in and about military hospitals."

Col. H. W. Loeb, St. Louis, Mo., late colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army:

"I wish to announce through you my conviction that it is absolutely essential for nurses to be given rank in the Army if they are to exert the proper influence in connection with the medical work in the Army. The arguments for this I can substantiate by both judgment and experience."

Lieut. Col. Marshall Clinton, Buffalo, N. Y., late lieutenant colonel, Medical Corps, American Expeditionary Forces:

"My experience with the American Expeditionary Forces as director of Base Hospital No. 23 and then during seven months' service at the front in the evacuation hospitals in France as surgical consultant of the Second Army, leads me to believe that the passage of the Jones-Raker bill for rank for nurses will unquestionably help the administration and discipline of any military hospital."

Lieut. Col. William Gillespie, Cincinnati, Ohio, late lieutenant colonel, Medical Corps, American Expeditionary Forces:

"My observation in France convinces me that if nurses are to be required for our base hospitals, they should have some protection from the petty whims of commanding officers. Nurses, like enlisted men, are supposed to belong to an inferior order, and commissions would, in my judgment, not only be a recognition of their special qualifications but would be some protection."

Lieut. Col. P. D. MacNaughton, Calumet, Mich., late lieutenant colonel, Medical Corps, United States Army:

"I was in command of a base hospital in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, and fully realize the handicap nurses are under without rank. Their education and training entitle them to this consideration without considering their responsibilities."

Lieut. Col. H. N. Torrey, Detroit, Mich, late lieutenant colonel, Medical Corps, American Expeditionary Forces:

"I served 21 months in the American Expeditionary Forces in France, both in the field and in a base hospital. I feel very strongly that an Army nurse should have a commissioned rank. In her work, traveling, etc., she has great need of the privileges and authority such a rank would give to her."

Maj. James D. Bruce, Saginaw, Mich., late Medical Corps, United States Army:

"Fifteen months in the Medical Corps of the American Army and six months in the Canadian Medical Corps lead me to conclude that the suggestion of conferring military rank on the Nurse Corps of the Army would, through its effect on discipline, add greatly to the efficiency of the entire medical organization."

Maj. Charles W. Comfort, jr., New Haven, Conn., late Medical Corps, United States Army:

"This letter is written in sincere indorsement of the proposed Federal legislation to secure rank for nurses. The experience of other armies in granting rank to members of the nurse corps should be sufficient indorsement; the experience of those who have been in service, domestic or foreign, would most emphatically approve such procedure."

Maj. J. G. Matthews, Spokane, Wash., late Medical Corps, United States Army:

"My attention has been called to the discussion regarding the giving of commissions to Army nurses. This I consider very necessary, for it will eliminate any dispute or ground for trouble regarding the issuing of orders in wards. It has been the experience in all hospitals that unpleasantnesses arose at times regarding the corps men taking orders from nurses."

Maj. Charles M. Paul, Cincinnati, Ohio, late Medical Corps, United States Army, chief surgeon Base Hospital 25, American Expeditionary Forces:

"I am heartily in favor of the nurses having proper rank in the Army game."

Maj. Henry Lynde Woodward, Cincinnati, Ohio, late Medical Corps, Base Hospital No. 25, American Expeditionary Forces:

"I favor the giving of rank to nurses in the Army Nurse Corps. In the first place, they deserve the recognition of their invaluable services. In the second place, they have at present no standing which in and of itself gives them authority over the enlisted men in the wards, over whom they must exercise control in the medical care of the patients. They should have the rank of an officer to back up their personal powers."

Dr. James F. Cobey, late Medical Corps, American Expeditionary Forces:

"A year and a half in France with the Medical Corps of the United States Army have made me directly acquainted with the difficulties the nurses meet in their work with an army organized on rank as a means of discipline when they are without rank."

Dr. Paul Correll, Easton, Pa., late Medical Corps, United States Army:

"It has long been my impression that the method of handling the highly educated professional nurse in the service was entirely unbecoming and unsatisfactory to all fair-minded medical men.

"I, however, came in contact with the situation upon entering active service, and I feel that there has been a lack of appreciation among the leading Army spirits as well as in our written regulations and a lack of a proper and just consideration of both the ability and the dignity of the nurses entering the corps.

"They should by all means be brought up to a suitable plane where they may intelligently and with proper dignity command respect and consideration in the performance of their most vital duties. I feel certain that few nurses who have gone from the service feel that they have been treated with anything like the consideration that their profession and their sex have the right to expect and demand at this very moment.

"A definite status must be established as to the definite duties and the definite standing of the professionally trained nurses, and unless this is done I feel that we can not expect their whole-hearted cooperation in the future as they gave it so willingly in the past."

WHAT SOME LEADING NURSES SAY.

The late Jane A. Delano, director of the department of nursing of the American Red Cross and one time superintendent of the Army Nurse Corps:

"1. Efficient organization in any hospital, civilian or military, is in my opinion to be secured only by placing definite responsibility upon one person in the ward. In the matter of the Army Nurse Corps, I do not believe that any regulation will effect the purpose we desire. First, because we have back of us the traditions of years. We have the corps men, we have even the officers themselves, and perhaps the nurses, with the traditions of divided responsibility, and we have this tradition of the Hospital Corps man, who in the past has not been placed definitely under the nurse. Now a new regulation is made, but the interpretation of that regulation depends entirely upon the temperament of the commanding officer or of the person to whom he delegates the duties regarding it. I do not know of a first-class hospital in the United States that has the arrangement which obtains in the military hospitals. The person who gives an order in a hospital ought to be perfectly certain that the order will be obeyed.

"Col. Jones, the surgeon general of the Canadian Army, talked with me when I was in the Surgeon General's office. He said, 'The only thing any soldier really recognizes as giving one the right to issue an order is rank.' We do not ask for increased pay. The Red Cross has selected and turned over to the Army more than 8,000 graduate nurses. [This number had in November, 1918, been increased to 18,000.] These nurses have been chosen by my department and I feel a tremendous interest in their work. They are trained, skilled, able women, but I do not believe that we can get efficient, prompt, and obedient service unless we give them both the right to issue orders concerning the nursing care of the sick and the insignia of rank to show that they have that right. We ask for nothing else." (Excerpt from the statement made by Miss Delano on April 16, 1918, before the House Committee on Military Affairs at the hearing on rank for nurses.)

2. "The signing of the armistice should not halt the work now going forward to obtain rank for our Army nurses. The Army Nurse Corps is a permanent service which should be so attractive that it will retain the interest of the high type of woman that came into it in the war emergency. It should be made so dignified that membership in it as a governmental service would be regarded as one of the highest honors open to the nursing profession. A recognition by the Army and by Congress of the defects in its present organization, a willingness to correct them by thorough reorganization on a sound and logical basis, and a generous admission of the fact that the granting of rank is essential to such reorganization are the means, in my opinion, by which the interest of the best type of nurses can be retained to the Government for the maintenance of the Nurse Corps on that high plane of efficiency which it should occupy. Let the work therefore go forward in order that it may come to a speedy accomplishment for the greater efficiency of the Nurse Corps in the future." (Statement made by Miss Delano on November 12, 1918, in answer to the question whether the armistice should halt the effort to obtain rank for nurses.)

Dora E. Thompson, superintendent of the Army Nurse Corps since 1913:

"The Army Nurse Corps will continue to exist even though peace has come. For many years to come it will be a larger corps than has ever before been necessary in times of peace, numbering probably into several thousands. The problems of the nurse in the military hospital will be the same in peace that they were in war. There will be time for better training of the hospital orderlies, but to insure the respect for the Army nurse that she should always have accorded to her, rank is an essential which she should not be asked to do without. The work to obtain rank for Army nurses should go forward and continue until it meets with success."

Annie W. Goodrich, chief Federal inspector of military hospitals and dean of the Army School of Nursing until July 15, 1919; assistant professor of nursing and health, Teachers' College, Columbia University:

"War has intensified rather than lessened my belief in the necessity of rank as a means of efficiency for the nurses. As long as rank continues to be a part of the military system and necessary to the exercise of authority by members of other groups in the Army, it is correspondingly necessary to the proper exercise of authority by the members of that professional group who serve as members of the Army Nurse Corps.

"The Army Nurse Corps is a permanent institution, and its members' need of rank therefore will continue as long as there are problems of sickness and wounds to be dealt with. The military hospitals will never be thoroughly efficiently administered until the system of rank prevailing elsewhere in the Army shall have been extended to the Army Nurse Corps. The Jones-Raker bill for rank for nurses should be pushed to passage as speedily as possible."

Clara D. Noyes, president of the American Nurses' Association and director of the department of nursing of the American Red Cross:

"Every nurse who has been in the Army service should long ago have received rank, because she needed it to do her work. Her country should long ago have provided her with this tool so essential to her best service.

"But though the day of desperate drives is over, though the armistice has been followed by peace, and nurses, like soldiers, have been demobilized by thousands, it is not too late for America to do her duty. We shall continue to have a Regular Army and an Army Nurse Corps, and every Army nurse will continue to need rank. As an efficiency measure for both the present and the future, and incidentally as a mark of the Nation's respect for the work of its war nurses, the Jones-Raker bill for rank should be passed with all possible speed."

Prof. M. Adelaide Nutting, director department of nursing and health, Teachers' College, Columbia University:

"It is the very essence of military organization that responsibility shall carry with it commensurate authority and that no one depending on other agencies for necessary service shall be without power to command those agencies. The Army Nurse Corps is a body of trained and skilled professional women with well recognized duties and responsibilities in directing and maintaining an adequate nursing system in military hospitals. Yet its members have been left to carry on their important work without any real power to insure control of the resources and agencies needed or to guarantee courteous and respectful behavior from those with whom they had to associate in work. If we had striven to weaken the efficiency and undermine the morale of the members of our nursing service we could hardly have devised a better way of doing it than by leaving them helpless in the midst of a military world. Nothing but the fineness of our women and the soundness of their training has saved the day for them in an inherently false situation. Hardships, danger, and death they were prepared for, and these they have met with unfaltering courage. They were not prepared to have the Army authorities and the medical men fail them. The Jones-Raker bill for rank recently introduced must pass. Otherwise it should be difficult to induce self-respecting women to remain in the Army Nurse Corps or to enter it."

R. Inde Albaugh, chief division of assignment, bureau of information for nurses, American Red Cross, New York City:

"It has been my privilege during my association with the Bureau of Information of the Nursing Service of the American Red Cross to interview between 1,000 and 1,500 overseas nurses. The subject of military rank for nurses is one that they discuss very freely and frankly with the personnel of this bureau. I find that some of these women have not thought very seriously or definitely on this subject nor have they analyzed or tried to visualize what military rank would have meant to them in their work and relations with the American Expeditionary Forces; but they are suffering the same internal pressure, caused by suppressed indignation over the indefinite and irregular strata that professional women were forced to occupy in a foreign country. They felt not only the lack of protection but the lack of recognition which they were accustomed to enjoy in civil life at home. From this fact emanates a great feeling of disappointment in and lack of respect for our military organization. These nurses as well as the majority who have thought on the subject of military rank, are solidly for something, anything, that will prevent a repetition of their experiences while trying to serve their country at home and abroad, and during their return voyage. The majority of these women believe that relative rank is the only solution of this problem."

Amy M. Hilliard, general superintendent of training school, Bellevue and allied hospitals, New York City:

"The United States Army has granted rank to every professional group except nurses. For nurses they have made regulations. When time is limited or authority needed, regulations by no means take the place of insignia on the shoulder. No other country called for nor was able to put in the field promptly such a large group of graduate nurses for military service. No other country has shown such an utter lack of appreciation of the needs of its nurses in military service nor have the nurses of any other country been subjected to such humiliation as have ours. They responded promptly to the call of their country and everybody acknowledges that they have rendered a vital national service. Should they not receive recognition at least equal to that so freely accorded their Canadian, English, and Australian sisters?"

M. M. Riddle, ex-chief nurse, Camp Devens, Mass.:

"In seeking rank for nurses, it seems well to consider only that phase of the subject which refers to the more efficient care of the sick. The limitations placed upon the nurse in charge of a ward in a military hospital are many. If she is tactful, amiable, and winning, she may have carried out orders for the nursing care, dependent upon orderlies and Hospital Corps men. If she is strictly businesslike in giving her instructions, she is likely to find them indifferently executed. Much of the success of the ward is due to the attitude of the officer (doctor) in charge of it. If his chief interest is in the welfare of the patients, he will aid the nurse by insisting that her instructions be carried out. If he is lax, knowledge of the details may escape him, and the nurse is then powerless to secure for the patient that care which he should have. At present authority regarding the care of the patients in the wards—exclusive of that of the doctor—is divided, and the best interests of the sick are thus menaced. For safety, there must be a responsible head; and it is evident the position should be taken by the nurse, who, by training, is best fitted for it. Though rank should, in justice, be given the nurse as her due, yet it is not in the name of justice that we would insist upon it, but for the higher reason that as a ranking officer she can secure better nursing care for the patients in military hospitals."

WHAT A FEW ARMY NURSES SAY.

"Some of our orderlies were men of education, some of means; most of them had never worked under the direction of a woman before and objected to receiving instruction from them. They were quite willing to do dressings or other responsible work, but resented doing the cleaning, scrubbing floors, emptying waste. The consequence was this work was not done. The nurse, being in charge of the men, was blamed unless she reported to the officer that the men refused to do the work. If she reported the men, they became antagonistic and made her work harder than ever. In either case the patients suffered, for no head nurse can see that her patients are having the best possible care if she has to spend the best part of her time getting routine cleaning done.

"It certainly adds nothing to good discipline, good morale, or spirit to have every order or request—it was usually the latter—questioned and argued about." (A nurse with the Harvard unit.)

"We might be greatly handicapped by not having rank in working with officers who do not greatly appreciate our responsibilities. But here my one great need of rank is with the enlisted personnel of the hospital. These are largely made up of men who have had no experience in hospital work and must all be trained by the nurses and should be under their authority. This is a serious problem and would have been so much easier to handle if we had had some rank." (A chief nurse in France.)

"An orderly dispatched for sandbags with which to stabilize a newly set leg in a compound-fracture case was gone so long that he had to be sent for. He had gone to the post office to look for mail at the request of a captain he had met in the hall! 'Why didn't you bring me the sandbags first and go for the mail afterwards?' asked the nurse who had stood holding the leg all the time the orderly was gone. 'Oh, I had to go. He was an officer,' was the reply." (An overseas nurse.)

"I wish to call your attention to the inefficiency of a system which requires such a waste of time. It takes considerable time for a nurse to look up one person to report another's delinquencies. It is much quicker to say to A, 'Do this,' than to go to B and ask B to try to get A to do his work or to have to go through B to ask C to report A and have him punished for his disobedience or neglect." (An overseas nurse.)

"The sergeant came into the diphtheria ward and took four men who were just out of bed after diphtheria and had them carry heavy trays a quarter of a mile, although I objected." (An overseas nurse.)

"Surgical instruments must be treated with great care and boiled only a few minutes.

"A head nurse told an orderly to boil certain valuable instruments for five minutes only and return them to her. When he failed to come back, she went to look for him. He was talking while the instruments still boiled merrily. 'I told you to boil them five minutes only,' said the nurse. 'Oh,' said the orderly, 'I decided that if 5 minutes were good, 15 were better.'" (An overseas nurse.)

"A hospital orderly delirious with influenza spent most of his time calling out to his nurse, 'I don't have to obey you—you're not a lieutenant; you're only a nurse.'" (A chief nurse in an American camp.)

"When prepared to do a surgical dressing, the nurse had often to wait until the orderly was ready to help, although many times he was doing nothing at all. Such delays made efficient work almost impossible in large wards filled with the recently wounded. The ward master would take men away from the necessary ward duties and assign them to other work. The nurse could do nothing." (Overseas nurse.)

APPENDIX.

ARMY REGULATION GRANTING GRADE OF "NURSE" TO ARMY NURSES.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July, 1918.

Paragraph 9, Army Regulations, 1913, is changed as follows:

9. (Changed by C. A. R. No. 46, W. D., 1916, and No. 73, W. D., 1918.) The following are the grades of rank of officers and noncommissioned officers:

1. General.
2. Lieutenant general.
3. Major general.
4. Brigadier general.
5. Colonel.
6. Lieutenant colonel.
7. Major.
8. Captain.
9. First lieutenant.
10. Second lieutenant.
11. Aviator.
12. Cadet.
13. Nurse.
14. (a) Sergeant major, etc.

JONES-RAKER BILL (S. 1737, H. R. 2492).

A bill to grant rank to the Army Nurse Corps, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the members of the Army Nurse Corps shall have relative rank as follows: The superintendent shall have the relative rank of major; the assistant superintendents, director, and assistant directors the relative rank of captain; chief nurses the relative rank of first lieutenant; and nurses the relative rank of second lieutenant; and as regards medical and sanitary matters and all other work within the line of their professional duties shall have and shall be regarded as having authority in and about military hospitals next after the medical officers of the Army, and shall wear the insignia of the rank in the Army to which their rank corresponds.

Important facts about the Army Nurse Corps, relative and actual rank.

Existing positions in the Army Nurse Corps.	Superintendent.	Assistant superintendent.	Director.[1]	Assistant director.[1]	Chief nurse.	Nurse.

[1] This position will be discontinued on the withdrawal of our armies from Europe.
[2] These numbers are decreasing steadily as demobilization proceeds.
[3] One to a hospital.
[4] "Base" pay is the initial pay of the position. After 3 years' service there is an increase of $5 per month every 3 years for nurses and chief nurses. Nurses serving abroad receives $10 a month additional.
[5] "Detached service" is service away from a base, camp, or post.
[6] "Allowances" are for quarters, heat and light, and in the case of nurses for rations also. The amounts vary with the station and with the season. The figures given are for Washington, D. C. At a base, a camp, or a post these charges are part of the Government's overhead and are smaller.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 80 minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 60 minutes to myself. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for one hour.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the question of national defense, as has been well said this afternoon, is not a partisan question. All Americans are equally concerned for the national defense. It was in that spirit that the Congress of the United States for the first time in its history passed a real democratic conscription law. During the Civil War there had been passed a draft law, but I contend that that was not a real democratic law, because it excused a man who paid two or three hundred dollars for his exemption or who could furnish a substitute in his place.

The sole purpose of the Army of the Republic is to function in time of war. Every dollar expended on an army is a waste of money unless that object be constantly in view before the Congress of the United States. The policy of this country is not apt to bring us into war. We do not seek territorial acquisitions, and heretofore at least we have never desired to interfere with the internal affairs of any nation on earth outside of the United States. [Applause.] So that we can generally look forward to a period of peace.

The last war we had prior to the World War was in 1898.

We got into this World War in 1917, just 19 years later. And I want to say that world wars come very rarely in the history of the world. They seem to come in cycles of about 100 or 150 years. It is, therefore, exceedingly doubtful whether there will be another great world war in a less period of time. And yet no man can tell when the battle flags will be unfurled. The people of this country were not for war. We are a people who believe in peace. But we were dragged into the war against our will, and nobody can tell when again we will have to face a condition of that sort.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. In one moment. I for one believe in having my country prepared to meet any emergency that may confront us. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from California does not agree with the President of the United States that our men went to the other side as crusaders, does he?

Mr. KAHN. We went to the other side to protect and defend American rights. [Applause.] And when the Imperial German Government challenged those rights and carried out her threats of ruthless submarine warfare against our ships, there was nothing to do but surrender our rights or fight. And, thank God, we chose to fight. [Applause.]

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. And those people who do not fight for their own rights are not crusaders?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the term "crusader" is one that has been used for many centuries. The word in our day, I fear, has fallen from its high estate. Almost everybody nowadays claims to be a crusader, even the fellows who believe in prohibition. [Laughter.] So the word, in my opinion, has become very cheap. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I regret I can not yield.

In the future I am afraid we are apt to get into trouble before we know it. We are trying to expand our trade and our commerce. Every man in public life speaks of the wonderful opportunities that lie before us in that direction. Now, there is nothing that is so apt to bring about international disturbances as seeking the trade of some other country and getting it. It causes trouble. No nation on earth wants to give up its trade if it can help it. It causes bad feeling between the peoples, between the nations, and that bad feeling unfortunately is frequently fanned into a flame that brings about war. I believe that the only salvation of this Nation is in being measurably prepared at all times to defend the rights of our country and its citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In doing that, of course, we will be preparing to defend the rights of the citizens, as you say, but we would not be organizing an army to follow a vision, would we?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, I believe that this country ought to have a measurably small Regular Army. I believe that we should have a very large body of citizens who are trained, so that upon the call of the President at any time, and the vote of Congress, they could immediately go into the various organizations and give the Nation its first line of defense until additional forces could be prepared.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield just now. I will later on. I want to make some progress.

In my opinion, it would be criminal carelessness to drift back into a condition of unpreparedness such as we were in at the time of our entrance into the great World War. The number of men that we had in the Regular Army was about 120,000. Probably 20,000 of those had enlisted only after the emergency arose which seemed to indicate that we would ultimately be drawn into the war. We had about 100,000 National Guardsmen who had had more or less training. So we had practically 200,000 men who had been reasonably trained. War immediately compelled the expansion of the military force of the country enormously. In this war we expanded to 4,000,000 men in the Army alone. In the Army and Navy together we had 4,864,000 men. Practically 3,800,000 of American soldiers that were called into the Army during the war had never had a particle of training. They had to learn everything from A to Z in military tactics and science. It took us, in consequence, 13 months to get ready before the first division was able to go into the battle line. During that time the Allies were holding the line, while we were getting ready. Perhaps never again in our history will such a fortuitous circumstance confront us.

It may happen in the future that some combination of nations may attack us, and if we were so unprepared as we were at the beginning of this war, our Nation would be humiliated and defeated before it could possibly hope to get ready. It is against that kind of a condition that I protest with all the vigor at my command.

Our position may be described somewhat in this manner: The captain of a ship, a passenger-carrying ship, and the corporation that owns it, might be foolish enough to send it out across the ocean without a proper complement of lifeboats or life preservers. Later this ship encounters a storm in mid-ocean, a terrific storm, and is wrecked. And because the ship has not the necessary safety appliances, hundreds of lives are lost. Our Nation is in the same situation as that ship if we are not prepared in the hour of stress to call our men to the colors so as to defend American rights.

The bill that is before us is not altogether what I would have written had I had the writing of the measure; but you gentlemen know that in these matters it is necessary to make compromises. Our whole system of government is founded on compromise. We have grown great as a Nation because we have been willing to get together and thrash out our differences and ultimately get as near a unanimous agreement as possible under existing circumstances and conditions. [Applause.] And so this bill comes before the House with a majority of the committee in favor of it. I presume there is not a single member of the committee who would not have changed some feature of it if he alone had been consulted. And so, on the whole, the bill is the expression of the opinion of a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, reached after extensive hearings, reached after a great deal of patient discussion in the committee itself. It expresses, therefore, the opinion of a majority of the committee.

Now, the most notable change in the bill from the national defense act is the flexibility that it gives to the organization of the line of the Army. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] criticized at some length this particular provision of the bill. I have here a chart which is very interesting. It gives particulars as to a regiment of Infantry. You will notice that one regiment of Infantry is composed of 3 battalions; the 3 battalions are again divided into 15 companies; 3 companies are headquarters companies. There is one headquarters company with each battalion of the regiment.

The headquarters companies were first authorized in the national defense act. The 15 companies again are divided into 61 platoons. A platoon is composed of anywhere from 32 to 56 officers and men. Before we entered the war an infantry regiment was composed of about 1,200 men. After we entered the war the President was given authority, under the Overman Act, to change the formation, and our Infantry regiments were then made up to 3,700 men, three times the number of men that were in an Infantry regiment before we went into the war. I believe every officer, not only of our own Army but of the other armies, contended that our formation was the best that was found on the battle fields of Europe.

Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] says that this is a new departure and that therefore he is against it. Well, as I pointed out a while ago, the selective draft was a new departure, and yet the country found it necessary, in order to raise the troops that were required to win the war. [Applause.] We ought at least, in my humble opinion, learn some lessons from the war. To fix the exact number of men that we could have in every unit of the Army would compel Congress to legislate constantly upon the subject. If you simply wanted one additional bugler in a company, it would, under the plan of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] require an act of Congress to get him.

After all, the plan of organization of the units of the fighting line of the Army is a soldier's problem. In my opinion it is not the duty of the legislative branch. The soldier has his experience to guide him. It is his life work. He wants to know what is best for his country, for his men, and for his cause.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield in a moment. And as new conditions arise the soldier ought to be permitted to change the organizations if he finds that this change will be for the betterment of the Military Establishment.

Now, I yield to my friend.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman from California mean to say to the House that he is willing to fix the total of the enlisted and commissioned strength of the Army by act of Congress and provide a lump-sum appropriation and turn it over to the General Staff?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has made that statement heretofore, but as I proceed I will show that he is entirely in error when he asserts that it would result in a lump-sum appropriation. In the Army to-day the Quartermaster General and the Staff Corps have their units fixed by the Commander in Chief of the Army, the President of the United States. Congress does not fix the strength nor the size of those units, and yet they have never come to us and asked for lump-sum appropriations for those organizations. After all, in regard to lump-sum appropriations, I am free to admit that we appropriate money for the Army and for the Navy on a somewhat different plan from what we do for the civilian departments of the Government.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. The Army appropriation bill carries the items for subsistence, for general supplies, for transportation, for clothing, for barracks and quarters, and a number of others that I can not recall just now, and the Committee on Military Affairs specifically writes in the bill a provision that these various sums may constitute one fund. During the war we constituted practically every dollar appropriated for the support of the Army one fund. But in peace time we constitute the appropriation for subsistence, and so forth, one fund.

Mr. DENT. That is because they are kindred.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; there are six or seven different items that are kindred, but they are practically a lump-sum appropriation under the Army appropriation bills as they have been passed by this House for many years that I know of; in other words, during the greater part of the time that I have been a Member of the House.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. The assertion has been made here on the floor to-day that we are top-heavy in the matter of officers. Will the gentleman find time in his 60 minutes to explain that?

Mr. KAHN. I hope to explain all those things.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, may I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true that for years, following the old custom, the statutes have prescribed, man for man and place for place, the tactical organization of the military forces, and then as regularly as we come into a war or in an emergency one of the first things we do is to remove that restriction and permit the Commander in Chief to reorganized according to the circumstances and the demands?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. That is what has happened in every war heretofore, and it is in order to allow our Army to function in peace time and get ready to prepare itself for any emergency that might occur that the majority of the committee advocate the change that is written in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question, because I sit at the feet of the gentleman for instruction?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman refer to the point he was on a few moments ago as to the flexibility that he advocates and state whether it applies to European establishments and whether the formation of the units of European armies was originally controlled by legislation?

Mr. KAHN. I believe they have flexibility. Their systems are all somewhat different from our own. But at the beginning of the war, when Gen. Pershing went to the other side, he began to study the conditions that prevailed in the armies of the Allies. He subsequently organized his forces to fight on the battle fields of Europe in conformity with the plans in use by British and French organizations. I believe that during the war our infantry regiment was larger than the infantry regiment of any other country. Our officers found that that was very desirable and very advisable, and we know with what splendid results our organizations entered the various battle fields and wrested victory from the enemy. [Applause.]

As I stated, we got into this war very unexpectedly. In 1916 we had had some border trouble. The National Guard of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona were called out in May, and the National Guard of the other States of the Union were called out in June, about 10 days after the national defense act was approved. We had our own troubles. Yet, we did not have the vision to make such changes in our Military Establishment as would provide an adequate force in case it became necessary to go into battle south of the Rio Grande.

It is against those conditions, as I said before, that I earnestly protest. Something has been said here about the cost of war. This war cost us in 19 months, with our loans to the Allies, $33,000,000,000, a sum that is simply staggering. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] and other gentlemen on this floor have called attention to the great burden that is placed upon the taxpayers of this country. That burden is placed there because we were unprepared. If we had been prepared, we would have avoided the burden. [Applause.] And it is a strange thing that in war the burden falls heaviest upon the masses. They are the men and women who furnish the soldiers. They are the men and women who ultimately pay the taxes. They are the people who suffer most of the hardships. The rich man can generally make provisions so that the burdens fall less heavily on his shoulders; therefore it is for the poor people of the country that I speak. I want their sons protected against war, and the only way to protect them against war is to have this country prepared against war. [Applause.] I apprehend that no nation and no combination of nations will ever attack the United States if we are ready to defend our rights. You find the same thing happening in everyday life. See the highwayman who lurks for a likely victim. He stands behind a tree or a wall looking for a wayfarer to come his way. When he sees a man who is able to take care of himself, to defend himself, he lets that man go by; but when an individual comes along whom he thinks he is able to worst in an encounter, that is the man he attacks, robs, and frequently seriously injures or even murders.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does not the gentleman think history bears out the fact that any country, whether weak or strong, prepared or unprepared, whenever it feels that its inalienable rights have been invaded, goes to war anyhow? Is not Belgium a living example of that?

Mr. KAHN. Belgium is a living example of the fact that she went to war to defend her rights. Was the gentleman in Belgium?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was.

Mr. KAHN. Did the gentleman see the terrible havoc in Belgium?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Yes; but that is not the point.

Mr. KAHN. I think it is to the point.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The point is——

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will try to answer his question.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Belgium was not prepared to defend her rights against the aggression of the greatest military power on earth; but Belgium was drawn into that war against her will. If she had been better prepared, the chances are that she would have been able to have held back the German enemy for a longer period than she did, and thus enable France and England to be prepared to meet the terrible onslaught of the onrushing foe. Switzerland is a little Republic that has had universal training since 1870. I have heard many people in this country speak of the Swiss system and how they would like to see it adopted here. The Swiss system is a system of compulsory universal training. Every boy has to take it. Switzerland has not had any wars in over 50 years, although the Germans were at her border and the French were at her border in two great wars; but they never invaded Switzerland.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield further right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Does the gentleman think that if Switzerland had been located geographically the same as Belgium, under similar conditions, where she lay between Germany and France, Germany would not have invaded the borders of Switzerland in order to get to France the same as she invaded Belgium?

Mr. KAHN. That is a supposititious case and I can not answer it. But I do know that Switzerland was not invaded. I know that Holland, which has conscription and a regularly conscripted army, was not invaded, whereas Belgium was invaded, and Belgium, I learned, did not have a conscripted army like the other countries of Europe.

Some talk has been indulged in on the floor during this debate about universal training. I do not apologize to anybody in this country for my attitude on that subject. I do not intend to go into that question at this time. I hope before this Congress goes out of existence I will be able to present to the House a thoroughly worked-out system as a part of our military policy. I shall try to defend that matter when it comes up by itself and give the House all the information that I have been able to glean upon the subject. I have given it some study and some attention. I am satisfied that if the Congress of the United States, learning a lesson from this war through which we have just passed, will train our young men we will not have any occasion to fear for the future.

I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] spoke yesterday about sending young men to the trenches or to the advance lines who had had only three weeks' training. I believe Col. Donovan testified before the Senate committee that some of those men who came to his organization as replacement troops had even a less period of training than that. Such a condition of affairs in a great Republic like ours is indefensible.

People speak of the cost of universal training. I have figures from the War Department showing that it will cost $130,000,000 a year. It will take us 200 years to expend in universal training a sum equal to the great total of $33,000,000,000 that we spent in 19 months of war. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman suggested that it was his hope, before the adjournment of the present Congress, to bring in a bill providing for universal military training. I ask the gentleman, from his knowledge of the personnel of the Committee on Military Affairs as now composed, if he thinks it at all probable that he will be able to secure the adoption of a bill of that character by that committee?

Mr. KAHN. I think it will be possible to bring a bill into the House and get a vote on it. I do not know whether I can secure its adoption by the House, but the gentleman from New York indicated that the people of this country are studying this question, and I propose, if I can, to bring a great many facts, on both sides of the proposition, because I intend to get both sides of it in order that the Members of the House shall have the necessary information upon which to vote intelligently.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. BEE. I think the gentleman from California did not understand the gentleman from Alabama. He referred to universal military service.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; I thought he said universal training. There is quite a difference between universal service and universal training. Universal service means that the young man is taken into the Army and becomes a part of the Army while he is being trained. That is not my purpose at all. There is no subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee authorized for the purpose of considering the subject of universal service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will permit, I think it is proper for me to say that that is the idea I sought to convey by my question.

Mr. KAHN. I am sure the gentleman intended to ask that. I believe he did ask it. To my mind universal training is our greatest insurance for peace.

The bill provides for an aggregate force of 280,000 men, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts, who number 12,000 enlisted men and 7,000 unassigned recruits, in the aggregate a force of enlisted men of 299,000.

Some doubt has been expressed on this floor as to whether we will be able by voluntary enlistment to raise such a large force. I will say frankly that unless the situation changes materially with respect to voluntary enlistment, we will probably not be able at any time, except in imminence of an emergency, to raise that great force of enlisted men.

The War Department started out on an intensive drive to secure, from January 19 to March 31, 1920, 84,000 volunteers for the Regular Army. My latest information is that they have not reached more than 12,000 enlistments, so that the percentage of men who have gone into the Army compared with the number that it was hoped to get is comparatively small.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does not the gentleman believe that if the private soldier was paid more than $30 a month the voluntary response would be much better?

Mr. KAHN. I can only say this to the gentleman: I think his premises are absolutely correct, but I should very much dislike to think that we had to hire men to go into the Army of the United States.

Mr. UPSHAW. Not in a time of emergency, they go in for patriotism, but when it is a lifetime business I think we ought to make it so attractive that they will be glad to go in.

Mr. KAHN. Under this bill—and I will come to that in a few moments—the private soldier can get such allowances so that his pay will be something like $90 per month, besides, of course, his shelter, his clothing, his food, and everything else, which will amount to as much, possibly, as he can procure in many civilian employments.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Can the gentleman state how many soldiers we have in the enlisted Army, exclusive of those in the foreign service?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and I am glad the gentleman asked the question. The law allowing voluntary enlistments in our Army was passed February 28, 1919. It went into effect on the following day, the 1st of March, and the number of enlistments we had up to March 1, this year, is approximately 171,000.

Mr. RAMSEYER. All the new enlistments went in for three years?

Mr. KAHN. Some for one year and some for three years. As I recall, 89,000 went in for one year and 82,000 for three years.

Mr. RAMSEYER. One hundred and seventy-one thousand, I understand, represents the number of enlisted men in this country?

Mr. KAHN. That is correct.

Mr. RAMSEYER. A moment ago the gentleman stated that when war was declared we had something like 120,000 men in the Army. If the gentleman remembers, we had several months of war excitement which induced men to get into the service.

Mr. KAHN. We had border troubles which filled up our National Guard to practically its full strength.

Mr. RAMSEYER. And several months before war was declared it was realized that we were going to get into the war. Young men enlisted in order to get into the fight. With that experience can the committee give us the reason why they thought we could get an Army in profound peace of 299,000 men?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that when an emergency becomes imminent our National Guard and Regular Army begins to fill up. There was many a young American who enlisted in one of the foreign armies, so that the figures that you have about the condition of our own Army do not fully explain the situation as to the attitude of these young men who are ready for a fight.

Mr. RAMSEYER. We got 120,000, partly due to war excitement, in the Regular Army. In this bill you have written the figures at 299,000. At the time we entered the war we had increased it to 175,000. Simply writing figures in the bill does not make an army. How are you going to raise the number to 299,000 after the war is over and no inducement is offered these young men in the Regular Establishment? Will it not go back to a Regular Army of 150,000?

Mr. KAHN. I am afraid that ultimately we will have to go back to that sized army. But this bill prescribes only the aggregate size of these various units. If we should ever again meet an emergency which would require our getting fighting young men, it is a good thing to have the law on the statute books, because the adventurous and patriotic young men will be able immediately to enlist without any additional legislation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Then, does the committee here have in mind a bill to take care of war and also for the establishment of a peace-time army?

Mr. KAHN. As I told the House at the start, the only excuse for spending a dollar for our Military Establishment is to enable our Army to function if we get into war. If we were to authorize only a small number of men for a standing army and emergencies should come, during which the President might be negotiating with some foreign country with which we had some serious misunderstanding, I do not think we should be in the position where we would have to pass positive legislation in time of such stress to enable our Army to be filled up. I think it is the part of wisdom to do that in time of peace, so that we can use our forces accordingly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I agree with the gentleman fully; but the question I would like to have settled in my mind is how big an army it is proposed to have in time of peace?

Mr. KAHN. We will have such an army as Congress will provide the appropriations for, and we will have on the statute books a law which will enable us to go to the full limit of 299,000 men.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But that does not answer my question.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. WELTY. How many officers does this bill provide for?

Mr. KAHN. The number of officers provided for under the proposed legislation is 17,832. The number of enlisted men, as stated, outside of the Philippine Scouts and the unassigned recruits, is 280,000. I have here a chart which shows how these men are to be divided under the provisions of the bill—the number of officers and the number of men; but the flexibility that I spoke of a while ago is carried out so that the President may increase or diminish any branch of the service as the exigencies of the situation may require, by not to exceed 10 per cent of the total of the forces authorized by law. For instance, in the Infantry we have, under the bill, 4,201 officers and 110,000 men. It may develop that it is very desirable to increase the number of men in the Engineers. Under this bill the President will, without further act of Congress, transfer from the Infantry and put into the Engineers such a number of men, not to exceed 10 per cent of the total strength of the Infantry, as the situation might require. So with every other organization of the Army. That is the flexibility that the conditions of this war determined should be absolutely given to the Commander in Chief of the Army, and to my mind it is one of the best features of the proposed legislation.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I understood the gentleman to agree that the probability is that there would not be as many as 299,000 men enlist voluntarily, but hearing a part of the speech of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] this morning, the question I want answered is, Would it be possible in case, say, 115,000 men were in the Army, for the Army to be top heavy because of having a full quota of officers to the number of 17,832?

Mr. KAHN. I can not conceive of the total number of officers being appointed, unless we had the men, and I assume that the administrative branch of the Government will act accordingly; but I would call to the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KINCHELOE] the fact that it is absolutely essential that we have the proper complement of officers in peace time, even if we have not the men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think it will be apparent, if anyone makes a study of tactical military organization, as it is to-day, that the number of officers required for oversight and discipline, control, and maintenance of any force can not be determined by the ratio of the relation to the enlisted men.

Mr. BEE. For the reason, may I suggest, that unless you have the officers, it would be no advantage to you to build up the number of men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. None; and the only permanent part of the Army is the officers in any event. The enlisted men come in ebbs and flows, and no matter whether you have so many enlisted men or not, there are certain duties in the performance of which only officers can be utilized, and they must be there anyway; and they are being prepared against any emergency, for there is no time to make officers overnight.

Mr. KAHN. There is here a chart which shows the ratio of authorized commissioned strength to authorized enlisted strength of the Regular Army since 1850.

You will find that in the period from 1850 to 1860—and the period of 1850 was shortly after the Mexican War—we had at one time over 10 officers to 100 enlisted men. We drifted along a little while until 1855, and then there was a slight drop, and we had about 9 officers to 100 enlisted men. It ran along about that average until 1861. Then there was a sudden drop, so that we had practically 5 officers to 100 enlisted men.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has used 60 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield myself 15 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 15 minutes additional.

Mr. KAHN. That was due to the fact that we had hundreds of thousands of enlisted men but no appreciable increase in the number of officers to the organization, and so that ran along in that way for quite a number of years. But gradually the number increased again until in the period between 1879 and 1895 we again had about 9 officers to 100 enlisted men. Then the Spanish-American War came on right after that, and again there was a great drop in the number of officers, because we increased the enlisted personnel of the Army enormously. It ran that way for several years, and then the number of officers increased under congressional legislation, so that finally, about 1914, we were down to 4.9 per cent of officers to 100 enlisted men, which is the number carried in the national-defense act. Slowly and gradually the number has increased, so that in 1915 we had about five officers.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is that chart based upon the authorized strength or the actual strength?

Mr. KAHN. On the actual strength of officers and enlisted men.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand; but as to this bill that is only the authorized strength?

Mr. KAHN. This is the authorized strength also.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is what I wanted to get at. It is only the authorized strength and not necessarily the actual strength?

Mr. KAHN. It is the authorized strength. The pending House bill provides 6 officers to 100 men. That percentage, you will see, is smaller than what it has been in many years of our country's history in the past. Here is a chart that is likewise very interesting. It shows the number of field officers authorized by existing law as compared with the number authorized in the pending House bill. The field officers, as the gentlemen are aware, are the majors, lieutenant colonels, and the colonels. Under the existing law the field officers of the line are: Majors 7.7 per cent, lieutenant colonels 2.9 per cent, and colonels 2.6 per cent. Those are the numbers in the combatant forces of the Army. Now, in the Medical Corps we have 23.7 per cent of majors, lieutenant colonels 5.4 per cent, and colonels 3.2 per cent. In the Engineers the majors number 14.3 per cent, lieutenant colonels 6 per cent, and colonels 4.6 per cent. In the Navy officers holding corresponding ranks to majors are 14 per cent, to lieutenant colonels 7 per cent, and to colonels 4 per cent. Now, in the bill that is pending before the House, notwithstanding this talk on the floor of a superabundance of officers, there are only 15 per cent of majors, 4.5 per cent of lieutenant colonels, and 4 per cent of colonels. So that the pending House bill practically puts the Army and the Navy on a similar plane as to the number of officers of high command.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Is there not going to be a great deal of trouble in getting officers at the rate of pay that is paid them now?

Mr. KAHN. Well, there have been many resignations, but I still have hope that enough men are imbued with the desire to serve their country in the Army. I imagine that we will be able to get them, although the opportunities to-day in private life are so much greater than what an officer in the Army is paid for practically a similar service that I marvel why so many officers remain in the Army.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Is it true that a second lieutenant at $1,700 a year gets less actual pay than a first sergeant; that is, less actual money after he has paid his living expenses?

Mr. KAHN. I would not say that is true as to a first sergeant, but it might be true as to a sergeant major or some one of the higher-paid sergeants.

Mr. PLATT. I have heard men in the enlisted ranks say that themselves.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I presume it may be so, although I have never investigated the matter myself.

Now, the bill provides among other things for warrant officers. This is an entirely new provision.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield? I was going to ask you to describe what a warrant officer is.

Mr. KAHN. Yes, sir. We have under existing law about a dozen warrant officers. They came into the Army when the Army took over the mine-planting personnel of the Artillery Corps. Before we went into the war many of the men—in fact, all of the men—on the little vessels in the various harbors were civilians, and if they were ordered out to do a particularly hazardous piece of work during a great storm they could quit their jobs. This they frequently did, I am told.

Now, we took over that service and put the civilian employees under the enlisted personnel of the Army. Some of the men on those little steamers were warrant officers; as such they are recognized by the Navy and also, I believe, by the merchant marine. And so we got into the Army about a dozen warrant officers. Now, in this war there were a great many old reliable enlisted men who had served their country for some years; they had had a number of reenlistments and were splendid soldiers. They were commissioned in the emergency army, led troops, and performed signal service for their country in the war. Unless something of this sort is done for these men they will again revert to their former position of enlisted men, and the committee felt that it was exceedingly advisable to create a new grade for these men. And so they provided in the pending bill for the grade of warrant officers, which grade shall follow immediately after the commissioned personnel; immediately after the second lieutenant. But the man receives a warrant as his commission, and he serves therefore as a warrant officer.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman please explain if that is about the same thing as a warrant officer in the Navy?

Mr. KAHN. They say it is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If it does not divert the gentleman from the continuity of his argument, I would like to ask if he has examined the relative proportions of resignations as between West Point officers and officers of the Army who have not come into the Army through that institution?

Mr. KAHN. I have not examined the matter, but I want to call to the attention of the gentleman this fact: In studying the table of resignations I find many of those who resigned were men who held provisional commissions. They were not really fully confirmed as officers in the Army, although I regret to say many officers who have resigned were members of the Regular Army who had performed signal service for their country. But they felt they could not continue in the Army with the small rate of pay, and when they found better opportunities in private fields they reluctantly resigned.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Did those considerations actuate many of the men who were West Point graduates and who went into the Army from West Point?

Mr. KAHN. I have not heard.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think it would be very interesting if the House could know that.

Mr. KAHN. I will try to get the information, and when we consider the measure under the five-minute rule I will be glad to inform the gentleman, if I have been able to secure the data.

Mr. PLATT. Only about 50 per cent of our officers were West Point graduates before the war, or a little less.

Mr. KAHN. It was considerably less. I think at the present time about one-third of the officers of the Army are West Point graduates.

Mr. BEE. If the gentleman will permit in that connection a suggestion, I will say that in recent years there has been a very large increase in the commissioned force from the enlisted men of the Army, which was not the case in the years that had passed, and for that reason the majority of them are not West Point graduates.

Mr. KAHN. Now, in this matter of flexibility, the best illustration I could give you as to the desirability of such a provision is what happened during this war. The national-defense act provided for 25 regiments of Cavalry. In this war there was not much use for cavalry, and so the War Department cut the Cavalry regiments down from 25 to 17. But we were woefully lacking in field artillery, and this war was one in which field artillery played a very essential part. So the War Department increased largely the Field Artillery to meet the exigencies of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has consumed the additional 15 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I thank you very much.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER. I think the chairman of our committee overlooked the matter of the single list of the Army. I believe it would be of interest to every Member of the House.

Mr. KAHN. I shall try to reach that in the time so kindly yielded to me by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Heretofore it has challenged the attention of every member of the Committee on Military Affairs that as soon as his chair in the committee room had been warmed practically every bill that was considered by the committee involved the matter of promotion. Gen. Pershing stated before the joint committee of the two Houses that practically every Army officer went around with a little reorganization bill in his own pocket, which he would try to have considered and which involved promotion in his branch of the Army. That is a natural thing, probably, to do, because after all it is only human for a man to desire to better his condition in life. But the provision which the committee has inserted in the bill and which the committee hopes will be adopted by the House will remove the temptation to secure individual promotions, because the single list as it appears in the bill will make unnecessary all efforts to secure advances for any particular branch of the service. I may add that it has practically the unanimous support of the officers of the Army.

Under that provision the officers will be placed upon a list prepared by a board of officers who will study the length of service in all the various branches that each officer has had, and then place him in his proper place on the single list. Promotion under those circumstances will come regularly if the man continues in the Army. It will not be necessary for him to bother about the subject. The bill provides how it shall be done.

Ultimately there will be a weeding out, if the provision be carried, of those who experience has determined ought not to be further continued on the active list of the Army. There will be two lists, A and B. The officers on the A list will continue right along and reach their promotion as vacancies in the Army arise. Those in class B will be eliminated. Those in that class who have had 10 years' service in the Army will be allowed to resign. Those who have had over 10 years' service will be put on the retired list, with 2½ per cent of the pay for every year of the years they have been in the service.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How is this list compiled? That is, who is it who decides whether the officer shall go on the A list or on the B list?

Mr. KAHN. The bill provides that a commission of officers shall arrange those lists.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Does not that really mean that personal acquaintance will affect promotion?

Mr. KAHN. I understand not. I understand that in every case the officer's record in the Army will be the basis of the action for the commission. [Applause.] In other words, during all the years that a man has been in the Army his efficiency reports have been sent to The Adjutant General's Office, and those efficiency reports will be taken as the basis for determining the final standing of the officer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. With the gentleman's consent, I was going to suggest that the question which the gentleman from Minnesota proposed does not relate to promotion at all. It is a question whether or not a man stays in the Army. If he finds himself in class A because of his meritorious record, then he gets the promotion automatically by reason of seniority.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am fully in accord with the gentleman's position as to promotion from the single list, as I pointed out yesterday, but I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why, after the Committee on Military Affairs had come to the conclusion that that was the proper basic principle upon which to make up this list for promotion, they should provide that in arranging this list officers shall retain their present order on the lineal list without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list, and then it goes on further and sets out five different classes or groups as exceptions to that rule?

Mr. KAHN. I do not remember the precise provisions of the bill in that regard, and I have not the time to go into that fully now; but I will say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that my colleagues on the committee told me of the gentleman's position, and I hope that when we reach that section of the bill we can explain the matter to the entire satisfaction of the gentleman. I have only two or three minutes remaining, and I would therefore beg the gentleman to allow me to take up that matter when we reach that portion of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course, I do not want to trespass on the gentleman's courtesy.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say that there are many features of the bill that I have been unable to discuss——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for this statement?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I have some time left, and I will yield to the gentleman, if he desires.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say in all frankness to my courteous friend from Alabama that "the gentleman from California" feels rather tired and would like to conclude in a few moments. There are many provisions of the bill, of course, that we have not been able to touch upon, but when the bill is up under the five-minute rule my colleagues and myself on the committee who favor the bill will be glad to explain every proposition contained in the bill to the best of our ability. [Applause.]

This morning I told the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] I had a list which showed the distribution of field officers provided for in the pending bill which I would insert in the RECORD in my time.

The list is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired. Is there further general debate?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusettes [Mr. FULLER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote in favor of this military bill, because the lesson of the war is that we should be prepared. Theodore Roosevelt summed up a safe and sound policy for our Nation when he said that a man should speak softly but carry a big stick. It strikes me as right and proper that we should be legislating for an enlarged Army at the very moment when the peace treaty is being done to death in the Senate. It is because the treaty is being done to death that I believe that it is essential that we should spend so many millions for the Army and the Navy.

If the United States is going to stay on the outside, if the United States is going to go it alone, we must equip ourselves to do it. If we are to cast away the opportunity offered in the League of Nations, we must prepare ourselves for the alternative.

The United States can elect a course of academic isolation if the Senate so wills. The Senate can not guarantee or secure actual isolation. When Francis Ferdinand was shot at Serajevo in 1914 the United States was entangled, though it took us a long time to find out the fact. No boiling of the European pot can happen henceforth without threatening to entangle the United States. There is no isolation possible.

We can cut off all facilities for peace.

We can repudiate every offer of arbitration.

We can refuse to entertain any plan for mutual adjustment.

We can deny every chance for lessening the need for military and naval equipment.

But we can not build a wall about the United States and ignore the rest of the world.

If we reject the chance to enter the League of Nations, we have got to be ready to fight.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. My time is very short. If the gentleman will permit me to finish my speech, then I will yield.

Mr. BLANTON. That is such a remarkable speech from the Republican side that I think the gentleman ought to yield.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I wondered if the Secretary of War did not ask for about a half million men in the Army a year ago, when we presumably had a League of Nations.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I do not think we will have a League of Nations with the United States in it.

I am in favor, practically speaking, of every plan and every method making for preparedness advocated by this bill. I would go even further. I think we ought to recognize the efforts that our blood-drinking junker Senators are putting forth in the Senate to such a degree that we arm the women, and then the next step is a perfectly logical one, of instructing the children in military tactics. Every child should be able to handle a dirk in a clinch. Have them carry their books and luncheons to school on their backs like the German children by way of preparing them for knapsacks later. Because not only are the opponents of the treaty outraging every sense of justice of our allies but they are stirring up internal strife which will call, sooner or later, for a standing Army to keep peace at home. For, as the Secretary of the Navy said:

> We must have a League of Nations by which every nation will help preserve the peace of the world without competitive naval building, or we must have incomparably the biggest Navy in the world. With the league in operation, composed at first of all the nations allied or associated in the World War, and with provision for admittance of all other nations opposed to conquest and militarism, it would not be necessary to impose on the taxpayers of America the assessments necessary for building more capital ships.

When he appeared before the House Naval Affairs Committee on Saturday Secretary Daniels said that the question for Congress to decide was whether the United States should complete the three years' program of construction and add units needed by the Navy, such as more light cruisers and submarines, or expand the fleet until this country would have nothing to fear from any other sea power. If the United States failed to ratify the peace treaty and accept the covenant of the League of Nations, which, as planned, was to prevent war on a large and costly scale and lead to an era of peaceful industry, each nation would have to look to its own defenses and depend upon its resources.

It was not necessary for the Secretary of the Navy to tell his countrymen that the alternative to staying out of the League of Nations would be naval expansion. Nothing could be more obvious, although Senators, besides those composing the so-called Battalion of Death, have been blind to the isolated and detached position that the United States would occupy if the treaty and covenant were rejected. [Applause.] Furthermore, supporters of the covenant realize that it would be a rope of sand for the late allies of the United States if this country refused to join them in the peace compact. Competition in armaments would begin all over again, however the European nations and Japan might dedicate themselves to economy by lip service.

Great Britain, which is expanding her merchant fleet to obtain the lion's share of the trade of the world, would follow her traditional policy of keeping up her navy with the ingenuity in construction for which she is justly famous. Economy in naval armaments would fly out of the window as profits in trade increased.

It is true that Great Britain has reduced the number of her warships in commission, but she continues to build great fighting dreadnoughts like the Hood and the Renown, always striving to keep in the van of invention and military prowess. Her navy is still the most powerful on the seas, counting her dreadnoughts in reserve which could be mobilized on call. Japan's program is not as ambitious as the uncompleted three years' program of the United States, but Japan is planning to be as strong in the Pacific as her resources permit. The Japanese are an intensely practical people. Only if the United States were to ratify the peace treaty and agree to join the League of Nations would Great Britain and Japan practice the economy in naval expenditure they preach with mental reservations. Nor are they to be blamed for not abandoning naval expansion altogether when almost a year has elapsed since the document of the peace treaty was finished and the United States still remains obstructive and apparently indifferent.

Never had a nation a more golden opportunity to bestow the boon of peace upon the world than has come to the United States because of its moral influence and its vast resources. It has but to approve of the covenant and stand forth as the most powerful champion of a new era of humanity, enlightenment, and progress, and rumors of war will be instantly laid. [Applause.] From east to west the nations would breathe freely and the federation of the world for peace would no longer be a dream. Every thoughtful American knows as well as Secretary Daniels that, the covenant once and forever rejected by the United States, it will fall to pieces and the old order of suspicion, distrust, and preparation for the wars that can not be averted will return. The first American line of defense, the Navy, will have to be made so strong that not only no enemy but no combination of hostile powers will be feared.

The passions and prejudices of various classes in our population are being appealed to and one nationality set against another for political advantage. These junkers, I believe, are creating a creature like Frankenstein of old, that eventually will get out of their control and cause all kinds of misery and disaster. Do you not hear that sound which is constantly growing louder, which is becoming so loud that it even begins to drown out the roar of oratory, the sound of voices which ask for peace, which desire the olive branch of love rather than the laurels of hatred?

After these treaty busters have defeated the treaty the next thing on the schedule is universal military training. Then should come war with Mexico. In fact, I believe that when a representative of another body, whose name can not be mentioned here, went to visit the President about a month ago to look into his physical condition, that had they found him incapacitated they would then have rushed us into intervention in Mexico. There surely is a junker element in this country, just as surely as there was in Germany before the war—a gang of pirates who believe that might makes right. This junker element has a liberal support from some newspapers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I thank the gentleman very much. Due to the marvelous prosperity and rapid growth of this country, there is an element in it that has made money rapidly. They have made it so rapidly that they are arrogant, and in order to further advance their interests and influence they buy newspapers, thereby to a large degree coloring the news and disseminating their own political views. Surely most anybody in this House will agree with me that, take a given question, you can pretty surely tell which side of the question certain newspapers will take. Some of the newspapers—a fairly good number—are honest and square. God bless 'em! But the majority of big newspapers in this country, in my humble opinion, are owned directly or indirectly by big business, and the influence of those newspapers goes to reward those men who hold political office and do in the office what is for the interests of big business. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I have not time to finish now.

Mr. BLANTON. We will give you more time.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. The next thing the junkers will have to propose will be consumption taxes. As if the consumers did not pay the tax now, and the taxes were not added to the cost of production! No, my friends, this bill is not large enough in its military preparations to take care of the enemies the foes to the peace treaty are creating.

It has caused me considerable amusement to observe the wild solicitations of certain men for the Monroe doctrine. In one breath they curse the treaty because we pledge ourselves to protect all countries from land grabbers and territorial encroachment, and in the next breath they demand that we stand for the Monroe doctrine so that no nation can seek advantage in this hemisphere. These mischievous advocates of the Monroe doctrine knew perfectly well that if they could make America demand certain advantages in this hemisphere, Japan would be warranted in making claim for special advantages over there, and so on, like the dog who had a flea upon his back to bite him, and that flea had another flea, and so on ad infinitum. Two years ago America was the moral leader of the world, and Lenin and Trotski were despised. To-day the junkers have compelled America to flunk and reverse itself to such a degree that in every country on the face of the globe America is despised, and they are about reconciled to greet Lenin and Trotski with open arms.

I went into a little barber shop the other day up in New Hampshire and saw a young chap there that I had not seen for a year or two. I asked him where he had been, and he said he had been in the Army, he had been to Europe, he had been fighting in the war to end all wars, but he said the next time the band played and they asked him to enlist he was going to tell them to go to hell. The fruits of the war which our doughboys won in Europe have been pretty well dissipated. Personally I admire

Wilson's courage in going over to Europe to participate in negotiating the treaty. [Applause.] He had everything to lose and nothing to gain in a way, as far as his personal fortunes went. I believe he risked everything in going over there in an effort to clinch the victory that the American boys had fought and died for. [Applause.]

We have paid in lives for winning the Great War. We have spent our treasure in keeping these countries from bankruptcy, but there are those amongst us who would not have us participate in the terms of peace, the object of which is to prevent another just such war. Must the world go through another convulsion before these men will come to their senses?

I believe if the American Senate had cooperated with the President that we could have laid the foundation for a league to enforce peace that would prevent future war. I believe the reactionaries who have lost sight of the promises made to the people during the war have lost sight of the obligation they owe to the men who fought the war, and will yet rue the day they indulged their partisanship and petty animosity to a Democratic President to the extent of defeating the treaty. The explanation for the animosity to the treaty I find as disgusting as the tactics that are employed to defeat it. Imagine as a reason for defeating this great instrument to prevent future wars the fact that the President did not ask so-and-so or so-and-so over as a peace delegate! Personally, I wish he had invited some Republicans to go with him, although I can well appreciate that he was fearful that after he had given them his confidence they would reward it with the same gratitude and loyalty as that exhibited by Sims on a recent occasion. [Laughter.]

With a deficit of $4,000,000,000 staring us in the face for this year, with the knowledge that the initial first year cost of training the 800,000 eligible young men would be very close to $1,000,000,000, in addition to the cost of our Regular Army and National Guard, which under this bill is estimated from $480,000,000 to $600,000,000, I am convinced that our committee has acted wisely in postponing consideration of compulsory training until another session of Congress, when we can have the benefit of more careful and detailed information on the subject. I am in favor of ratifying the treaty, and that instead of being the last nation on earth to join in with the other nations in working out a plan of disarmament that America take the lead and win this great victory for peace and righteousness just as our boys won the war in France.

President Taft once told me of a visit he made to Tokyo on his way to the Philippines. He said he was given a marvelous reception—hundreds of thousands of people jammed the streets and nothing was too good for them. A few months after that his boat came into the harbor of Tokyo, and during the interval of his visits President Roosevelt had brought Russia and Japan together at Portsmouth. Word was sent out to President Taft that he had better not land. The opinion of the populace had veered about in the opposite direction. And so I warn these men who are indulging their partisanship at this time at the expense of the treaty to beware.

I voted for universal military training. In my own mind it will ever stand as the Republican substitute for the League of Nations, but I warn you, my friends, when you have put through this junker program and the blight of war does fall upon us once again, God have mercy on your souls! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more. [Applause.]

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. I wish to say a word about a united air service. I was on the subcommittee that considered this question, and as a member of the subcommittee I voted to favorably report it to the main committee. Since that time I have come to believe that perhaps the advocates of a united air service were a little more zealous in their cause than those opposed to it, because a later study of the question had led me to believe a united air service would be a mistake. I do not believe a united air service can build an airplane better adapted to the needs of the Navy than the Navy Department can build it. I believe we should preserve for the Navy the right to experiment, develop, and build along such lines as they approve machines for their own particular service. I believe that applies equally to the Army and to the Post Office. I believe the principle of allowing these different branches of the service to specialize on the machine to suit their own requirements is sound.

For example, the Army turned over to the Post Office Department a 12-cylinder De Haviland airplane. The Post Office found that they could take off the 12-cylinder engine and by making it into two 6-cylinder engines place one on each wing. It was much better adapted to their service and would do the following things that the other airplane would not do:

They could ascend from a small field. The two engines with the two propellers would enable them to reach a given altitude in a shorter time than the 12-cylinder engine with a single propeller.

Second. They could land in a small field because with the two engines they had a larger wing surface. This made for greater resistance and therefore slowed the airplane up sufficiently so they could land in a small area.

Third. They found that with the two separate engines they had two chances of staying in the air as against one, because if one engine went back on them they could still run the other, whereas with a 12-cylinder engine if 6 cylinders went back on them they could not stay in the the air with the other 6.

I am very enthusiastic about the single list for promotions which is being substituted for the lineal list. The present system of lineal promotion is detrimental to the morale of an efficient military establishment. The personal equation is too strong a factor in the problem. Under the present plan an officer's promotion depended in a large measure on the expansion of that branch of the Army to which he was attached. As a result every officer had an eye to the expansion of the organization to which he belonged, usually to the detriment of some other branch of the service. The effect of this condition has been to create jealousy in the various branches and to bring pressure to bear upon Congress to expand certain military units out of all proportion to their importance. Under the proposed plan no officer can derive personal benefit from the expansion of any particular branch, as all promotions will come equally to all branches or arms of the service. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have some time left, but I will not use any further time in the general debate on this bill.

Mr. KAHN. Then, I understand from the gentleman that in the morning we can proceed with the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12213. An act authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg.;

H. R. 12164. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River, between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, in the State of Washington; and

H. J. Res. 305. Joint resolution to amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3037. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment and road-making material to various services and departments of the Government and for the use of the States.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GREEN of Iowa, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. O'CONNELL, indefinitely, on account of the illness of his wife.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House dispense with the proceedings of the Calendar Wednesday call to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the business of Calendar Wednesday to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if the steering committee has been monkeying with the clock above the Speaker's chair? The hands have been pointing to the same place ever since this morning. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that the man who is supposed to take care of the clock is a Democratic hold over. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I presume the purpose of the gentleman in dispensing with Calendar Wednesday is to get through with the military bill sooner, so that we can take up the foreign-relief bill, which the steering committee have promised to bring out. [Laughter.] I will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] was partly correct. The clock on the gallery railing in front of the Speaker, which is running, is kept by a Democrat, and the one behind the Speaker, which has stopped, is kept by a Republican. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House, under the previous order, adjourned until Wednesday, March 10, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Noyo River, Calif., including an entrance channel across the bar at the mouth (H. Doc. No. 679), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. KAHN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 491) calling for information from the War Department concerning motor trucks or tractors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 731), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12201) for the relief of Elizabeth F. Sullivan; Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (H. R. 12919) granting a pension to Clara C. Biernbaumer; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 12920) granting a pension to Mary L. Brown Point; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 12618) granting a pension to John O'Neil; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GILLETT (by request): A bill (H. R. 12994) to provide for the world-wide extension of education by the cooperation of national governments; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. KELLEY of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 12995) extending authority to order boards of medical examiners, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, resolution (H. Res. 492) providing for a shipping clerk in the folding room of the House in lieu of a folder; to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BENHAM: A bill (H. R. 12998) granting a pension to Evaline Wilson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 12999) granting a pension to Myron H. McMullen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 13000) to correct the military record of Nathaniel Staub; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CRAGO: A bill (H. R. 13001) for the relief of the Rock of the Marne Post, No. 138, composed of men who served in the Thirty-eighth Infantry; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DARROW: A bill (H. R. 13002) to reinstate George H. McConnon in the Navy as a surgeon; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. DRANE: A bill (H. R. 13003) granting a pension to Barthoid Hinsdorff; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 13004) granting an increase of pension to Martha A. Brown; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GARD: A bill (H. R. 13005) granting a pension to Cevilla Wise; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GOULD: A bill (H. R. 13006) for the relief of Fred S. Johnston; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska: A bill (H. R. 13007) granting a pension to William H. Knowles; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MURPHY: A bill (H. R. 13008) granting an increase of pension to Caroline Strobel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'CONNELL: A bill (H. R. 13009) for the relief of Frank Karl; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. STOLL: A bill (H. R. 13010) for the relief of J. M. Holladay; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WOODYARD: A bill (H. R. 13011) granting a pension to Duracey E. Ash; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

2182. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers of New York, relative to the adoption of foreign policy as regards the oil industry; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

2183. Also (by request), petition of the board of estimate and apportionment, of New York City, relative to certain provisions in the rivers and harbors bill, etc.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy gracious favor as we come to face the responsibilities of another day. We know that fitness of character is fitness for the highest service. We pray that Thy grace may be vouchsafed to us that we may be thoroughly furnished for every good word and work, our hearts purified from every ignoble and wrong motive, our thoughts drawn out after God's own mind, that we may do God's will and follow Thy commandments in all things. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, March 8, 1920, was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Lodge	Simmons
Beckham	Glass	McCormick	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gore	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Gronna	McLean	Smith, S. C.
Calder	Hale	McNary	Smoot
Capper	Harrison	Nelson	Spencer
Chamberlain	Henderson	New	Sterling
Colt	Hitchcock	Norris	Thomas
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Underwood
Dial	Kellogg	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Kendrick	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kenyon	Poindexter	Warren
Elkins	Keyes	Pomerene	Watson
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Williams
France	Kirby	Reed	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Sheppard
Gay	Lenroot	Sherman

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is detained by illness in his family, and the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

DISTRICT PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the request of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] that he be relieved from further service as a member of the special committee to investigate the public-school system of the District of Columbia, the Chair appoints the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to fill the vacancy.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 3037. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer certain surplus motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment and road-making material to various services and departments of the Government, and for the use of the States;

H. R. 12164. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 12213. An act authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nestucca River, in Tillamook County, Oreg.; and

H. J. Res. 305. Joint resolution to amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SPENCER. I present a memorial from certain farm owners along the Missouri River regarding the preservation of the banks of that stream. I ask that the memorial may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER, Senator,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned, your constituents and farm owners on the north bank of the Missouri River in the vicinity of Peers, Marthasville, and Treloor, in Warren County, Mo., would respectfully advise you that during the year 1919 United States Government engineers began the revetting of the north bank of the Missouri River in the vicinity of our farms and have left the same in an unfinished condition for the reason, as we are informed, that no appropriations have been made by Congress for the completion of the work thus begun. Unless the work begun is completed according to the original plan all work and money thus far spent upon this project will be an utter waste.

We therefore respectfully petition you to use your best efforts in Congress to provide for at least sufficient appropriations of funds by Congress for the completion of all unfinished work thus begun on the Missouri River.

We realize the wisdom of economy on the part of the Government, but to allow work of this kind, after the same has been once begun, to remain in a half-completed condition is no economy.

Respectfully submitted.

DR. G. A. GRUEBBEL, Marthasville, Mo.,
(And others).

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask to have printed in the RECORD telegrams embodying resolutions adopted by the Tennessee State Pastors Conference and the Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in session at Nashville, Tenn.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may read them if he desires to do so, but the telegrams can not go into the RECORD unless they are read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that they may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 4, 1920.

Vice President MARSHALL,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted to-day by several hundred pastors:

Resolved, That we, pastors of Tennessee, assembled in State Pastors Conference, respectfully and earnestly appeal to the Senate to adopt the peace treaty and the League of Nations without delay.

Resolved, That we hereby urge upon the President and Secretary of State to voice in the most effective way possible the protest of the American people against the continuance of the inhuman treatment of the helpless and long-suffering Armenians by the Turks.

W. W. ALEXANDER, Chairman.

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 24, 1920.

Vice President THOMAS MARSHALL,
Washington, D. C.:

The Board of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in session here to-day urges the Congress of the United States to respond to the call of the President and take such action as will furnish immediate relief to the starving people of Europe and Asia.

JOHN R. PEPPER, President.
W. W. PINSON, Secretary.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to any further reading of telegrams of a similar character. They can be introduced and referred to the appropriate committee, as they are only petitions, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there is only one other telegram, and I will ask the Senator to allow it to go in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. If we are going to have these communications inserted in the RECORD, we might as well entirely open the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the printing of such matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. We have it opened up every day.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we do not, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the telegrams will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of Earl Collier Post, No. 1, American Legion, of Olathe, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing an additional bonus for ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry teachers of the high school of Newton, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Kansas, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PHELAN presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Merle Reed Post, No. 124, American Legion, of Delano, Calif., and a telegram in the nature of a petition from Post No. 22, American Legion, of Lodi, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation providing an additional bonus for ex-service men, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Shasta County Promotion and Development Association of California, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Lassen National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of the congregation of the Episcopal Church of Baltimore, Md., praying that an appropriation be made for the relief of the starving peoples of Europe and the Near East, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BONUS FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. STERLING. I have here a letter from a returned soldier which relates to pending legislation relative to a bonus for soldiers. The letter is short but pointed, and I ask that it may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the communication.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

PIERRE POST, No. 8, THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Pierre, S. Dak., March 6, 1920.

Senator THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Concerning the pending legislation relative to a bonus for the soldiers.

As one who spent nearly two years in a uniform and who is now in touch with a large number of others who did likewise, I want to express myself, where it is apt to do the most good, as being opposed to any gift or bonus being given me or any other uninjured returned soldier.

The Nation suffered through a war which has left us with an immense debt, for future generations, perhaps, to struggle with, and I know that the best of the 4,000,000 young men who gave up some of their time for the good cause do not wish to make this burden greater but to lessen it. We gladly sacrificed what was necessary for humanity and the United States and do not now wish to have pay for patriotism.

Yours, sincerely,

CHAS. LEE HYDE.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand that before the committees of the House and Senate there are various bills bearing upon bonuses, privileges, and so forth, for the returned soldiers, sailors, and marines.

At the beginning of the war, the Government doubled the basic pay of enlisted men, in addition to allowing a 10 per cent increase over the doubled pay, or a 20 per cent increase over the former basic pay, to the enlisted men—privates, noncommissioned officers, and so forth—who served on foreign soil. The total cost of living—clothing, food, and such items—was, of course, borne by the Government, so far as the enlisted men were concerned.

The commissioned officers' pay was not raised, although they were allowed the 10 per cent additional foreign-service pay. They, of course, had nothing furnished them except their regular pay and allowances, which did not cover the cost of living, clothing, shelter, and other expenses.

Upon the discharge of the men who served abroad and at home, every soldier was allowed a $60 bonus over and above his pay.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in the public prints we find a statement made by the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means to the effect that some 50 or more bills bearing upon the bonus question are before the Congress for consideration. A large number of them have been referred to the House Committee on Ways and Means and that committee is now engaged in hearing representatives of the American Legion and others from the immediate surrounding country, and probably in a measure from all over the country.

I have received many letters and telegrams with reference to the matter of soldiers' bonus, and many inquiries as to whether it shall be called "back pay" and shall be given to each one in equal amount, or whether a bonus of $50 a month to each soldier for each month of service, or a $50 bond for each month's service, or whether it shall be a certain amount of land from the public domain, or whether cash and land together.

By the provisions of a law recently enacted, every soldier who served in the World War has been given the privilege of a 60 days' preferential right to file upon Government lands after the date such lands of the reserved public domain are opened for sale or settlement—that is, such lands as are reserved in reclamation projects, Indian reservations, national forests, and so forth. Soldiers may select and have awarded to them in advance of all others lands now reserved, but later to be opened for settlement, including lands under the United States reclamation projects where the Government has taken the water to the lands for irrigation.

In the present month there has been one unit, and there will be a second later, of the reclamation lands opened in the State of Wyoming, and in the one already opened more than 2,500 soldiers filed on the first day, I am informed, and by night of the second day between 3,000 and 4,000 had filed. Their claims, under the new law, will be considered during the period of 60 days before any other citizen may make a filing or receive an award of any of those choice lands.

There are two sides of the bonus question, and I have several communications which are in terms much like the resolutions which I now send to the desk, lately adopted by Cheyenne (Wyo.) Post No. 6, American Legion. I ask that the same may be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

Resolution adopted by Cheyenne Post No. 6, American Legion.

Whereas the victorious participation of the United States in the World War has laid a burden of indebtedness upon our Nation which will require the payment of untold billions of dollars by this and future generations; and

Whereas it is the bounden duty of every citizen and every organization of citizens to refrain from any act which will add to this almost intolerable burden; and

Whereas there have been introduced and are pending before the Congress of the United States numerous bills and resolutions having as their objects the payment to Americans who served their country during the war certain bonuses payable in money, in bonds, and otherwise; and

Whereas it is apparent that the passing of any one or several of the said bills or resolutions will have as its immediate effect the addition to the indebtedness of our Nation of billions of dollars; and

Whereas the passage of the Sweet bill by Congress has provided for the needs of those who are incapacitated and other measures have passed and are pending which offer to soldiers, sailors, and marines hitherto unequaled opportunities for securing homes upon the public lands, etc., which measures lay no further burden upon the Nation and yet recognize the great services which have been rendered; and

Whereas the American Legion was conceived in a spirit of patriotism for all things American and has as its one great object the upbuilding of our Nation in every moral and material way: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Cheyenne Post No. 6 of the American Legion unequivocally repudiates the idea that the services of the soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the Great War can be measured in terms of dollars and cents, and declares it to be the sentiment of said post that no such bill or resolution should receive favorable consideration at the hands of Congress; and be it Further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN, Hon. JOHN B. KENDRICK, and Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL, Senators and Representative in Congress from the State of Wyoming, and to State and National headquarters of the American Legion, that all may be advised of the sentiment of Cheyenne Post No. 6, that a bonus for past services is neither needed nor desired, and that any appeal for a bonus is felt to be not only doubly unpatriotic at this time, but is directly contrary to the spirit and precepts of the American Legion.

Respectfully submitted.

LESLIE A. MILLER,
D. R. GRIGGS,
F. L. STULTZ,
Committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, nothing has been introduced into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD recently more beneficial to us and to the people of the United States than the communications just offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. The sentiments expressed in those communications by former soldiers and members of the American Legion are in most refreshing contrast to the voluminous communications, petitions, and demands which we have received and are receiving from every section of the country insisting upon the immediate appropriation of huge sums in bonds or currency or both for all soldiers lately belonging to the American Expeditionary Forces. The letters just read indicate that the old American patriotic spirit of sacrifice and of service is still a living force; and I trust that the representatives of the press, quite numerously represented this morning in the gallery, will give deserved prominence to these splendid expressions of true Americanism, so that all the people may appreciate that sentiment is turning in the direction of the good old American way.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have had three or four letters from leading soldiers in my State expressing similar sentiments to those expressed in the communications which have been presented and which have been referred to by the Senator from Colorado. I spoke to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] about having them inserted in the RECORD, but he had given notice that he would object to all such communications going into the RECORD, and I hesitated about asking that they be inserted.

I want to say that I have received from soldiers in North Carolina who have come back from overseas letters expressing similar patriotic sentiments, which, since others have gone into the RECORD this morning, I shall ask to have inserted in the RECORD to-morrow morning. One such communication I have received from F. W. Tillett, of Charlotte; one from Mr. Page, of Winston-Salem; and another from Mr. Charles E. Johnson, of Raleigh, N. C. If one such communication is printed in the RECORD, they should all be inserted; and I repeat that to-morrow morning I shall ask that the communications referred to by me be inserted in the RECORD. As I have stated, the reason I have refrained from doing so was because of the notice given by the Senator from Utah that he would object to the insertion of such communications.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I thought from the reading of the resolutions the Senate would certainly see the absurdity of having them inserted in the RECORD. I find myself placed in a very unpleasant position in taking the stand which I have, but before doing so I took up the question with the leaders on both sides of the Chamber and with at least a third of the Senators, and all agreed that the practice of filling the RECORD with such communications should be stopped.

Mr. President, I am going to say to the Senator from North Carolina that the statement which he has just made in reference to sentiments expressed by soldiers of his State is sufficient in every way to give notice to the country of what the soldiers of North Carolina think in reference to this question. Therefore, to-morrow morning when the Senator undertakes to have the communications to which he has referred printed in the RECORD, I shall feel constrained to object.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I simply desire to say in connection with what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] have stated, that I have been receiving similar letters to those to which they refer from ex-service men and from service posts in my State. Those men say they are unwilling to commercialize the patriotism of the soldiers who served in the American Expeditionary Forces.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senate has heretofore made many futile attempts to enforce the rule against encumbering the RECORD with all sorts of petitions. The right of petition is guaranteed; that is not cut off. Petitions should be received under the rule and referred to the appropriate committees, but if every Senator who receives a petition or a telegram or a letter bearing upon a legislative subject shall have the right to put it into the RECORD, it will create a simply intolerable condition. I have many letters and telegrams relating to the very subject to which the telegrams relate which have just been read into the RECORD. Every Senator receives such communications, and if 1 Senator puts in those received by him 95 other Senators will want to encumber the RECORD with telegrams in regard to the same matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the point I make; if one goes in, they all ought to go in.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have on my desk now a very short petition which would not take over 10 lines of a column of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, protesting against any recognition of Soviet Russia unless and until they stop their persecution against religion of every sect, but I have not offered it, because I think the Senator from Utah is engaged in a righteous cause in trying to preserve the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to be a record of the doings of Congress and not a general compendium of the opinions of all the people and all the newspapers of the country.

Since the Senator from Utah has given notice that he would insist upon enforcing the rule of the Senate, the proceedings of the Senate can be found in 6 or 8 or 10 pages of the RECORD every day, while heretofore they occupied 20 or 30 pages; and it was quite a task to pick up the RECORD and attempt to wade through the stuff which nobody wanted to see in the effort to get at something that Senators had said or the Senate had done. I hope the Senate will not, as it has heretofore done when a Senator objects to a violation of the rule, override the objection each time by a vote of the Senate. If that is done, we will have no rule at all and everything will go into the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that I have tried to adhere to the rule; but when matter presented by one Senator goes into the RECORD why should not other Senators have the same privilege?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the trouble.

Mr. OVERMAN. The people back home do not understand why petitions and communications they send are not printed in the RECORD when they see so many others printed in that publication.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is true; and the communications that were read into the RECORD this morning, important as they are, may represent my views on the subject, but I realize that I can not put in matter that accords with my judgment without other Senators being allowed to put in communications on the opposite side of the question which may accord with their judgment.

The two telegrams, meritorious as they were, went into the RECORD this morning when the attention of the Senator from Utah was diverted for a moment, but when the third one was about to be read the Senator from Utah was on his feet and objected. Now, two having got in by a slip does not constitute a reason for pulling down the bars and letting all the others in intentionally.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I shall not ask that there shall be printed in the RECORD the letters and resolutions which I have received in regard to the question of a bonus, or, as I consider it, a matter of paying some tribute of the Nation's gratitude to the men who went forth in behalf of the Nation in its hour of peril.

I have received quite a number of letters and some resolutions favorable to the idea, and I have received one resolution in opposition to it.

It so happens that I introduced—I think it was on the second day after the armistice was signed—a bill providing for a bonus to our soldiers. That bill afterwards was made an amendment to the revenue bill, and the result was that a $60 bonus was given to our soldiers, sailors, and marines. I regret very much if any of them had the payment of that bonus forced upon them; they had the privilege of refusing it if they did not want it; but I do not know that I have heard of any who did refuse it. On the other hand, I know of thousands in my own State who appreciated this expression of the country's gratitude.

I think, Mr. President, there are two sides to the question. I do not consider that the soldiers of this country are begging Congress to give them any recognition or any tribute on account of the service they rendered, but I do think it is appropriate for the Nation to pay proper token of esteem and gratitude to them by giving them something in the nature of a bonus or some land recognition, just as the Nation has been contributing millions and millions of dollars to its soldiers who fought the battles of the Union in the Civil War. To-day we have heard no impeachment against the patriotism of the Union soldiers because they are pleading and asking for an increase of pension; no one dares to rise here and question their patriotism because they have asked for more. Throughout the South, where we take special pleasure and pride in honoring our Confederate veterans in giving them pensions and increasing them at every opportunity, no one dares to impeach their patriotism or to charge that because they accept such pensions it is commercializing their love of the country for which they fought. It is not a matter of commercializing patriotism at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator has stated, and I think it is a fact, that these demands—for that is what they are—for increased pensions are not criticized in the Senate. That is true; but it is equally true that they are criticized in the cloakrooms, as they should be criticized on the floor of the House and the Senate.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, it is possible that the Senator from Colorado is one of those who criticize them in the cloakroom.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and also upon the floor.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is perfectly all right. However, the action of the entire Congress has been to give them pensions, to give them very liberal pensions, increasing them only a year or two ago, and I believe a measure has already passed the House at this session of Congress making an increase, and in all probability it will be passed by the Senate. In the South, in my own State, we have increased the Confederate soldiers' pensions whenever possible or every time we thought the State finances would possibly permit; and I am sure that there—and I can speak more particularly as to the sentiment of the people of my own State—they have not impugned the patriotism of the Confederate soldiers, and they do not mean to say that their service is commercialized because our State now pays them this tribute of honor and respect on account of the service that they rendered to the Confederacy during the war of the sixties.

So I do not share in the idea that if Congress sees fit to give a little recognition, to pay a little debt of gratitude on the part of the Nation, to its soldiers, it is cheapening their patriotism or their love of country. If that is true, France has cheapened it; if that is true, Great Britain has cheapened it; if that is true, Canada has cheapened it; because those nations have made contributions to their soldiers.

There seems to have been quite a disposition on the part of Congress to make reparation to the business enterprises of this country that suffered losses or hardship during the war, with those at least with whom the Nation had dealings. Take the ship contractors; we passed legislation in order to reimburse them practically for any loss, and the same was true with the munitions manufacturers and the railroads. The Government in dealing with the railroads felt that it was essential to do this; and yet when we begin to apply the same principle of justice, as I see it, to the soldiers of the country, some are ready to object and say that they rendered a service of patriotism, and they even want to exclude an expression of the Nation's gratitude. That is what it is—an expression of the Nation's gratitude.

I have noticed among the ex-service men of this country that it is very largely the men who held commissions, who drew good salaries and did not suffer the greater hardships of the war, who now take refuge behind this idea of patriotism and say, "We do not want any bonus; we do not want any land recognition or anything else." The only resolution that I have received said that they wanted land recognition. Well, how can you distinguish between favoritism extended on the part of the Government by a gratuity in the nature of land consideration and a gratuity in the nature of a money consideration?

The first opposition which I observed, I think, was on the part of colonels, lieutenant colonels, and majors, one or two of whom were fortunate enough to be living, you might say, upon inheritances that had fortunately come down to them. They knew nothing of the hardships of the boy who served this country for $30 a month. They knew nothing of the sacrifice of the young fellow who had to leave an income of from $50 to $150 a month and go and serve his country for $30 a month, because they enjoyed the salary of a lieutenant colonel or of a major or possibly of a captain, and then had their little comfortable competency or income coming in on account of an inheritance or probably on account of wealth that they had accumulated themselves.

I may be mistaken, but I think the sentiment in opposition to the Nation paying a debt of gratitude to our ex-service men, and even a further debt of gratitude than we have paid, comes very largely from men to whom it does not mean much; men who, as far as hardships are concerned, as far as personal comfort is concerned, did not suffer to any great extent on account of the services they rendered to the Government. Of course, I would not force this on any of them who do not desire it; and I think that if we pass legislation—and I hope that we will—giving a further gratuity, we should provide in the legislation that it should not be accepted by any soldier who did not desire to receive the reward tendered by his Nation, and therefore he could have an opportunity to give expression to his idea of patriotism by rejecting the token offered him by Congress. Talk about finances. Why was this not thought of when this body recently passed a bill raising the salaries of Army and Navy officers in a total amount of more than $60,000,000 a year?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I suppose in a way I am responsible for some of this discussion. I introduced a letter from a returned soldier in South Dakota, protesting against the proposition of a $50-bond bonus for each month of service upon the part of the returned soldiers.

Mr. President, I am willing to take my share of the responsibility. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] put their opposition to matter of this kind going into the RECORD on the ground of economy. Mr. President, the soldier whose letter was read protests against a proposition that would mean a further indebtedness of at least $2,000,000,000 to the United States; and, as intimated by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], that perhaps will be followed by another demand.

Mr. President, while I sympathize for the most part with the position taken by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in regard to what should go into the RECORD, it seems to me there ought to be some discrimination here when measures are now pending in Congress, either in the House or in the Senate, or in both, for the granting of these bonuses. There ought to be space given in the RECORD for the expression of opinion in regard to matters of that kind which are pending, matters that involve the expenditure of billions on the part of the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be the proper way, however, to have them referred to the committee having the legislation in charge? Then, as the Senator knows, the committee would consider the question while considering the bill dealing with that legislation; and if it came to the floor, and the question was discussed, then, of, course, these very telegrams and resolutions would be brought out in the discussion. I simply feel now that it is cumbering the RECORD once too often.

Mr. STERLING. That would be very well, indeed, if we could lose sight of the psychological moment when these things should go into the RECORD. We can not always wait for consideration by the committee. The time will have passed when the publication will do the most good; and now, just at this time, in these days when we are hearing from these posts of the American Legion throughout the country, is the time when attention shoud be called to the question, and to the fact that there are returned soldiers in the American Legion who did their duty here and did it abroad who are opposed to the proposition. It is for the educational value of the communication that we want it in the RECORD now, so that Members of Congress, the public generally, and the members of the American Legion may know how their compatriots feel in regard to the matter.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] has alluded to a debt of gratitude which we owe these soldiers. We can not pay a debt of gratitude with money, for the moment we pay it in money, or by a bonus of a $50 bond a month for each month of service, it ceases to be a debt of gratitude; we no longer owe it. As I have said to those who have written me in regard to the matter, if this claim is persisted in now, under present conditions, with a public debt approximating $25,000,000,000, the American people will, I fear, lose that fine sense of gratitude and honor and respect that they owe to the American soldiers. As said in the letter, you can not pay for patriotism with this kind of a bonus.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the Senator says we can not pay a debt of gratitude, and I do not think we will pay a debt of gratitude. I should like to have the Senator explain how he differentiates between giving some recognition to the ex-service men of this late war and continuing as we do the pension system to the soldiers of the Civil War. I should like to know how he defends the financial policy of the Government in dealing with its pensions.

Mr. STERLING. That did not happen for many years.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire what is the regular order. The discussion seems to have gone afield, and I do not know whether it is pertinent or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRANDEGEE:

A bill (S. 4045) granting an increase of pension to Ada Johnston Cowles; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

(By request.) A bill (S. 4046) to cancel an allotment made to Mary Crane, deceased, embracing lands on the Winnebago Reservation in Nebraska;

(By request.) A bill (S. 4047) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to make an allotment to Pessa, a member of the Comanche Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma; and

(By request.) A bill (S. 4048) to authorize allotments of lands to Indians of the Menominee Reservation in Wisconsin, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 4049) for the relief of Marshall M. Grabosch (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4050) granting an increase of pension to George W. Huckins (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4051) granting a pension to George R. Carver (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRANCE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) providing for the recommendation of amnesty and pardon for political prisoners in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT TO POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment proposing that hereafter services in excess of eight hours a day required of clerks and special clerks in first and second class post offices, letter carriers in the City Delivery Service, and railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices or transfer service shall be compensated at a rate 50 per cent higher than the compensation of said employees as fixed by law, intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

NAVAL RADIO STATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I report back from the Committee on Naval Affairs favorably, with amendments, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 170) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to open certain naval radio stations for the use of the general public, and I submit a report (No. 466) thereon.

I desire to state that this is an emergency measure. The President has ordered the return of the private radio stations to their owners. The Navy Department has, during the possession of these facilities, been furnishing to the Orient a low-rate press service. They have, in certain localities, where private facilities were not available, been performing certain commercial work in the transmission of communication, and in order to enable them to continue this it will be necessary to get this authority, conferring it upon the department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask what the report of the department was on the joint resolution?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The report of the department is in favor of the passage of the joint resolution. It accompanies the report of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will not object to having the report read, so that we may know what the department has said?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Not at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the report on the joint resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Reading Clerk read the report, as follows:

[Senate report No. 466, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the resolution (S. J. Res. 170) to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to open certain naval radio stations for the use of the general public, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the resolution do pass with amendments.

Page 3, line 1, strike out the word "land" and insert in lieu thereof the word "low."

This measure has received the favorable recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy, and the accompanying letter from the Secretary, dated February 27, 1920, sets forth the facts and is submitted as a part of this report:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 27, 1920.

SIR: Under the provisions of the President's Executive order signed February 13, 1920, instructions have been given to return to their owners, as of midnight February 29, 1920, such privately owned radio stations as were taken over by the Navy Department in compliance with the Executive orders of April 6, 1917, and April 30, 1917.

I beg to refer to previous letters addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate on the subject of radio in the United States, under dates of July 19, 1919, and July 24, 1919, and other more recent letters on the same subject, concerning bills and joint resolutions proposed by committees of Congress, in which the opinion of this department was set forth, having in view the interests of the public and the provision of all possible facilities in the way of rapid means of communication for commercial and press needs, especially those of American commercial concerns engaged in business abroad.

If the naval radio stations were to cease transmitting commercial messages between points not served by privately owned stations, the general public's interests now being served by these stations would suffer very considerably, as privately owned high-power stations are admittedly not adequate to handle this business. I may cite the following radio circuits which will become inoperative unless provision be made by Congress for naval radio stations to handle, at least temporarily, commercial and press messages between the points mentioned:

1. Press and commercial messages between San Francisco and Manila.
2. Press and commercial messages between the United States and Norway.
3. Commercial messages between the United States and Germany.
4. Commercial messages transmitted to Constantinople.
5. Commercial messages between the United States and Vladivostok, Siberia.

As it is essential that the above service be rendered the public, it is my purpose to continue the operation of naval radio stations temporarily for the handling of the above circuits in order that the commercial and press interests concerned may not suffer unnecessarily. Owing to the fact that this arrangement is only temporary, I have to request, in the interests of the public, that a remedy be provided by the Congress, as, upon the termination of such arrangement for any reason, the same conditions as are now impending will arise immediately.

I wish, therefore, to suggest that some such legislation as contained in the attached draft of a proposed joint resolution be enacted at the earliest practicable date.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Washington a question. Does the amendment reported by the committee allow the use of the Government radio stations only in case there is no private station that can be used, or radio stations that will carry the business?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That provision is in the joint resolution, and it was not an amendment of the committee. It was contained in the joint resolution as it was introduced. I introduced it, and it contained originally the provision that the authority of the Navy Department to take commercial business should cease whenever the Secretary of Commerce advised them that private companies were available for that purpose, with the exception of the press service, which the Navy is carrying on to the Orient, which no private company is available to take care of.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I understand that the joint resolution is under consideration. I have in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, dated February 27, addressed to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the joint resolution is not yet under consideration.

Mr. PHELAN. What is the parliamentary situation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asked unanimous consent for its consideration. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PHELAN. The letter from the Secretary of the Navy is as follows:

RADIO LEGISLATION.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 27, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

The importance of this subject is manifest, because the Secretary is now stretching his authority in providing for the use of the naval radio stations for commercial and press purposes. There is behind it a very important matter of almost international concern.

Mr. V. S. McClatchy, editor and proprietor, with his brother, of the Sacramento Bee, is also a director in the Associated Press, and recently, on a trip to the Orient, he discovered that the peoples of those far lands, of China and Japan particularly, were not in receipt of authentic news; that the news was indeed manufactured in order to color their minds, and that the vernacular press of China was in the control of a certain other country, whose object was to disseminate misinformation as propaganda, and he thought that a better understanding could easily be brought about by giving the people of the Orient an opportunity, by some sort of a press service, which he was willing to inaugurate, and thus by removing misunderstandings the peace of the world might be better maintained.

In a letter to me he says this, and it will give the Senate full information:

You have noted, no doubt, the announcement made by the director of communications of the Navy, effective December 20, that the Navy radio station at San Francisco would transmit news messages to Manila at 6 cents per word. This is in accord with the suggestion which I have urged upon the departments and Congress since May last.

As an immediate result the Associated Press will commence on January 1 sending a daily news report of 800 words to the American and vernacular newspapers of Manila.

If this word rate can be permanently maintained, and the necessary additional facilities secured for extended service, the report will undoubtedly be received and distributed in China, and eventually even in Japan, and we will receive here every day a full report of doings and sentiment in the Far East.

To insure this news interchange, however, it is necessary that Congress formally approve the principle as established by the director of communications of the Navy by providing therefor in a general radio bill about to be formulated by the subcommittee having radio matters in charge.

Whether that bill shall provide for the carrying of news messages by Navy radio, or shall limit the transmission thereof to stations owned by private companies, there should be a very clear and definite provision that the low word rate and the necessary facilities shall be maintained for transmission of news.

I have not read the draft which has just been submitted by the Senator from Washington. I would like to ask him if the provisions of the joint resolution properly safeguard the establishment of a low rate, which seems to be essential in order to facilitate intercommunication with the Orient.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there is an express provision in the joint resolution that a special low press rate shall be made. I agree with the Senator as to the importance of it. That is one of the objects of undertaking to get immediate action on the joint resolution.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, it is left discretionary with the Navy to fix a low rate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is left discretionary with the Navy to fix the rate under the requirement that it shall be a low rate.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, without reading, I ask leave to submit for printing in the RECORD several communications, one entitled "Trans-Pacific News Service," a memorandum prepared by Mr. V. S. McClatchy, an editorial expression of the Sacramento Bee on the same subject, and other data.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TRANS-PACIFIC NEWS SERVICE.
[Memorandum.]

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., December 30, 1919.

Temporary success has crowned my efforts to secure from the United States Government recognition of the principle of news transmission across the Pacific by Navy radio at a low word rate on the theory that American news associations would then cover the news field with an adequate and independent report free from Government control or ownership.

On December 16 the Associated Press carried the order of Vice Admiral W. H. Bullard, director of communications of the Navy, that commencing December 20 the Navy Department would accept news messages for transmission by radio from San Francisco to Manila at 6 cents per word, and from San Francisco to Honolulu at 3 cents per word.

The English language and vernacular newspapers of Manila are already arranging for a daily news service of 500 to 800 words from San Francisco under this offer.

Undoubtedly that service will be extended to and distributed throughout China as soon as necessary arrangements can be made therefor.

Even Japan will in time receive and use the service, notwithstanding her strict control of the incoming and outgoing news, because this American wireless report will carry the world's news to the Far East 12 hours or more in advance of the cable-relayed service by Reuter.

If the present plan continues permanently and the Navy transmission facilities on the Pacific are multiplied by installation of the new perforated tape system of mechanical sending and receiving, a full eastbound report will soon bring to this country daily full information as to happenings and sentiment in the Far East.

With the plan thus working successfully across the Pacific, it will be applied to our news communication with Europe, and eventually the peoples of the earth will find in the interchange of full news reports, independently and truthfully edited and free from Government control or censorship, a safeguard against misunderstanding and the machinations of interests that find profit or pleasure in war. Read in this connection an article by David Lawrence in the Saturday Evening Post, December 6, "The air cure."

But all these things depend, in a measure, on the indorsement by Congress of the plan thus inaugurated by the director of communications of the Navy and provision for its permanent maintenance, whether the transmission of such news messages shall be left in the hands of the Navy or be transferred to privately owned companies.

It would be well, therefore, that Congress—and particularly the subcommittee in each House having charge of radio legislation—be advised that this plan meets the hearty approval of those who have given the subject careful consideration; and that the inauguration of the plan is certainly desirable, and perhaps even necessary, in the vital interest of the Nation.

* * * * * * *

DATA FOR REFERENCE.

The conditions in the Far East which urgently demand interchange of full news reports to protect American interests are indicated in my memorandum of May 7, prepared for the State Department. They are more fully set forth in the booklet, The Germany of Asia, part 1, articles 2 and 3. Both these documents were sent you some time ago.

The situation is more fully explained in my statements before the two congressional committees named—the House committee on September 26 and the Senate committee on October 9. The hearings are in print and can be had from Washington on request, I assume.

Briefly, our commercial interests and our prestige as a Nation in the Far East are suffering serious injury from unfriendly propaganda made possible, if not promulgated, by the agencies now controlling news communication in that section of the globe. Misunderstandings which may easily lead to war are being created in this manner. All authorities agree that the only effective way to meet this problem is by maintaining with the Far East daily news communication under independent American management, which will keep the people on both sides of the Pacific informed as to actual conditions.

A government service, or even a subsidized service, is undesirable. Cable rates and cable delays are prohibitive for a regular news report. Present rates, San Francisco to Manila, per word: Commercial, 75 cents; press, 36 cents. Assured time of transmission, 10 days. The practical solution is the one originally suggested by me to the State Department and now adopted by the Navy Department—radio transmission of news messages at a word rate so low as to induce American news associations to maintain an adequate news service, self-supporting and independent of Government control or censorship. The maximum rates suggested by me were 5 cents to Manila and 6 cents to the Asiatic mainland from San Francisco.

A general measure is now before each subcommittee, though it has not been introduced as a bill. It offers a compromise between the policy of the Secretary of the Navy, who originally insisted upon Government ownership and operation of all radio stations, and the stand of Congress, which was opposed to such ownership.

The principles of the measure, it is understood, have the approval of both the Navy and the subcommittees, though details will doubtless be modified. It provides for return to private ownership of radio stations, for control of operation through a Government commission, on which the Navy has place, and for authority to the Navy to use its stations for commercial messages, provided rates established by private companies are not cut.

Provision should be made in that measure, however, for permanent maintenance of the principle of low rate for news messages, as established by Admiral Bullard. If radio transmission returns to private companies and news is handled by such companies, it is unlikely that of their own initiative they will establish the necessary low rates for news service, since they regard such service as undesirable business.

It may be said, too, that with the contemplated increased radio facilities of the Navy Department—far in excess of any peace-time requirements of the Government—such increased facilities might well be utilized for news communication, which under the plan suggested becomes a national service.

DEFENSE OF WORLD LIBERTY BY RADIO DISTRIBUTION OF RELIABLE NEWS.

"It is not improbable that a great world movement for prevention of misunderstanding and war between the peoples of the earth was inaugurated when Vice Admiral W. H. Bullard, Director of Communications of the United States Navy, issued his order two weeks ago, effective December 20, that naval radio stations would transmit news messages between San Francisco and Manila at 6 cents per word.

"Previous to that there had been no press rate by radio between the stations named, while the commercial rate was 75 cents per word.

"The cable rate for press messages between the two points is 36 cents per word, but it takes 10 days to transmit a cable message because of congestion.

"These rates are prohibitive for daily interchange of news reports, and furnish sufficient explanation of the lack of understanding and friction which exists between this country and the Far East.

"Under Admiral Bullard's order the newspapers of Manila are already arranging for an adequate daily news report from San Francisco. That report will be carried on to China afterwards and distributed among the newspapers of that country, without doubt.

"Even Japan will avail herself of it, notwithstanding the Government control of the incoming and outgoing news of Nippon, the reason being that this American wireless report will deliver world news in the Far East 12 hours or more in advance of the cable-relayed service of Reuter, the British news agency.

"Later, when the Navy radio has multiplied its facilities by installation of the new perforated tape system for automatic sending and receiving, an adequate eastbound daily report will keep this country in touch with the happenings and sentiment in the Far East.

"Under such conditions there will be full protection for American interests, an avoidance of the friction due to misunderstandings, and effective protection against vicious propaganda.

"An indedependent news report under reliable management, free from Government control or censorship, offers the best safeguard against secret diplomacy which looks to creation of distrust of this country and injury to its commercial interests.

"When this plan has been successfully operated between this country and the Far East it will be used, without doubt, between this country and Europe.

"And in time the plan of a cheap word rate for radio transmission of news messages, coupled with reliable reports free from Government control or censorship, in use all over the world, will go far toward creating such mutual understandings that war may not be declared for trivial reasons or to serve the evident selfish purpose of a dynasty or a State.

"Manifestly the plan inaugurated by Admiral Bullard should be maintained and safeguarded from attack.

"Congress should formally approve the plan and provide for its continuance, whether the handling of these news messages shall remain with the Navy radio department or be returned to privately owned companies.

"The present order is in accord with the policy urged upon the State and Navy Departments by the publisher of the Bee in May last after an investigation of conditions in the Far East.

"Subsequently he presented the matter to the subcommittee of each House of Congress having charge of radio legislation, suggesting a maximum rate of 6 cents to the Far East as an incentive for independent American news associations to provide for a daily interchange of news across the Pacific.

"These committees were favorably impressed and bills were introduced giving temporary authority to the Navy Department to use its facilities in the manner indicated.

"Pressure of more important legislation prevented action on these bills; and the Navy Department, with full realization of the gravity and urgency of the case and encouraged doubtless by the friendly attitude of the subcommittees, issued the order which may mark an epoch in the history of news communication.

"The two radio subcommittees have before them a measure looking to permanent control of radio communication, and care should be taken that provision is made therein for continuous application of the principle on which Admiral Bullard's order is founded.

"The measure referred to, which seems to meet general approval, now provides for return to private ownership of radio stations with control of operation in the hands of a national commission on which the Navy has place.

"The Navy is to be permitted to use its stations for commercial business, provided it does not make a rate lower than that fixed by private companies for the same service."

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 7, 1919.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
Chairman Subcommittee on Radio
of Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The following memorandum covers the points which were submitted to you in our conversation for consideration of your committee in connection with the necessity for temporary authorization for use of Navy radio facilities for commercial and news purposes, in order to remedy the really dangerous situation on the Pacific coast.

May I direct your attention particularly to paragraph 4, covering information received by me since our interview and the significance of which you will fully appreciate.

1. In the short time available before adjournment of Congress it is apparently not practicable to formulate and pass a general bill for radio control. There are too many points upon which agreement must be had in order to secure such result.

2. It is practicable, however, to pass a temporary measure which will authorize the use by the Navy Department of its existing facilities for wireless communication for public benefit, which will relieve the pressing and grave situation on the Pacific and which will not interfere with the adoption of a permanent plan for general control when agreed upon.

3. The Pacific situation and the necessity for immediate establishment of adequate daily trans-Pacific news communication in protection of American interests are fully set forth in statements made by me before the subcommittee of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries September 26, as appears at pages 4 to 21 of the printed transcript, and before your subcommittee October 9, as appears at pages 121 to 198 of the printed transcript.

4. The seriousness of the situation is further indicated by the news just received by me that J. R. Kennedy, manager of Kokusai—the Japanese Government news agency, controlling incoming and outgoing news of Japan—publicly announced in Tokyo on his return from Paris that he has been appointed agent and representative of Reuter, the British news agency, for the entire Far East, including China and the Straits Settlement. Japan, therefore, secures, through Kokusai and Kennedy, control of the British news agency and its reports so far as concerns the Far East.

5. The temporary measure suggested should give authority to the Navy Department to use its radio facilities for transmission of commercial and news messages until such time as Congress shall perfect a plan for permanent operation of radio stations by private companies, or otherwise, and may forbid, if desired, the Navy Department charging for ordinary commercial business rates less than heretofore charged by private companies, but should authorize and direct the use of such facilities for transmission of news reports, westbound and eastbound, across the Pacific Ocean by American news associations and American newspapers at a low word rate, not exceeding 6 cents; or, if preferred, at a rate not exceeding cost to the Navy Department. (Capt. S. W. Bryant, acting director of communications of the Navy Department, testified before the Senate subcommittee that the rate named was within cost.)

6. It is well to remember in providing conditions under which private companies may hereafter operate that such companies, whether operating telegraph or cable lines or wireless stations, regard the transmission of news as undesirable business, and it is never encouraged by them, and that they are unlikely to provide on their initiative for any such rate per word as would make feasible the interchange of adequate news reports between the Far East and the United States, as urged by me. If private companies are to be depended on in a permanent arrangement for transmission of news Congress should, therefore, fix a rate for news transmission across the Pacific as recommended.

7. As all radio bills introduced and tentative measures as well are before your subcommittee and the subcommittee of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, in view of the urgency of the matter and assuming there be no impropriety involved, it would seem desirable for the two subcommittees to agree on a simple measure covering the temporary authorization referred to and to put forth from each committee identical bills.

I return to Sacramento to-morrow, but will be in Washington again for a few days about December 4 and will be at the command of your committee if it desires further information in my possession.

Sincerely, yours, V. S. McCLATCHY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, the joint resolution was brought to my attention a few moments ago. I consented that it might be reported, and I have not objected to its consideration. I wish, however, to express the fear that section 2, as it will be construed undoubtedly by the naval authorities and as it will be applied, will retard the development by individuals or corporations of enterprises for the erection and operation of radio stations. It is manifest that under the terms of this bill there will be considerable expense incurred by the Government in caring for the commercial business of private persons and corporations. I am afraid that the Navy Department will seek to retain the private radio business devolved upon it by this bill; it will establish and maintain rates so low that it will be impossible for private corporations or enterprises to compete, and in this manner prevent the building by private concerns of radio stations and the establishing of transoceanic radio routes. This will build up a governmental monopoly, and the Government will be carrying radiograph messages to all parts of the world with respect to all private business and commercial transactions instead of having private corporations undertake the work. I am afraid this is a step in the wrong direction. I believe if the exigencies demand that a measure of this character should be enacted there should be a limitation expressed in the bill fixing the period when it will expire. It will not be forgotten that there was a determination by some Navy officials to place all cables and radio stations under the absolute control of the Navy Department. This bill seems to be in line with the plan of which we heard so much during the recent war.

We should, in my opinion, encourage and not discourage and, indeed, prevent the construction by private enterprise of radio plants for use between the United States and foreign countries. Our commercial interests need increased radio facilities, and we should not do anything that will impede the development of instrumentalities for the carrying of messages to all parts of the world.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I agree with the Senator from Utah in his general opposition to the invasion of fields of private business by the Government, and I would apply that to radio communication as I would to other lines of commercial activities. But I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is in the joint resolution a limitation not measured by a date of time but elastic, so as to adjust itself to conditions as they arise. That limitation is that whenever the Secretary of Commerce shall notify the Secretary of the Navy that a private station is available for the handling of this business, the authority of the Secretary of the Navy shall cease.

I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that under the existing law the Secretary of Commerce is the representative of the Government in the control and regulation of radio communication.

Mr. KING. I was familiar with the provisions to which the Senator has alluded. It reads as follows:

Provided, That such use of naval high-power radio stations for commercial business, other than press messages, shall cease as and when the Secretary of the Navy is notified by the Secretary of Commerce that an American radio company is prepared to take over this work and establish adequate communication between the points in question.

First, let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this excludes from the proposition which he has suggested the words "other than press messages," so that it would imply that the operations of the Government should continue for the purpose of carrying press messages, but that when the Secretary of Commerce advises that a radio station has been erected for commercial purposes, then the Secretary of the Navy may relinquish the control which he now has and may refuse to assume the obligation which the joint resolution seems to require that he shall assume in the transmission of radio messages for other private purposes.

Let me say to the Senator that in my opinion as long as the Government will engage in transmitting radio messages from continent to continent, from our country to other countries, charged as it is with the duty of fixing low rates, indeed it says "special low rates for press service," private enterprise will be discouraged from entering the field, and industrial and commercial organizations that might otherwise construct adequate radio plants and carry on an adequate service for commercial and all other purposes will be deterred from embarking upon the enterprise.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have refrained from going at length into a discussion of the situation through my anxiety to get some action on the joint resolution, but I will say to the Senator from Utah that at the present time and in so far as any prospects of the near future are concerned there is no possibility of there being any lack of business for any private radio company which may establish facilities for that purpose. The great difficulty of the commerce of America to-day, in so far as transoceanic communication is concerned, is to obtain any facilities of communication either by cable or by radio.

There has been a congestion of transmission of information both across the Atlantic and across the Pacific to such an extent that it has been very injurious to American business.

I will say further to the Senator from Utah that the joint resolution, I am advised, is entirely satisfactory to the American radio companies. A short time ago radio development, radio activity in the United States, was under British control, and it is very much to the credit of the Navy and those who are in charge of communication in the Navy Department that through their vigilance and their patriotism private American interests were directed toward this field of investment, with the result that an American company has been organized and the acquisition of the British interests has already been accomplished, and we shall have as a result of it an American company with such advantages and such facilities and such capital that it will control the American field and will be able to compete on equal terms with the British company all around the world.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me that if there is any defect at all in the joint resolution, it is that it does not go far enough to preserve the rights and power of the Government to control the radio stations. In these days of wireless communication it seems to me essential that the Government should have these wireless stations. The time may come when the Government must shut out private stations because of interference with the Government means of communication. That was illustrated in our late experience when the Government had to take over a station that was in communication with Germany, in New York State, I believe it was.

Section 2, I think, is the best part of the joint resolution. I believe where the Government has stations now it certainly ought to be authorized to continue to operate them until the time comes when private enterprise may take hold of the situation as may be determined by the facts. But there ought not to be a time fixed for the Government to go absolutely out of the entire business of radio communication with foreign countries, because that may be essential for the protection of the Government; it may be absolutely necessary that the Government shall control the means of wireless communication with overseas countries.

Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

Mr. KING. I yield first to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I wish to inquire whether unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent has been given for the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. GORE. I did not understand that the announcement had been made by the Chair. I do not think the morning hour ought to be taken up in this way, and I made the inquiry for that reason.

Mr. KING. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was only going to remark that at the present time there is a great deal more business than both the Government and private companies can do, both cable and wireless, and the difficulty is about getting any means of communication adequate for the American business.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word further. I do not assent to the proposition made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. So far as I am concerned, I want the Government to keep its hands off from private enterprise. I do not want the Government to engage in a business that will enable it to maintain an espionage organization in times of peace over the press, the telegraph, or radiograph service. In times of war we tolerate many things which we refuse to submit to in peace times. I would encourage in every legitimate way private enterprises to construct radiograph stations, so that they might carry on business between the United States and all parts of the world.

If we shall have another war, Congress can, by proper resolution or action, take over the radiograph service as a necessary war measure. But now that peace has come, we should adopt the ways of peace, and do everything possible to encourage private enterprise to care for matters that belong to the fields of private endeavor.

Mr. President, I again make the prophecy that the passage of this joint resolution will deter private enterprise from engaging in the construction of adequate radiograph service. I think in the long run it will prove a disadvantage to the people of the United States and to the business interests of the United States.

I wish to ask the Senator from Washington whether he will accept an amendment, which I have hastily drawn while we have been discussing this matter, which reads as follows:

Provided, That in the operation of such stations for private purposes there shall be no loss to the Government.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not authorized to accept amendments and I shall be compelled to oppose the amendment. There is no possible way of fixing any such measure as that upon the Government rates. The great difficulty heretofore has been that the Government rates were too high. The Government rates on the submarine cable which the Government owns to Alaska and upon all wireless stations have been higher than the private rates and they are likely to continue that way.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator mean that he thinks the Government of the United States ought to subsidize commercial enterprises and the press and carry their messages at a loss?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, not at all. I have no idea that would be the case; but I say it is impracticable to establish any such rule as the Senator in this confessedly hastily drawn and ill-considered amendment that he has offered proposes.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator consent to an amendment which provides that the Government of the United States, in the use of its radiograph stations for private purposes, shall not sustain any loss?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not consent to that amendment, because we can not apply any such rule as that to the operation of the Government wireless. In the first place, it is maintained primarily for the benefit of the Navy. It is no more a commercial enterprise than is the Navy itself. It is a part of the communication service of the Navy for the control and operation of its fleet. If it does some commercial business, as has been done, how is anyone going to say whether or not it is done at a profit or not at a profit, and how are you going to segregate the Government business from private business, so as to determine whether the Navy is earning a profit on some messages and not on others?

Mr. KING. That is very easily determined. The Government of the United States, where it uses cars going from coast to coast operated by the railroads and which carry passengers and freight for the Government, is able to determine what the additional cost is to the railroads for carrying the mails of the Government. There would be no greater difficulty in ascertaining the increased cost to the railroads by reason of carrying the mails for the Government than there would be in the Navy determining the additional cost resulting from giving service to private individuals.

Mr. McCORMICK. Since I am a member of the subcommittee, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for just a moment?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. The problem to which the joint resolution is addressed was first presented to the subcommittee by Mr. V. S. McClatchy, to whom the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] has referred. He urged upon the committee the importance of making possible the transmission of news matter to the Orient. At about the same time other interests across the Pacific urged upon the committee the importance of making possible the transmission of commercial cables to the Hawaiian Islands and to the Far East. There are Government stations now in Hawaii and in the Philippines, as there are in Porto Rico, which are maintained for the Navy and are necessary to the Navy. There is no possible present relief through private enterprise. For that reason, and after very long consideration of the problem, the subcommittee agreed upon the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to ask the Senator the same question which I propounded to the Senator from Washington, namely, does the Senator believe that the Government of the United States should sustain a loss in thus accommodating commercial enterprise and the press?

Mr. McCORMICK. The Government will sustain no loss. The naval operators are employed, they are on duty for the service of the Navy. By what construction, then, can the Government sustain a loss? You can create, if you please, a fictitious accounting system under which that part of the messages which is private shall be charged against the whole cost of the maintenance of the stations.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit another inquiry, How is the Government to determine, in the language of the joint resolution, what is a specially low charge, unless it knows something about the cost? It must know something in regard to the cost of the transmission of messages if it is to fix a low charge.

Mr. PHELAN rose.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], who is especially informed upon this problem of the commercial rate, I see rises to answer that question, and I yield to him.

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. V. S. McClatchy, director of the Associated Press, has made a special study of the matter, and I am in possession of the information through him. I read from a letter dated November 19, 1919, as follows, which, I think, will set at rest the objection of the Senator from Utah:

If you have an opportunity and you think it wise, you might suggest to Senator POINDEXTER a slight modification of section 1 of his bill, which would permit, or authorize, the Navy Department to use its facilities for news transmission across the Pacific, either at a rate not exceeding 6 cents, or at a rate not exceeding the cost of the service to the Navy Department, which, you will remember, Capt. Bryant testified would not be in excess of 6 cents per word.

Capt. Bryant, who is an expert and who testified before the committee, has informed us that the cost to the Government would not be more than 6 cents, and that is the press rate which is requested in order to make the news service a success. So I think it is perfectly safe to leave the matter in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, as the joint resolution provides. There is no danger on this showing of any loss to the Government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say to the Senator from Utah that I have a matter of routine morning business which I think will require only a moment, as it is merely a resolution calling for information. Will not the Senator yield to me for a moment for that purpose?

Mr. KING. If I have the right to do so, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I had hoped that we could get an immediate vote on the pending measure. Otherwise, I would be very glad to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I will say, Mr. President, I was hoping the same thing as the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER].

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think we can dispose of the pending matter within five minutes.

Mr. GORE. Very well.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Washington consent to an amendment reading "at a rate not less than the cost of service to the Navy Department"? If the Government is to furnish service for private business, I am interested in protecting the Government against loss.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will agree to that amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I hope that will not involve interest on the investment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield? And if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I will yield to the Senator from California, if he desires that I shall do so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I will occupy the time while the Senator from Utah is seeking the information he desires. I simply desire in one word to impress upon the Senate the very great significance of this matter, apart from the mere cost involved to the Government. The Government is not in business for profit. I take it that the 6-cent rate will meet the ordinary cost, and I think it would be a sufficient direction for the department. But here is something which has an international aspect and which lifts the discussion far above the mere question of cost. Mr. McClatchy writes me under date of November 7, 1919, as follows:

> Reuter, the British News Agency, has placed in charge of its entire Far Eastern territory, including China and the Philippines, J. R. Kennedy, the manager of Kokusai, which is the Government-controlled news agency of Japan. Japan, therefore, will control, through Kokusai and Kennedy, the British as well as the Japanese reports from the Far East. If the United States is to protect its interests, it must at once secure such conditions as will maintain the interchange of daily news reports between this country and the Far East under American control. That object can be attained only in the way that I have suggested.

Which is the way of the pending joint resolution. Mr. McClatchy adds:

> I look on this matter of news communication as one of the most effective defensive weapons which we can use against the offensive methods of Japan and to secure our commercial interests as well in the Far East.

So the editor, accustomed to deal with the dissemination of news for the enlightenment of public opinion sees that the best way to defend ourselves, so free are we from fault, against the offensive methods of an enemy is to tell the truth, to give out the information, and not allow manufactured or perverted news to be spread broadcast throughout the Orient, and, on the other hand, we in this country will under the same system and by the same service be better informed about our neighbors of the Far East.

Mr. KING. Before the semicolon and after the word "Congress," in line 10, on page 2, I move to amend by inserting the words "at a rate not less than the cost of service to the Navy Department," so that it will read:

> Under regulations prescribed by him, and he shall fix the rates for such service, subject to control of such rates by the Congress, at a rate not less than the cost of service to the Navy Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Senator from Utah offers an amendment which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "Congress" and before the semicolon, it is proposed to insert the words "at a rate not less than the cost of service to the Navy Department," so as to make the section read:

> That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, so far as is consistent with the transaction of Government business, to permit the use of the radio stations under the control of the Navy Department for the transmission and reception of commercial messages between ship and shore for the benefit of the general public, under regulations prescribed by him, and he shall fix the rates for such service, subject to control of such rates by the Congress, at a rate not less than the cost of service to the Navy Department, and the receipts for such service shall be turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment was, in section 2, page 3, line 1, after the word "special," to strike out the word "land" and insert the word "low," so as to make the section read:

> SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the use of naval high-power radio stations, under the regulations prescribed in section 1, for the transmission and reception of commercial and press messages between these stations and other stations in the United States or its Territories, and between these stations and stations in foreign countries: Provided, That such use of naval high-power radio stations for commercial business, other than press messages, shall cease as and when the Secretary of the Navy is notified by the Secretary of Commerce that an American radio company is prepared to take over this work and establish adequate communication between the points in question: Provided further, That a special low charge shall be made for such press service at such rate as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported as an amendment that the preamble be stricken out, and the amendment was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF SOLDIER DEAD FROM FRANCE.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the city, and I should like to ask unanimous consent to take from the table, out of order, a short Senate resolution which I offered some days ago calling on the Secretary of War to give the Senate certain information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 322) submitted by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN on March 5 was read as follows:

> Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what steps have been taken to effect a settled policy in regard to the disposal and protection of the remains of American soldiers who have died in France, and what amount or amounts of money have been estimated to be necessary in the accomplishment of that result.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask leave to modify the resolution by striking out the word "directed," in line 2, and inserting the word "requested."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be so modified.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution be again read.

The resolution as modified was again read, and agreed to.

OIL PROSPECTING IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

Mr. GORE. I submit a Senate resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It merely calls for certain information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Senator from Oklahoma offers a resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The resolution (S. Res. 331) was read, as follows:

> Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate—
> First. As to what restrictions, if any, are imposed, either directly or indirectly, by France, Great Britain, Holland, Japan, or any other foreign country, or the dependencies thereof, upon the citizens of the United States in the matter of prospecting for petroleum, or in the acquisition and development of lands containing the same within the territory subject to the jurisdiction and influence of such countries.
> Second. If such restrictions exist, what steps have been taken by the Government of the United States to secure their removal and equality of treatment in respect of citizens of the United States.
> Third. If any restrictions are imposed by the Government of Mexico upon citizens of the United States in regard to the acquisition or development of petroleum-bearing lands within its jurisdiction which are not imposed upon nationals of other foreign countries.
> Fourth. If any such discriminating restrictions are imposed by the Government of Mexico upon citizens of the United States, what steps have been taken by the Government to secure removal of such restrictions and the equality of treatment in respect to citizens of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? If not, the resolution is adopted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the Senator is asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, as I understand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the request.

Mr. GORE. That was my request, and it has been acted upon. I will say to the Senator that the resolution contains the usual clause, "if not incompatible with the public interest."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands what provisions were inserted in the land-leasing bill recently passed by Congress affecting the subject matter of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. The resolution applies to foreign countries.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I so understand.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no provision in the land-leasing bill affecting the questions involved in the resolution.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Were there not provisions in that legislation restricting citizens of other countries as compared with citizens of our country in connection with the exploitation of oil lands in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. There are no restrictions other than that in case there is a restriction in a foreign country against citizens of this country, then the President of the United States shall have the power to prevent citizens of such foreign country securing leases on oil lands located within the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was my impression; that is to say, that the Congress has already recognized the possibility or the fact of restrictions imposed by other countries and has provided that if those restrictions are made by other countries the citizens of those other countries shall have the same restrictions imposed upon them in the United States. In view of that act of Congress, taking jurisdiction over the question, it seems to me a little questionable whether we should direct this inquiry to the Executive.

Mr. SMOOT. This is only asking for information as to whether there is discrimination against our country by any foreign country. The resolution will not in any way interfere or come in conflict with the provisions of the oil-leasing act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I understand it would not, of course; but if the oil-leasing act provides that the United States will retaliate against any country which imposes restrictions on aliens, then Congress has already acted upon the matter provided for.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, it applies only to the public domain of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all that Congress could affect by legislation.

Mr. PHELAN. But the Senator from Nebraska assumes that it applies to all oil lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; it applies only to the public lands.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not made any assumption. I am merely asking for information. My recollection was that Congress recognized the existence of discriminations by a number of countries, especially Great Britain, against aliens, citizens of other countries, and, having recognized it, that we provided for a retaliatory measure so far as it applied to the public lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Only so far as it applied to public lands; but it does not, of course, apply to private lands, nor could we legislate on any question of private lands.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. The bill which we passed, of course, referred exclusively to the public domain, and provided for leases. In the discussion it was brought out that a domestic corporation in which foreigners held the stock were permitted to engage in the exploitation and development of land. At that time I endeavored to put an amendment on the bill by which the President would have the power to put an embargo upon the exportation of all oils, whether developed in the public domain or in private lands, for the purpose of deterring foreigners from acquiring the lands which are now open to them, as in Oklahoma and Texas and California. There is nothing to prevent foreigners from acquiring, through a corporate organization, our valuable oil properties; and to-day, I see, the scarcity is so great that the Shipping Board, in order to get a reasonable price, will be compelled to commandeer under the war powers the oil which was developed by our people. It is an acute situation.

I therefore think that the resolution offered by the Senator should meet with no opposition, because it develops these facts in an official and authentic way. Outside of the public domain, we are really at the mercy of those great foreign Governments that are seeking to acquire the oil of the world, and it is time that the Senate should be informed in regard to the matter.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will yield the floor in just a moment, if the Senator will permit a further statement.

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I see no possible objection to the resolution as far as it seeks for information as to what countries impose these restrictions on aliens, and of course that will include citizens of the United States; but when the Senator asks the Executive to state what steps he has taken to secure the removal of those restrictions, it seems to me the President can naturally point to the enactment of this law which he approved, which is a retaliation against those countries.

I doubt whether the Executive could go any farther or do anything more than has already been done by the action of Congress, approved by the President, in retaliating against the countries which have taken that step.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is true that the leasing act contained a retaliatory provision which would exclude foreigners from exploiting the public domain in this country where the laws of the country to which the foreigner belonged contained an exclusion against our citizens. This, I may say, is looking ultimately to reciprocity instead of retaliation. If foreign countries exclude our citizens and we exclude their citizens, that, of course, is an act of retaliation; and if the worst comes to the worst, that policy would be justified. It would be much better, however, both for our citizens and for the public in this country generally, if we could bring about a policy of reciprocity between this country and other countries in regard to the development of oil territory.

I noticed a few days ago a statement made by E. MacKay Edwards, who is the English petroleum expert, in which he declares that within 10 years the United States will be obliged to purchase annually 500,000,000 barrels of oil produced within the territory of the British Empire. If that be true, it means not only an enormous expenditure on the part of the people of this country for a natural resource produced by foreigners, from which our people are excluded, but it means the absolute control of international shipping. The merchant marine of the seven seas will pass to those who have such complete and absolute control over petroleum, because petroleum is the fuel of the future. Navies and merchant marines must have recourse to the use of oil, in order to meet competition on the part of those who have access to petroleum.

It is known that Persia has granted to Great Britain an exclusive concession of 500,000 square miles, twice as large as the State of Texas, and Great Britain excludes the nationals of this country from prospecting for or exploiting oil in that vast region. They are not allowed to serve on boards of directors in companies exploiting that field. American citizens are not permitted, as I understand, to own stock in oil companies which are exploiting in that country. The same rules and regulations and restrictions are applied, as I understand, to Mesopotamia, which, it is predicted, will develop into the greatest oil field on the globe. Restrictions have also been imposed, as I am informed, in Mexico against nationals of the United States which are not applied to the nationals of other foreign countries. I do not know whether this is true or not. The public press has carried information of that character.

I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that this resolution calls upon the President for this information only in case it is deemed compatible with the public interest. If diplomatic steps are now being taken which it will be improper to divulge, the President, of course, would take advantage of this reservation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator is aware of the fact that in the early legislation by Congress dealing with the public domain, especially the mineral lands, there was a provision that only citizens of the United States could acquire title, so that we now have discrimination against aliens. They may not acquire the mineral lands owned by the Government of the United States.

Mr. GORE. Yes; but, as I understand, foreigners not only have but are exercising on a very extensive scale the right to acquire stock in petroleum companies operating in this country. The Dutch Shell is an alien company. It has vast holdings in the United States. We impose no discrimination against them. We ought not to submit to discrimination on their part against our nationals. The object of the resolution is to bring about reciprocity, if possible, and, if not, to lay the foundation for retaliation, the justice of which can not be challenged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

COLVILLE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask for the present consideration of House joint resolution 194, Order of Business 417. I do so because of the urgency of the matter. It is a joint resolution for the relief of settlers on the former Colville

Indian Reservation, which has passed the House, and has been favorably reported by the Public Lands Committee of the Senate.

These settlers have had three years of extreme drought. It is absolutely impossible for them to make the payments on the Indian lands. The Land Office is sending out notices under the law as it exists, contemplating forfeiture; and for this reason I hope the joint resolution may be considered and passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is it unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand so.

Mr. KING. There is no objection from any source?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No objection at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that the joint resolution is unanimously reported from the committee, and has also been approved by the department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries within the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.," approved March 11, 1918, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to extend for a period of one year the time for the payment of any annual installment due, or hereafter to become due, of the purchase price for lands sold under the act of Congress approved March 22, 1906 (34 Stats., p. 80), entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of surplus or unallotted lands of the diminished Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes,' and any payment so extended may annually thereafter be extended for a period of one year in the same manner: Provided, That the last payment and all other payments must be made within a period not exceeding one year after the last payment becomes due by the terms of the act under which the entry was made: Provided further, That any and all payments must be made when due unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest for one year in advance at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due as herein provided, and patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof: And provided further, That failure to make any payment that may be due, unless the same be extended, or to make any extended payment at or before the time to which such payment has been extended as herein provided shall forfeit the entry and the same shall be canceled and any and all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDEPENDENCE OF ARMENIA.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 332) was read, as follows:

Whereas the affairs of the Armenian people, and particularly their relations to the Turks, have reached a critical stage which can only be relieved by the proper arming of the Armenian people for the defense of their political liberties and ancient territorial rights: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Government of the United States recognize the independence of Armenia under the Government of the Armenian Republic, having its seat at Erivan, in Russian Armenia; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the allied powers and the United States forthwith furnish to the Armenian Republic adequate arms, munitions, equipage, and military stores to enable the Armenian Republic to raise and maintain an army for the defense of the liberty and independence of Armenia, the protection of the Armenian people, and the recovery and occupation of the territories from which the Armenians have been driven by the Turks; and be it

Resolved further, That it be the sense of the Senate that the proper and historic territories of Armenia be preserved in their integrity for the use and occupation of the Armenian people and for the support of their national life, and that all projects for the partition of Armenia be rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. As long as it was believed that the United States would take some interest in the Near East, in Turkey, and in Armenian affairs, there was a cessation of the atrocities which the Turks were committing against the Armenians, but now that the Ottoman Turks have reached the conclusion that the United States has withdrawn from world affairs, there has been a recrudescence of the murders and massacres which have for so many centuries characterized their treatment of the Armenian people. Only recently, upon the withdrawal of some French troops from one of the cities in Cilicia, more than 16,000 Armenians were butchered. There is a determination upon the part of the Turks to destroy the Armenian race, in order that their lands and possessions may become the property of the Turks. They know of the superior virtues of the Armenians, of their capacity to build and govern, and of their own incapacity to organize a government or build a civilized community. Fearing the ultimate freedom of the Armenians and their permanency in Western Asia and Asia Minor, the cruel, barbarous Turks seek their extermination. I propose to keep before the Senate and the public the awful conditions in Armenia, and the failure of the civilized nations to do their duty toward a people who for centuries were an outpost protecting Europe against Asiatic hordes, and who in the World War battled bravely with the allied nations for the cause of freedom and the overthrow of the autocracy which Germany sought to impose upon the world.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KING. I shall consume but a moment more, so the Senator can reach his matter before the morning hour expires.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator intend to ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. No; I intend to ask for its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I noticed in this morning's paper a telegram sent from Constantinople, containing an excerpt from a statement by an American girl. It reads as follows:

CONSTANTINOPLE, March 8.

Ten thousand Armenians are reported massacred, and now the French troops are evacuating the city. I have decided to stay with my orphans and take what comes. This may be my last letter. Whatever happens, rest assured: "God's in heaven and all's well." I am working in the daytime, and often in the nighttime in the emergency hospital. Believe me, war is hell.

Mr. President, the Christian peoples throughout the world sit down supinely and permit these atrocities to go on. We seem to possess no interest in those poor, suffering people and evince a willingness to see the Armenian race exterminated. The American people should be aroused to the enormity of the crime which is being perpetrated by the Turkish people. There should be protests from every city and community against the inhuman and barbarous conduct of the Turks. The Christian world was unanimous in demanding that the Turkish Government should be ended in Europe, and that the remnants of the Armenian people should be restored to their historic land and enjoy freedom under a government of their own choice. Shall the Christian nations fail in their duty in this dark hour? Shall we refuse to hear the cries and lamentations of these suffering people and condemn them to further brutalities and to extinction? It would be a blot upon the Christian nations if they failed to protect this people in this crisis. We must act; our duty is plain. The allied nations must act. They can not escape the condemnation of the world if they refuse succor to Armenia in her hour of travail. Let the Senate speak and voice the sentiments of the American people! Let our Government recognize the struggling Armenian Republic and join with the allied nations in giving material aid to a people who fought for the Allies and for us and for civilization.

I hope that the resolution just read, or another better phrased and stronger and more explicit in its terms, will speedily be reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

RECLASSIFICATION COMMISSION.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I move that the Senate take up for consideration Senate joint resolution 160, to provide for the preservation and maintenance of the records of the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries.

In explanation of the joint resolution, it may be advisable to say just a word at this time as to the reason why I seek to have it considered now.

The Joint Commission on the Reclassification of Salaries in the District of Columbia will make a report on Friday of this week. During the work of that commission there has been assembled a list of all of the positions in the Federal service in this District. An effort has been made to keep that list current, so that when the committees of Congress shall come to consider the report of the commission, and act upon it, there will be available for the committees at the time complete data as to the number of employees and the positions which they occupy in the Federal service. It is necessary that that work shall be kept up to date if the committees are to have the benefit of the labor of the joint commission.

The joint resolution provides only that this work shall be kept current, under the supervision of the Civil Service Commission. An amendment to the joint resolution has been reported by the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment providing that the departments shall detail assistants to the commission to continue this work. The suggestion that these employees should be detailed for the work comes from the fact that the work has been done by detailed employees thus far, and those who are familiar with the work should continue it, but under the supervision of some governmental agency.

The commission will go out of existence on Friday of the present week, and it is important that this work shall be continued until the committees of Congress shall have an opportunity to take up for consideration the work of the Reclassification Commission. I may state that the Reclassification Commission will have its report ready, we feel, certainly not later than Friday of this week. It is now in the hands of the printer. After observing that work I feel quite sure that Congress will be disposed to continue keeping the data up to date. But it will then have an opportunity to judge of that matter.

In the meantime, however, as chairman of the commission, I ask for the passage of this joint resolution. It was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, and that committee made its report recommending the passage of the resolution. I am making this request now at the instance of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the chairman of that committee.

I therefore move that the joint resolution be taken up for consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	Knox	Sheppard
Beckham	Gay	Lenroot	Shields
Borah	Glass	Lodge	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Gronna	McCormick	Smith, Md.
Calder	Hale	McKellar	Smoot
Capper	Harrison	McNary	Spencer
Chamberlain	Henderson	Moses	Thomas
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Underwood
Dial	Kellogg	Nugent	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Kendrick	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Kenyon	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Keyes	Poindexter	Watson
Fernald	King	Ransdell	Wolcott
Fletcher	Kirby	Reed

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Mexico that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution 160.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, pending that motion, I move that the Senate, in open executive session, proceed to consider the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. President, since we have come to the consideration of the reservation on article 10 for the second time, I venture to make a few observations upon certain passages of the President's last letter to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], in the light of some illuminating facts, and of the published correspondence upon the Adriatic controversy.

The President says in the course of his last letter:

> If article 10 is not adopted and acted upon, the Governments which reject it will, I think, be guilty of bad faith to their people whom they induced to make the infinite sacrifices of the war by the pledge that they would be fighting to redeem the world from the old order of force and aggression.

Parenthetically, that particular canticle has a familiar sound.

> If America has awakened, as the rest of the world has, to the vision of a new day in which the mistakes of the past are to be corrected, it will welcome the opportunity to share the responsibilities of article 10.

If America has awakened to the vision of the new day!

A little further in the letter there is evidence that while America may be awakening to a new day, His Excellency, the President of the United States, is alarmed by a nightmare.

> Through the sessions of the conference in Paris it was evident that a militaristic party, under the most influential leadership, was seeking to gain ascendency in the counsels of France. They were defeated then, but are in control now.

Modesty, I suppose, leads the writer to refrain from saying that their redoubtable adversary having resumed some of his duties in the United States, the forces of evil are able to prevail.

They were defeated then, but are in control now!

> The chief arguments advanced in Paris in support of the Italian claims on the Adriatic were strategic arguments—that is to say, military arguments which had at their back the thought of naval supremacy in that sea. For my own part, I am as intolerant of imperialistic designs on the part of other nations as I was of such designs on the part of Germany.

It is not surprising that during the last weeks the peoples of France and of all Europe first were increasingly bewildered and then disillusioned by the President's changes of position. The American people went through the same psychological changes in regard to Dr. Wilson as have the peoples of Europe.

There was a time when he was elected because he "kept us out of war." We remember that in America. Perhaps they are beginning to recall it across the seas. Then he urged "peace without victory." Later he insisted that it was the duty of the people of the United States to remain "neutral even in thought" as between the armed force of autocracy and the struggling forces of democracy in Europe. In the perfect English of which he is so completely a master, Dr. Wilson held that we had "no concern as to the obscure causes" of the conflict.

It may very well be that the President's education in the modern history of Europe was begun late in life. Manifestly, it is no more complete than his education in the political geography of Europe. We recall that he did not know that before the breaking up of the Hapsburg empire the Slovaks were subjects of the crown of St. Stephen, and not of Austria. But, sir, since he himself has been to Paris, it is astonishing that he has permitted his ignorance of the French language to allow persons to deceive him as to the political forces at work in France. Any tyro in French politics knows that the militaristic forces, the political forces to which Dr. Wilson alludes, found their expression in the great Frenchman who was prime minister at the time Dr. Wilson was in Paris, M. Clemenceau, and in his colleague, M. Andre Tardieu, who at one time was high commissioner of the French Republic in this Capital, and who later was a member of the French peace delegation. I do not mean that the extremists among the militarist forces, if their choice had been free, would have chosen those two; but since they were not free, certainly these two more nearly than the cabinet which now represents the Government in France expressed the policy which the President deplores.

The French chambers, sitting in joint assembly, in spite of M. Clemenceau's incomparable service to imperishable France, refused him the honor and the moral authority which inhere in the Presidency of the French Republic. As you know, sir, the President of the French Republic has no political authority, but the French chambers were unwilling to vest in that grand old man of France, who believed in arms as the safeguard of peace, the moral power which he might exercise in the Presidency. They chose in his stead M. Deschanel, the president of the Chamber of Deputies, who, like his predecessors, M. Poincare and M. Fallieres, represented those elements in French public life which had been opposed to Chauvinism.

The ministry itself, even though it must reckon with these forces, includes in its members as minister of the interior Monsieur Steeg, who has been denounced as a pacifist or defeatist by the very forces which the President says now are in control. Consider that he is minister of the interior, in whose hands under the French constitution is vested the control of the Government—general, divisional, and local—throughout France. Consider that he may remove even the elected local officers.

But, Mr. President, astonishing though Dr. Wilson's misapprehension of the facts regarding France may be, no less astonishing are the strictures which he places upon the Government of a friendly, and, to be precise, associated power. As the Roman Emperor longed that the world might be his oyster, it would seem that the Chief Executive would have the great powers of the earth each his Mexico in order that he may determine upon the recognition of the government de jure and de facto according to their fulfillment of his ideals and their subservience to his purposes.

The cabinet of France is its executive. It exists to-day by virtue of the decision of the majority of the French Chambers chosen in the last election. It governs by virtue of that majority and not despite a repudiation by the people at the polls. Even though its policy may be challenged, it is the policy of the majority which it seeks to fulfill. None can charge either that the will of the majority is cheated by the obduracy of a repudiated executive.

We certainly would brook no interference in our internal affairs, but seemingly our representatives have so fallen into the habit of governing the affairs of Europe that now they think it proper to determine for the democracies of Europe the morality of the public policies adopted by their duly chosen Governments.

But, Mr. President, there seems some confusion of counsel among our world tribunes. The President himself says:

> If America has awakened, as the rest of the world has, to the vision of a new day—

And then adds that—

> A militaristic party, under the most influential leadership, seeking to gain ascendancy in the counsels of France * * * are in control now.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] said:

France has enormously changed since the days when George Washington wrote his Farewell Address. The conquering hero who grew out of the French Revolution was even then, in the full strength of his growing powers, bent upon the conquest of Europe. France has now become a Republic, and in France the opinion of the French people rules the Republic as completely as the opinion of the American people rules the Republic of the United States. They make and change their laws at will, and they topple over their cabinets whenever they do not respond to public opinion in France.

So said the paladin of the new liberties upon this floor—the Senator from Nebraska. As the Senator from Nebraska speaks of France, so also does he speak of the constitutional monarchy in Italy, which Dr. Wilson reprobates as seeking to carry out imperialistic designs because it holds that it must find a strategic frontier in Istria, a frontier which will include the corpus separatum of Fiume. The inconsistencies of our policy in Europe are as numerous and fantastic as the follies and dangers of our intervention there are great.

You have noted, sir, in reading the correspondence upon the Adriatic controversy that the President objected to the bestowal upon Italy of a coastal strip—a barren coastal strip—along the Adriatic, a strip necessary to the geographic contact between Fiume and the body of the kingdom. To his objection was joined denunciation which found no incongruity in opposing on the Adriatic what is justified in the establishment of the corridor which gave Poland her vent to the sea.

I do not argue the merits either of the corridor or the coastal strip, but if one was justified by high reasons of state so was the other. If the anamalous provision made for the government of Danzig was sound, so, based upon it, was the provision proposed by the European prime ministers for the government of Fiume.

But this is a minor instance of the absurd, the fantastic inconsistency of the contention of the American administration, which is bringing down upon us the ridicule and the ill will of the peoples to whom we were joined in the war. The very hand which signed the protest, the denunciation, if you please, against the establishment of strategic frontiers contained in the paragraph of the letter to the Senator from Nebraska, which I have read, has signed the agreement which established the strategic frontier at the Brenner, which blocks from the north any army which might seek to invade Italy through the valley of the Adige. The same hand joined in the agreement which established the strategic frontier of northwestern Czechoslovakia, a frontier which, God knows, is defensible on no other ground.

The proposal of the allied prime ministers would add 50,000 Jugo-Slavs to the 400,000 already included within the so-called Wilson line—the projected Italian frontier indorsed by Dr. Wilson. To the north of the Brenner half a million Tyrolese are held within the defensible and political frontier of Italy, and that to the northwest of Czechoslovakia includes within the new State 3,000,000 Germans as against some four and one-half or five million Czechs and three or three and a half million Slovaks.

The morality, the wisdom, the sound and enduring public policy of the establishment of a strategic frontier depends upon many factors. It is childish to condemn strategic frontiers as such. Was it not Thomas Jefferson, whose present Democratic successor is his political antithesis—was it not Thomas Jefferson who said that whatever power holds the mouths of the Mississippi must be the enemy of the United States?

In laboring his argument the President urges that the pact of London, being a secret treaty, can have no bearing on the settlement of the issue upon the shores of the Adriatic. Heaven bless us and keep us in countenance! The venerable stylist who now argues in that sense has utterly forgotten the secret treaty which led to the establishment of the Saar settlement and to the infamous agreement by our representatives regarding Shantung, which defies adequate characterization upon this floor.

But I do not speak of hypocrisy. It is an aberration of memory, surely, which alone could explain such a contradiction.

It is reported to have been remarked by the Presidnt that since this war was waged largely to preserve the sanctity of treaties, although some of them were unconscionable, yet must they be carried out. They must be carried out when they inure to the benefit of Japan—able, redoubtable, sinuous Japan—but not when they relate to Italy, hungry and wasted. They must be carried out in the interest of Japan, less than 500 of whose sons fell in this war, but not in the interest of Italy, half a million of whose sons sleep their last sleep on the Carso and on the Julian Alps, on the parched deserts or the frozen peaks of her frontiers.

The note addressed by the British and French premiers to the President, and made public on the 5th of March, reads in part as follows:

The French and British prime ministers must further refer to the observations of President Wilson on the character and applicability of the treaty of London. With regard to the treaty they feel bound to insist that its secret character, to which he objects, was due to the exigencies of military strategy. The essence of all success in warfare is to prevent divulging to the enemy of important plans which are of a military or political character, and the treaty on the faith of which Italy entered the war was not one which could be published during hostilities without detriment to the allied cause.

With regard to their statement that in the event of an amicable settlement not being arrived at between Italy and Jugo-Slavia the treaty of London would have to come into force so far as they are concerned: The French and British prime ministers feel that they need add little to the explanations they have already given in the memorandum of February 17.

It is interesting to consider the respective dates upon which Italy entered the war and upon which the President urged "peace without victory."

The definite and well-accepted policy of the American Government—

Writes the President in his reply made public on March 7—throughout its participation in the deliberations of the peace conference was that it did not consider itself bound by secret treaties of which it had previously not known the existence.

I take it, then, that Dr. Wilson was party to the Shantung arrangement—unofficially, at least.

Where the provisions of such treaties were just and reasonable—

As in Shantung, I assume—the United States was willing to respect them. But the French and British prime ministers will, of course, not expect the Government of the United States to approve the execution of the terms of the treaty of London, except in so far as that Government may be convinced that those terms are intrinsically just and are consistent with the maintenance of peace and settled order in southeastern Europe.

Contrast the lot of the 36,000,000 of Shantung with that of the 400,000 Jugo-Slavs, whose fate is determined without consulting them; consider, too, the half million Tyrolese and 3,000,000 Germans in Czechoslovakia, the million and more Magyars and Ruthenes in Czechoslovakia, the 3,000,000 and more Ukrainians in Poland. Compare the policy which justified the arbitrary determination of the sovereignty over these millions with that which decided the fate of the 50,000 Jugo-Slavs who would be made subjects of Italy by the settlement proposed by the French and British prime ministers, and to which the President objects.

In order that he might do justice to the 50,000, whereas he refused to do it to the millions, he makes a portentious threat, the terms of which I read verbatim to the Senate:

But if substantial agreement on what is just and reasonable is not to determine international issues, * * * if, in a word, the old order of things which brought so many evils on the world is still to prevail, then the time is not yet come when this Government can enter a concert of powers the very existence of which must depend upon a new spirit and a new order. The American people are willing to share in such high enterprise, but many among them are fearful lest they become entangled in international policies and committed to international obligations foreign alike to their ideals and their traditions.

I sometimes wonder if Janus becomes dizzy trying to look upon the many aspects of our policy.

To commit them to such a policy as that embodied in the latest Adriatic proposals and to obligate them to maintain injustice as against the claims of justice would be to provide the most solid ground for such fears. This Government can undertake no such grave responsibility.

It is to be upon the determination of a single person, then—frail, fallible, changeable as all of us are—that the United States is to decide whether a settlement is just, and as such is to be guaranteed, or whether it is unjust, and the charter of a new order therefore is to be withdrawn from the consideration of the Senate. The President would guarantee frontiers of central Europe which do violence to the spirit of nationality among millions—guarantee them in the blood of our sons and in our treasure—but would withhold from all the world the guaranties of peace and of a new order if he may not have his will in the settlement of the frontier upon the Istrian peninsula against that of all the great democracies of Europe.

Out of the phantasms of fancy, the phantasmagoria of contradiction and inconsistency which envelop us, there arises this immediate and elemental fact. It has been admirably expressed by the venerable Senator from Massachusetts, who sees clearly the issue which will divide men here. He said:

Now, the President says that the salvation of the world must not be sought by the counsel of diplomats. That cuts out of the treaty every provision in it except article 10, and article 10 is not diplomatic; it is an appeal to naked force. That is why we so much object to it; that is why the country so much objects to it; it is naked force, for which each nation is made individually responsible.

There is not one objection which has been made by the most extreme opponents of the league, and of article 10 particularly, that is not admitted and advocated in the letter of the President. Article 10 is the one pure force article in the covenant. He discards all the others and stands on that alone. It is well that he has said it; the issue can be veiled no longer; it justifies the position that we on this side, all alike, have taken, that there must be no obligation imposed on the United States to carry out the provisions of article 10.

The issue can be veiled no longer. The legalistic phrase makers may write and rewrite reservations, they may torture sentences and conjure with words, but the issue is here. If agreement is to be had and ratification consummated, the Senator from Nebraska and the President of the United States must eat their words, or so must the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts. The issue can not be confused by anything written in these halls or voted in this Chamber. It will not down. If there be ratification, surrender there must be, too, and the people will know who has surrendered.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Beckham	Gerry	Lenroot	Sheppard
Brandegee	Glass	Lodge	Simmons
Calder	Gore	McCormick	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Hale	McKellar	Smoot
Chamberlain	Harrison	McNary	Spencer
Colt	Henderson	Myers	Stanley
Culberson	Hitchcock	Nelson	Sterling
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Thomas
Dial	Kellogg	Phelan	Trammell
Dillingham	Kendrick	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	Kenyon	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Keyes	Pomerene	Watson
France	King	Ransdell	Williams
Gay	Knox	Reed	Wolcott

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] are detained on official business of the Senate upon a conference committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in the letter of the President of the United States of March 8, 1920, addressed to the Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK, United States Senate, there is a very illuminating passage which serves, I believe, to put in clear definition the attitude the advocates of the league assume toward the new order in the world which will ensue from its adoption. In his letter the President uses this language:

> Any reservation which seeks to deprive the League of Nations of the force of article 10 cuts at the very heart and life of the covenant itself. Any League of Nations which does not guarantee as a matter of incontestable right the political independence and integrity of each of its members might be hardly more than a futile scrap of paper, as ineffective in operation as the agreement between Belgium and Germany which the Germans violated in 1914.

From this it appears, Mr. President, that it is the view of the chief of the advocates of the League of Nations that if those nations which become its members "guarantee as a matter of incontestable right," to quote his language, "the political independence and integrity of each of the members," then this covenant will be more enduring and productive of more substantial results in preserving the peace of the world than was the treaty between Prussia and the other nations as to Belgium.

The President does not say why he supposes this agreement is to be more effective than the agreement which was made between the nations to the Belgian treaty in 1831.

Prussia, Austria, France, Russia, and Great Britain, in a treaty with the Netherlands, on the 15th day of November, 1831, did exactly, in so far as Belgium is concerned and in very similar language, what it is now proposed that the various nations which are invited to become members of the League of Nations shall do in regard to the territorial integrity of the several members. The President notes that the result of that agreement was that the treaty became a scrap of paper. But he says if we do not make an agreement to the same purport and effect which was made in that treaty, the covenant of the League of Nations is destined to become no more than was the treaty with Belgium.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it illustrates in a very convincing manner the illusion which exists as to the effect which the agreement of the League of Nations is to have upon the world.

It is assumed that those who plight their faith in this agreement are to keep the agreement in some different way from that in which similar agreements in the past have been kept, and with that assumption, that illusion that the heart of man is to be changed—the old conflict of evil is to be suppressed, and the council of the League of Nations, the diplomats of whom the President speaks, are to be governed by motives of justice and generosity in the place of those of ambition and selfishness which, as the President himself points out, have governed similar councils of diplomats in all times past. Yet there is no ground given for the assumption, no argument made nor facts presented upon which we could surely assume that this agreement will be any more binding upon those nations than the scraps of paper of former State agreements.

The language of article 10, in so far as it affects the matter which is spoken of in the extract which I have just read, uses the word "undertake." It says that—

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

The only difference between this agreement and the agreement between the nations and the Netherlands in regard to the neutrality of Belgium is that in the Belgian treaty the word "guarantee" was used. Why there should be any more effect from the word "undertake" than from the "guarantee" of the neutrality of Belgium is not explained. The Belgian treaty of 1831 provided as follows:

> Belgium, within the limits specified in articles 1, 2, and 4, shall form an independent and perpetually neutral State. It shall be bound to observe such neutrality toward all other States.

Article 25 provides that—

> The courts of Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, and Russia guarantee to His Majesty the King of the Belgians the execution of all the preceding articles.

This is signed by the representatives of those various nations, by which signatures they guarantee the perpetual independence and neutrality of the new Belgian State, whose boundaries were defined in the treaty.

I assert as a matter of fact—getting away from the illusions which have existed as to the immediate coming of a new order in the world—the adoption of the covenant of the League of Nations, even though it should be adopted in its original form, in which the nations that are members of it undertake to preserve the territorial integrity of its various members, will have no more effect, and we can not expect it to be subject to any more success, than was the treaty of 1831 with Belgium, which used even stronger language than that which is contained in article 10 of this agreement.

In 1914, when the world was confronted with a great conflagration of war, which everybody foresaw would probably engage all the great nations in Europe and develop into the greatest struggle of arms that history had recorded, the United States had an opportunity, if it chose to do so, to assume the burdens and the obligations which are sought now to be imposed upon it in article 10 of this agreement which the President is urging with so much force. France and Great Britain sent a representative to the President of the United States. He visited him at the White House, and on behalf of those nations which were then standing upon the threshold of a conflict with the great military machine of Germany he urged the President to use at least the moral forces of this great Nation to stop further progress of war which would plunge the world into blood. The situation in which the United States was at that time, as compared with the situation in which it would be if bound by article 10 of this covenant, constitutes the difference between the advocates and the opponents of the league. Those who are opposed to the adoption of article 10 do not propose to deprive this Nation of the power to use its influence, its arms, if need be, to preserve territorial integrity and political independence in such emergencies as may involve the destinies of the world or the interests of this country to such an extent as to justify such an interposition. We are opposed to binding ourselves to interpose under all circumstances and conditions, and to do so under the direction of the council of the League of Nations rather than that we should be free to act under the judgment of the American people in the emergency when it arises.

In 1914 when the message was presented to the President many of the most prominent leaders of public thought in America urged the President at that time that he should act. It was such an emergency as had not arisen for many years before that time and probably will not arise for a generation succeeding this Great War that has just closed. When the opportunity comes for this Nation to act, without the responsibilities sought to be placed upon it under all circumstances and conditions by article 10 of the League of Nations, if the emergency is sufficiently great, that action will be taken.

But the attitude of the President at that time was that it was a matter which did not concern us, and even after the appeal had been made the President's position was that we should keep out of the war. The principal slogan in a great political campaign was that he had done so, that he had kept us out of the war in the exercise of his leadership as the chief executive officer of the country.

But now the position of the President and those who agree with him in regard to the League of Nations is not only that in such an emergency we should intervene if the free judgment of the Government of the United States approves it, but that we should bind ourselves in advance under all circumstances, without the opportunity to determine whether the emergency justifies it or not, to become a party to the conflict.

I fail to understand why it is assumed, in case this covenant should be adopted, that it would preserve the peace of the world longer than the treaty of Belgium preserved the neutrality of Belgium. For 85 years after the treaty of Belgium was ratified that little nation, situated as a buffer State between the greatest military powers of Europe, preserved its independence and territorial integrity by virtue of the treaty of November 15, 1831. If the covenant of the League of Nations, which the President says would amount to no more than did the treaty of Belgium, even should it be ratified without article 10, should preserve the peace of the world for a period of 85 years after its adoption, I think it would be accomplishing a great deal more than even its most optimistic advocates expect of it.

Mr. President, there are some further circumstances which indicate, it seems to me, the illusion, if I may use that word, of the League of Nations as to its power to remove the bitter conflict, the militarism, in which the Old World heretofore has been involved. The President himself in this letter uses some very bitter language toward the Republic of France. He says it is now in the control of a militaristic party. He sets out at considerable length the old order which had existed in Europe, "the ideal of imperialism which seeks to dominate by force and unjust power, an ideal which is by no means dead and which is earnestly held in many quarters still." He says:

> Militaristic ambitions and imperialistic policies are by no means dead, even in the councils of the nations whom we most trust and with whom we most desire to be associated in the tasks of peace.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. Have not Great Britain, France, and Italy already entered into the League of Nations, and is it not a functioning reality among those nations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was just going to call attention to the fact. It seems to me to be a rather overoptimistic hope that merely by joining the League of Nations, in which we shall be partners with Great Britain and France, the selfishness, ambition, and militarism, if they exist as charged in the President's letter, would disappear.

Mr. GORE. Has not the league regenerated those nations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should not imagine so, although if it is to have that effect it would seem that it should have already regenerated those members which have ratified it.

The partitioning of China, the subjection of Persia to the control and suzerainty of Great Britain, the partitioning of the Turkish Empire, are all a part of the old order of things, of which the President has spoken. Yet it is proposed that we shall join an irrevocable league, at least one from which we can never withdraw without being subjected to the charge of being quitters, of quitting the game and of abandoning our obligations and responsibilities, and that once we may join it, by becoming a member of that agreement we are to live in a world of unselfishness, of international altruism, with the very nations which the President here says are at this moment controlled by militarism and selfish ambition.

Most people who are advocates of the League of Nations and who are actuated by very high motives of idealism, though they are enamored of the idea of the League of Nations, object to everything that the League of Nations has done. They are not in favor of the rape of China. They are not in favor of the partitioning of the eastern world by the European military powers. They are opposed to that as a part of the old order of things. And yet for some unexplained reason they insist that the very nations already in alliance, which have pursued this "old order" of ambition, are henceforth to be of the "new order."

Unfortunately there is no assurance, no explanation, no new light to aid us in accepting the belief that is demanded of us that those characteristics that have governed them so far in the conduct of the League of Nations will be changed in any particular whatever after its ratification by the United States. The President says in his letter:

> It must not be forgotten, Senator, that this article constitutes a renunciation of wrong ambition on the part of powerful nations with whom we were associated in the war.

That is, article 10. France had adopted article 10; Great Britain had adopted article 10; Italy had adopted article 10; Japan had adopted article 10; but it did not operate with those nations as "a renunciation of" what the President calls "wrong ambition on the part of powerful nations with whom we were associated in the war." The adoption of article 10 did not deprive Japan of the desire to obtain her share of the German islands in the Pacific; our alliance and association did not enable the United States to prevent Japan from taking Shantung from China, our friend and ally in the war. It did not prevent Great Britain from taking a greater empire, a greater colonial extent of territory, than she had ever obtained on any previous occasion. So why are we to believe that the adoption of article 10 constitutes, as is stated here, a renunciation of the selfish ambition by which nations heretofore have been guided in their international affairs?

There is reference in the President's letter to the rule of the world by a small coterie of trustees. The President on various occasions has expressed his objection to the people of the world having their destinies controlled by trustees. In this letter he again refers to that subject, as follows:

> For my own part, I am not willing to trust to the counsel of diplomats the working out of any salvation of the world from the things which it has suffered.

I agree with him in that; and, because I agree with the President in that brief and succinct enunciation of fundamental principles of government, I am opposed to the adoption of a constitution of the world which shall be under the control of a small handful of diplomats sitting at the seat of the league in some European country.

What else, Mr. President, is the council of the League of Nations if it is not a council of diplomats; and what else, according to the arguments which have been made in its behalf by its chief advocates, will be the purported and ostensible object and the labor of the council of the League of Nations, a small body of diplomats in some European city which may be selected as the seat of government of the league, but the working out of the salvation of the world? That is the purpose—the salvation of the world—which with very high idealism the President has urged as the justification for the supreme sacrifice of the independence of the United States.

I call attention, Mr. President, to the inconsistency of the declaration of the President in this letter, that he will not consent to trust the salvation of the world to a small council of diplomats at the same time he is writing to the Senator from Nebraska, who is in charge of the League of Nations upon the floor, urging the adoption of the instrument which will put the destinies of the world in charge of that very kind of an organization.

Mr. President, during the discussion of the League of Nations on the floor here the other day there were a number of other indications of the unusual psychological state of mind which the discussion of this subject has produced, it seems to me. We had here the spectacle of the Senator from Nebraska, who is the chief advocate of the league covenant in the Senate, urging in behalf of certain of its provisions that we could afford to allow the self-governing dominions of Great Britain the right to their multiplied British vote in the League of Nations because we could depend upon it that in questions involving great American interests which were vital to our country the votes of the British dominions would be cast with the United States. No explanation was given by the Senator from Nebraska for any such assumption.

We even heard it argued here that the Dominion of Canada was an independent nation to all intents and purposes. Those propositions were stated here as a basis on which it was perfectly safe for the United States to entrust its destiny to the League of Nations, in which one of the rival powers, said by the President to be governed by selfish ambitions and imperialistic designs, has six times as much interest and influence in this international government as the American people shall have.

The statement that Canada will vote with the United States is pure assumption; there is no reason to suppose that the British dominions in any conflict in the League of Nations, in which there is a rivalry between the British Empire and the United States, will side with the United States against the interest of that Empire.

Mr. President, the same sort of psychological eccentricity was demonstrated by the argument which was made at the same time that while the British dominions, although a part of the British Empire, would take the part of the United States in vital controversies, we could also depend upon Central American countries, such as Honduras, Haiti, and Panama, to vote with the United States, and thereby counterbalance the increased number of votes given to the British Empire in the league.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know whether the Senator has referred to it or not, but I call his attention to the fact that the executive of every one of the so-called self-governing dependencies of Great Britain is nominated and appointed in England and sent out from England.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is entirely true. The fact of the case is that it seems to me almost incredible that here in the Senate of the United States we are debating in a serious way whether or not Canada is a part of Great Britain and what kind of a government it has. Everybody knows the main, essential features of the Canadian Government. I admire the Canadians very much; and one thing that I admire them for is their intense love of their country; I admire them also for their ability to look after the interests of their country. What I should like to see in the American Senate in the consideration of this instrument, which proposes to divest us of independence and subject our material interests to the control of foreign peoples, is some similar sort of national patriotism and of governmental capacity which has been shown by the Canadians and by the British in the disposition of these questions.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No doubt the Senator is aware, although I do not know whether he has referred to it, that every one of the so-called self-governing dependencies of the British Empire relies solely, or almost solely, for the maintenance of its local self-government upon the protection of the British Navy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is absolutely true. I am somewhat acquainted with the Canadians; I have been in Canada a great many times, and the Senator from Nebraska is entirely mistaken in the assumption that the Canadians are not intensely pro-British. I do not suppose there is a more intense pro-British element in the British Empire than the Canadian people. They are as intensely pro-British as are the inhabitants of Great Britain itself; and for us to be asked to surrender a superior vote in this international government to the dominions of Great Britain because we can depend upon them to look out for the interests of the United States is a very fair sample of that sort of practical sagacity which has directed the conduct of this whole affair.

Mr. President, it seems to me that it would be difficult to conceive of a more humiliating position for the 110,000,000 people of the United States, with their long heritage of self-government, the struggles and triumphs by which they have arrived at a self-builded state and have taken their place as equals among the greatest peoples of the world, than that which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] advocated the other day, that if we get into a hard fix in this League of Nations by reason of the British Empire having six times as many votes as we have, we can depend upon Haiti and Panama to take care of us. Haiti, a little negro Republic down in the Caribbean Sea which has given no indication of capacity to govern properly even its own petty island. We are told that we can depend upon them to look out for the interests of the people of the United States!

Why, Mr. President, China was told that, or something similar to it. When China appeared at the peace conference she was told not to bother about it; that her friends would take care of her. She wanted to employ an attorney to prepare a brief. The representatives of the United States waved her aside and said it was not necessary, that the United States would look out for the interests of China. China has adopted that policy which the advocates of the League of Nations in effect ask the United States to adopt. She has adopted it and followed it for years—a policy of nonresistance and passivity, either that her friends in some other part of the world will take care of her or that the Lord will take care of her. Now, as a matter of fact, the Lord takes care of those who take care of themselves. The American people have taken care of themselves and have attained what they have attained of the blessings of the world by their ability to do so.

It is a good deal like the Irishman who had his eyes blacked, and his wife asked him who gave him those black eyes. He said: "Nobody gives you nothin'; I had to fight for 'em." [Laughter.] We have had to fight for what we have; and when the time comes that we surrender the capacity to fight, if need be—although we do not want to fight unless it is the last resource—and depend upon the good will of Haiti and Panama to take care of us, or upon the illusion of the Senator from Nebraska that in a tight pinch Canada is going to side with us against Great Britain, then we will be in a worse situation than China is.

What is the situation in China? Her best friend, supposed to be the great altruistic nation of the world, the disinterested American Republic, told her she need not concern herself about her interests in the peace conference in Paris, that the conference would take care of her; and while it was doing that her own allies were robbing her of the most strategic point in her Empire, the Province of Shantung, the seat of the shrine of Confucius—a Province which also contains the strategic railroad of China, which makes a junction with the great arteries of commerce from the north to the south of the Empire. The nation which has its hand upon that key can control the future development and growth of the industries and commerce, the economic life and the military defenses of that mighty Empire. At the very time that they were being told that they need not concern themselves, that we would take care of them, that is the way we took care of them; and now it is argued, here in the American Senate, that it is a good thing for China, she ought not to object to it; it is a good thing for her to be partitioned, and a benefit to her, for Japan, in pursuance of what the President calls a militaristic and imperialistic policy, to rob her of her greatest Province.

Why, Mr. President, it is as though some leviathan of the deep were stranded upon a desert shore, and the wild Indians of the land were to put ladders upon its carcass, and mount like Lilliputians upon its monstrous body, and hack from its sides the flesh of which is was composed, and partition it among themselves. China is like a stranded whale, because she has adopted the policy which we are asked here to have the United States adopt. She has allowed herself to arrive at a helpless position, where she can only depend upon that thing which does not exist, and that is diplomatic and international generosity. There is not any such thing.

Mr. President, there is another phase of this matter of which I want to speak, and that is that phase which is indicated by the vehement arguments here in behalf of Great Britain.

We are very prone to imagine that there are no more tories in the United States to-day. We know that there were in the dark days when we gained this independence which it is now proposed to compromise by establishing the constitution of a government for the world. Anyone who has read the history of the war for independence knows of the difficulties which the patriots suffered by the opposition of their fellow citizens who were called tories, and those tories were not exterminated by the war for independence. All of them did not go to England.

Some of them remained in the United States and their descendants and their counterparts are here to-day. There is an element that supports that sort of pro-Britishism to which expression has been given upon this floor in the last few days that would be glad to see the flag of the United States lowered and the composite flag of the British Empire erected in its place. Strange to say, there are many who make no secret of their desire to come again into union with Great Britain and have us take our place along with Canada as one of the British Provinces. They propose that in the League of Nations the United States would have but one vote and Canada a vote and South Africa a vote, all upon an equal basis, as a part and parcel of this combined government in which the British Empire, holding the strategic points of the world and strengthened in her power by the acquisitions which she has received from this League of Nations itself, should again become united under the flag from which we escaped by the sufferings and the tribulations of the Revolutionary War.

I want to quote, Mr. President, some of the declarations which have been made by men who are or were prominent in American life advocating that policy. It is a part of the doctrine of internationalism. You hear it argued upon all sides that we must extend the Federal principle to the world; that that thing which has proved good by uniting the States in America in a Federal Union will prove still better if we extend it to include the polyglot races of the other continents.

Why, Mr. President, if you extend the principle of unity to the point where it embraces the globe, you meet yourself coming back. You then neutralize whatever of beneficial effect in government and in society would arise from the principle of combination, because all will again be without independent restraint. Notwithstanding the delusions of which I have spoken, there is still going to be in the human breast the same selfishness and the same ambition; there is going to be the same desire to forward their own interests, and there is just as much opportunity for struggle and conflict within such a world union as there would be without it. The only advantage that can be derived from the principle of federation is when it is carried to such a point, under such conditions of similarity of race and of language as obtain in the continental domains of the United States, that it has sufficient power to enforce its governmental policies, and sufficient distribution of intelligence to arrive at just decisions; and to then combat from its mighty independent station those forces of evil which the President has so well described. It then is a force for good in the world, against the forces of injustice which may be in rivalry or conflict with it. But if you unite it with these other forces and surrender its independent position, you surrender its power, you neutralize the benefit which comes from a reasonable degree of federal union. If you extend to all the world the principle you leave the nations of the world in the same relative position they occupied before they started upon the process of combining, with no more restrictions upon conflict with each other than they would have had even though there had been no process of federation or of unity at all.

Mr. President, frequent reference has been made here to the propaganda which was established and sustained by Mr. Andrew Carnegie in favor of a reunion with Great Britain. I am a believer in the ethics of the injunction, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum"; but I must call attention to what the beliefs of this great propagandist were while pointing out the continuous course of the same influence and policy which is now showing its effect in such a powerful way in this internationalist movement, which is one of the forces back of the League of Nations.

In an article in the North American Review, of June, 1893, Mr. Carnegie made these significant statements.

The Senator from Nebraska, with his view of our unity of governmental interest with Canada and his willingness to trust to the generosity of the British Empire, might take note of it.

> Let men say what they will, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited States of "the British-American Union."

Further he said:

> National patriotism or pride can not prove a serious obstacle in the way of reunion.

Mr. REED. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am reading from an article in the North American Review, of June, 1893, by Mr. Andrew Carnegie. Further he said:

> All party divisions sink into nothingness in my thoughts compared with the reunion of our race.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator read the comment of the Senator from Nebraska on that same article?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No. I heard the Senator from Missouri refer to it the other day, and it was very appropriate.

Mr. REED. The Senator will find it very interesting. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am sure it is interesting, but somewhat in conflict with the vehement appeals in behalf of Great Britain which have been made in the last few days.

I want to read further, and I think I am justified in reading at a little more length because of the fact that this question of a union with Great Britain is now an actual current issue. Nobody can deny successfully that the League of Nations will establish a governmental union with Great Britain, and consequently it is a fruition and an accomplishment of the policy to which Mr. Carnegie devoted so many years of his life and so many millions of his dollars. Over $300,000,000 of endowments of various kinds were made by Mr. Carnegie.

I saw the effect of the use of some of that money in the struggle we had here some few years ago on the question of the Panama Canal tolls, where the American people had built a canal with their own money and their own efforts, at a cost of some $400,000,000. The transportation interests of Canada in that case, the principal original instigators of the movement to repeal the so-called free-tolls act, were able to influence the British Government to reopen the question, which had been settled upon an American basis, that the Panama Canal was an American canal, under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who was at that time Secretary of State. It was a great thing for the country that at that time we had an American in that position.

Mr. Carnegie, through his Peace Foundation, expended many thousands of dollars in circulating literature throughout this country and Great Britain in behalf of the internationalization of the Panama Canal, and the placing of Great Britain upon an equal basis with this country in the canal, which position, as a result of the use of that money, she occupies down to the present time. He has founded a church union in which, in the holy name of religion, permanent organizations, with paid secretaries and chairmen, have entered into the field of statecraft, interested themselves in this question of a league of nations, which has about as little to do with religion as anything that I can imagine, and brought to bear in its behalf the powerful influence of the interchurch world movement, one agency of which was founded by Mr. Carnegie, and is supported by funds which he left for that purpose.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. When the Senator referred to an American Secretary of State, to whom did he have allusion?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I alluded to the Secretary of State who took an American viewpoint of the Panama Canal, at present the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

Mr. PHELAN. I thought the Senator referred to John Hay, who took a contrary view.

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I referred to the Senator from Pennsylvania, through whose efforts and influence Great Britain had finally accepted the American viewpoint, and the American Congress had enacted a law putting us in the only natural position we could occupy, so far as the canal was concerned, that our own ships should not be required to pay tolls in our own canal, which we had built with our own money.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. While the Senator is upon that theme, it might not be inopportune to suggest that the fight for the British view and the Carnegie view was led on the floor of the Senate by the then distinguished Senator from New York who has been one of the chief apostles of the doctrine of reservations.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator will permit me, in addition to the activities of the Carnegie Peace Foundation which he has mentioned, that institution has, at least in part, supported not less than six publications, which have been devoting their columns, some of them for many months and some of them for years, to the advocacy of this same un-American doctrine which the Senator is now discussing. They have been advocating internationalism, pacifism, and an international control over national affairs; and I might say in this connection that this institution has its branches all over the world, which it finances in whole or in part, and that the business of those branches is to create a sentiment, all of it tending to break down national feeling and build up a spirit of internationalism, and to lay the foundation for a sentiment which, carried to the legitimate conclusion, leads us just where Mr. Carnegie said, in the article the Senator has read, we ought to go—back under one flag—and that flag the flag of Great Britain.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, one of the perfectly obvious and appropriate policies of a federation of states, such as the Federation or Union of the American States, or the federation of states that is provided for in this covenant, first called the constitution of the nations of the world, setting up a crude form of a republic of the world, is the abolishment of trade barriers between them. The Constitution of the United States very wisely provided against the imposition of taxes upon commerce passing between the States. It is quite significant that those who were chiefly instrumental in promoting the idea of the League of Nations, and the practical forcing of it upon the European countries, believe in the extension of that doctrine of free trade to the entire world. My impression is, from hearing his speeches upon the subject of the tariff, that the President of the United States is utterly opposed to any protective system. He is what is commonly called a free trader. I want to follow out a little further the suggestion of that influence in the shaping of this League of Nations.

Mr. Carnegie, in the article to which I referred, used this language:

> I do not shut my eyes to the fact that reunion bringing free entrance of British products would cause serious disturbance to many manufacturing interests near the Atlantic coast which have been built up under the protective system. Judging from my knowledge of the American manufacturers, there are few who would not gladly make the necessary pecuniary sacrifices to bring about a reunion of the old home and new.

If we turn, Mr. President, from those words of Mr. Andrew Carnegie to the terms of the constitution of the republic of the world, called the League of Nations, we find in article 23 this provision:

> Members of the league will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit * * * for the commerce of all members of the league.

The typical economic policy of the United States is protection, based upon the theory that we occupy a position in society and in economics that is superior to the position and the situation in life of the peoples of many other countries of the world, and that in order to maintain that superior position we have reserved to ourselves the right to impose and have put into effect as a policy the imposition of tariff duties for the purpose of protecting our industries. Such a policy is utterly opposed in theory and in principle to the doctrine of federated states, upon which basis the League of Nations is founded. So it is not surprising to find in the language of the League of Nations an express provision and guaranty that the members of the league agree to provide for the free transit of the commerce of the members of the league.

What do they mean by that? Transit of commerce, as I understand it, means the passage of commodities of commerce from one nation to another, when foreign trade is spoken of; and when you provide that that passage shall be free, it is capable at least of being so construed by this council of diplomats to which the President says he is not willing to trust the salvation of the world, but to which he is, as a matter of fact, seeking to entrust perhaps not the salvation but the damnation of the world. Then they will be able to construe that language, to the advantage of the free-trade countries of Europe, with the interest which they have in breaking down those barriers which have protected the United States against the lower wages and lower conditions of life in Great Britain and other European countries, into a provision under which they will deny to the United States the right to establish an American tariff.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The British authorities are kind enough to give out their official definition of what they consider the league did to the Monroe doctrine. Has any such declaration been made as to their understanding of the words "freedom of transit," as far as the Senator knows?

Mr. POINDEXTER. None whatever. There has been a discreet silence upon that subject. The freedom of the seas was taken up by Great Britain and repudiated, but freedom of commerce, or the transit of commerce, has been mysteriously reserved, perhaps, for future discussion after the League of Nations is adopted.

Suppose we are confronted here some fine morning, in case this League of Nations should be ratified, by a decision of the council of the league that in the interest of the rehabilitation of the world the trade barriers that formerly existed between those members as independent nations, before they became members of the federated republic of the world, should be removed. We would say: "There is no such provision as that in the League of Nations, and you have not authority to raise any such question. It is not in the jurisdiction of the League of Nations."

They will turn to article 23 of the league and read the language of it, in which there is a provision that the members agree, and that is all any government is, an agreement. The Constitution of the United States is nothing but an agreement. It is a covenant in which the nations are bound, by every obligation by which governments can bind nations or individuals, that they shall provide for the freedom of the transit of the commerce of their several members. We will say: "There was not anything said about that while we were ratifying the League of Nations."

Mr. Wilson has already intimated that we must be on our guard, that we can read the plain language of the instrument, and that if we did not know what it meant it is our own fault. If it does not mean that, what does it mean?

The Senator from Connecticut has called attention to the fact that nobody has said what it means. I suppose that it means what it says. It means the freedom of transit of commerce. That is what it says. That is the language which is used.

Now, Mr. President, that is only one incident of union between formerly independent nations; and to show that union is the object in view of many of those who are responsible for this movement, which has now found its flower and fruit in the League of Nations covenant, Mr. Carnegie said:

> The amount of blood other than Anglo-Saxon and Germanic which entered into the American is almost too trifling to deserve notice and has been absorbed without changing him in any fundamental trait.

He says further:

> The reunited nation—

That is, the nation of the Anglo-Saxon tongue reunited under the British flag—> would be prompt to repel any assault upon the soil or the rights of any of its parts. * * * Consider its defensive power. A reunion of the Anglo-Americans, consisting to-day of 108,000,000, which 50 years hence will number more than 200,000,000, would be unassailable upon land or sea by any power or combination of powers that it is possible to create. * * * The new nation would dominate the world.

> The action of a congress elected by all these elements would not differ much upon fundamental questions affecting the rights, liberties, and privileges of the people from a congress of Americans sitting in Ottawa or from the action of a British Parliament similarly elected sitting in London. No citizen of any of the present States, either British or American, would have occasion to fear the loss of anything which he now holds dear from reunion.

There is the argument of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. We need not fear any loss of any of our interests so long as the power is in the hands of Canada and the other dominions of Great Britain. That is the very language of Mr. Carnegie.

In a speech which he delivered at Gilfillan Memorial Hall, Dundee, Scotland, September 4, 1890, Mr. Carnegie said:

> There is only one way you can make a step toward the unification and consolidation of the English-speaking race, and that is by bringing this little island into line with the progeny she has established throughout the world. * * * Beyond this stretches the noble dream of the poet, and I believe it is salutary to dwell upon these dreams that should become realities.

That sounds a good deal like President Wilson!

> One step further. After the English-speaking race become united we have "the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

He then says:

> Whatever obstructs reunion, I oppose; whatever promotes reunion, I favor.

Now, to bring the demonstration of the existence of propaganda for bringing about a reunion of the United States and Great Britain down to date, I want to call attention to a magazine which is published in New York City called the English Speaking World. In the issue for December, 1919, there is an article by Mr. William M. Coleman, entitled "Federation of the English-speaking peoples." Mr. Coleman himself sent me this article with a letter, in which he attributed to himself a great deal of credit for his advocacy of a federation of the United States with Great Britain. If the Senate will bear with me a moment, I will call attention to one or two passages from his article. The magazine is published in New York, and I find it is almost exclusively confined to the exploitation of British interests. The advertisements are of British concerns in South Africa and Australia, but Mr. Coleman is an American citizen. He said:

> For a number of years there has been a steadily growing sentiment in Great Britain for a better understanding and closer relations with the American people. In 1898, Joseph Chamberlain, then secretary of state for the colonies, wrote in Scribner's Magazine: "So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, it may be taken as a fact that * * * there is hardly any length to which they (the British nation) would not go in response to American advances, and that they would not shrink even from an alliance contramundum, if the need should ever arise, in defense of the ideals of the Anglo-Saxon race—of humanity, justice, freedom, and equality of opportunity."

I do not know how keen a sense of humor George Washington had, but if he could have heard the statement put forward in a serious article in a magazine as information to the American people who, under his leadership, with a good deal of difficulty and suffering, severed these relations, that Great Britain would be willing to bring about a rapprochement, I should think he would smile. Great Britain, with Lord Cornwallis and Burgoyne and the Indians—I do not want to revive the passions which grew out of the Revolutionary War, but those events are not forgotten; they are matters of history—tried as hard as she could to prevent the separation. Of course she would be willing to bring about a rapprochement.

This letter goes on to say:

> Hon. David Mills, then Canadian minister of justice, wrote in the North American Review: "The interests of the world call for Anglo-Saxon alliance. Let not the British Empire and the United States revive after the lapse of centuries the old contest of Judah and Ephraim; but remembering that their interests are one, as the race is one, let them stand together, to maintain the ascendancy which they will hold as long as Providence fits them to lead."

He proceeds:

> At present the British-American rapprochement is in what may be called the dinner stage. Numerous societies exist, which meet once or twice a year, eat more or less excellent meals, and listen to speeches which are always full of general expressions of mutual sympathy, respect, and regard, and sometimes replete with wit, but rarely contain a specific suggestion of any particular political end. These affairs have a certain value in laying the foundation for closer relations; but their function is purely preliminary. In other words, after the parties have dined, after they have become sufficiently well acquainted to proceed to business, the question necessarily arises as to the form which these closer relations are to take.
> As a matter of fact, the racial tie proved sufficient to bring the Americans to her aid in an emergency without a formal agreement, but there was no way by which it could be known in advance that this would be so.

This shows one object which they have and that is to secure the underwriting—and I am going to call a little further attention to that in connection with the provisions of the League of Nations itself and with the movement which is now on foot under the leadership of very prominent financiers both in Europe and in America—to bring about the underwriting of the war debt of Great Britain and of France by the United States. So this American writer boldly puts forth that proposition when he says:

> As the United States entered the war after the British, the war burden, both in men and resources, has been unequally distributed. Great Britain has been left with a colossal debt which will approximate $40,000,000,000 by the time the war is finally closed, with an interest charge of more than $1,500,000,000 per annum.

* * * * * * *

No form of alliance could be drawn which would help the British carry their debt or eliminate the possibility of rivalry.

So he says there should be a union.

From the British standpoint an alliance would be ineffective. From the American standpoint it would be purposeless.

* * * * * * *

Such a reunion would obviously solve the main problem, i. e., the inequality in the distribution of the war burden, so far as it could be solved, because the war debts of the various English-speaking nations could be consolidated and assumed by the new government, thus distributing the entire burden over the whole of the English-speaking people. British-American rivalry would continue to exist as between individuals, but would be deprived of its international character. The growth of the United States would appear in a favorable and not a threatening aspect, because it would inure to the benefit of the English-speaking people as a whole.

* * * * * * *

The first principle would undoubtedly be that the new government should constitute a federation of the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada, Australia, and South Africa, and that only citizens of those nations would be entitled to full voting citizenship in the new nation.

The second principle would be that the powers of the new federal government should extend only to those subjects which required the united support of the entire English-speaking people. Those subjects, as I view them, are—

That is, the powers that are to be exercised by this proposed union of the United States and Great Britain—

1. National defense, including the power to declare war and control of the armies and navies.
2. Foreign relations, including the treaty-making power and control of the diplomatic and consular services.
3. Commerce with foreign nations and between the various divisions of the reunited nation; and
4. Relations with dependencies, such as India, Egypt, the Philippines—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, along the same line, but somewhat more official than the article by Mr. Coleman, who is a private citizen, is this statement from Mr. Pleasant A. Stovall, United States minister to Switzerland, who recently arrived from abroad. I am quoting from the Washington Star of this city of January 1, 1920. In line with the argument of the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Stovall says:

Many people believe that if England were to have five votes in the League of Nations America would have just that much more strength in the great pact.

That is, that we can depend more confidently upon being protected by Great Britain than we can upon ourselves.

The extent to which the magic influence of the British Empire has extended itself over the minds of those who occupy high positions in the American Government is shown by the remark of the Senator from Nebraska in the Senate the other day, in which he said that he did not agree that India should have a vote in the League of Nations, and he saw no justification for it; but, he said, it had to be, because Great Britain wanted it. The assumption is that if Great Britain demands a thing we must grant it, whether it is right or not.

So it is that it is proposed by Mr. Stovall, American minister to Switzerland, that a great many people, as he says, believe that if Great Britain has five votes in the League of Nations the interest of the United States will be much better protected.

In pursuance of this interpretation of the League of Nations and the internationalism upon which it is based, the British union and all that goes with it, is a statement recently published by a prominent Englishman in the Daily News of London, in which he proposes that the Navy of Great Britain and the Navy of the United States shall be consolidated. Take down the American flag from American ships, unite the two navies, and put them both under control of the League of Nations. It was said:

A strong appeal in favor of pooling the British and United States Navies and consecrating them to the service of the League of Nations as an instrument for banishing war from the seas will be made in the weekly article of Alfred G. Gardiner in the Daily News of to-morrow.

That is dated January 9, 1920.

It is said, Mr. President, by many that the proposal which has been made from so many quarters for the issuing of a new international loan for the financing of the war debts of Europe finds no authority in the covenant of the League of Nations; that nothing of that kind could be done. It would seem very strange that so many distinguished representatives of Great Britain, and I may say so many prominent financiers in the United States, should be advocating the assumption—because that is what it would amount to—of the war debts of Europe by the people of the United States—I say "the people of the United States," because ultimately the people of the United States are the ones who will have to pay the debts of the United States, and the only way in which they can pay them is by paying taxes which are levied upon them by the Government—it would seem strange that so many people were advocating that to be done under the auspices of the League of Nations unless there were something in the language of the League of Nations which authorized and provided for it. So I turned to the covenant of the League of Nations, to which we have adopted so many reservations, to see whether or not there was any provision by which there would be surrendered to that federation of States the power to deal with the finances of its several members so that such a plan as is proposed by the many people whose names I will mention in a moment might be carried out. I find that in the sixteenth article of the covenant of the League of Nations there is such a provision. There may be some other interpretation which those who are more familiar with the diplomatic construction of international instruments than I am can place upon it, but this is the language:

The members of the league agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures.

The language "this article" refers to obligations of the members of the league under articles 12, 13, and 15, which constitute a very large part of the activities and functions of the League of Nations. They agree to "support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article."

We are just about to vote upon the question whether or not we will adopt the league covenant containing that article; but even before it is ratified a great movement has been inaugurated by which, if it is carried out, the people of the United States—many of them advocating the adoption of the League of Nations without knowing that there is any such provision in it or any such movement on foot—will be saddled with the war debts of the world; and we are one of the few solvent nations in the world. I call your attention, Mr. President, to the authority which is back of this movement:

The United States must lend money to Europe for purely selfish reasons if for no other, in the opinion of the committee on foreign trade of the American Economic Association. The loans, however, should be made through private channels and not by the Government directly.

The views of the committee on the whole subject of foreign trade are set forth in a report just made public. The report was prepared after a study of the foreign trade situation by a committee of 10, which included among its membership Thomas W. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan & Co.; David Friday, of the University of Michigan; A. Barton Hepburn, of the Chase National Bank; F. W. Taussig, of the Tariff Commission; and Elisha M. Friedman, of the War Finance Corporation.

A very short time ago an effort was made to get a bill through Congress to pay $57.57 a month to a poor woman with nine children, the husband and father of whom had been killed through the negligence of an officer at the proving grounds while firing artillery. It was objected to because it was too extravagant and expensive and would set a bad precedent; and yet shortly before that a bill appropriating $100,000,000 to relieve widows and children in Europe went through with scarcely any objection at all. That illustrates the curious state of mind which has fallen upon so many of our people, so that they are more willing to devote their resources to pay the debts and to take care of the needs of Europe than they are to look after the interests and the just claims of their own people.

Mr. President, there are hundreds of thousands of American children in the mountains of the South and in the congested districts of the great cities of the East who are in need of assistance, who are deprived of education, who are suffering from undernourishment, who are cold in the winter for the lack of clothing, and yet it would be impossible to secure the enactment of a bill for the appropriation of a dollar by the American Congress for their assistance. So great, however, is the glamor and the influence of the spirit of internationalism which is sweeping over the world, and which has as its backing the powerful influences which I mentioned just now and many others of a similar kind, that when a project is labeled for the benefit of a foreign people, of whatever nationality, immediately the hand of Congress is put into the Treasury of the United States and the taxes which have been wrung from the people are taken for that purpose; taken without authority, in my opinion, for I do not recognize in the Constitution of the United States any authority vested in Congress to take money from the public Treasury and bestow it in benevolences or charities across the ocean.

That fact is recognized so far as our own people are concerned, but we have lost sight of it in the pursuit of this idealistic dream of reforming the world and curing it of all its ills.

A short time ago a prominent financial representative of Great Britain visited this country, and while he was here he made this statement:

Thirty-five billion dollars is needed for restoring and restocking and reconstructing the devastated areas of war-torn Europe.

Thirty-five billion dollars! We have already expended $30,000,000,000 on the war, $20,000,000,000 for our own expenditures or appropriations—nearly all of which has gone in expenditures—and $10,000,000,000 in loans to our allies. Now here comes Sir George Paish, one of the leading financial authorities in Great Britain, and says that they need $35,000,000,000 more. How does he propose to get it? Through the League of Nations, the loan to be underwritten by the United States as a member of that organization.

To prevent a complete "breakdown in credit," Sir George Paish urged as a solution of the problem that all the members of the League of Nations pool their credits and promote an international bond issue.

Of course, if there is an international bond issue and the United States is the only solvent signer of the bonds, it can readily be seen where the money is to come from to pay the obligation, if it is ever paid; and if you want any authority for that under the League of Nations turn to the language of article 16, which I have just read.

To show that this is not merely casual expression or the view of a few individuals who are advocating this policy of the underwriting of the war debt by the United States, I call attention to a statement on February 11 by Mr. J. Austen Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, in which he announced that—

The Government was willing to participate in an international financial conference if invited by one of the neutral nations or by the League of Nations.

* * * * * * *

He recalled the notification of the Government in November of the impossibility of its sharing in measures of relief unless assured of the cooperation of the United States.

* * * * * * *

He declared that the attitude of the American Government was a matter of first importance, as it seemed doubtful whether America's participation could be attained, and this must gravely affect the influence and utility of such a conference.

Sir Leo Chiozzo Money, financial expert and former undersecretary in the British cabinet, says:

One nation holds the key to the institution, and has the power to redress the economic disabilities of Europe. America came late into the war, and fortunately saw its termination before she had been called upon to make any considerable sacrifice. This is not uttered by way of reproach. The spending of our substance to sustain our allies, like the proceeds of the sale of our dollar securities, went to America to enrich her before she came into the war, and the economic upshot of the whole matter is that to-day America is in the position of a rich nation which has invested $10,000,000,000 in Europe—the impoverished and bleeding Europe which, so far from being able to pay interest on the $10,000,000,000, is, as the above figures show, not even able to pay for its current subsistence.

It was a great American who first suggested that as it had not been the privilege of America to sacrifice much in human life, the least she could do was to cancel the European indebtedness as a contribution to justice.

So, Mr. President, other financiers of Europe are combining in the great movement through the League of Nations to saddle their war debt upon the United States.

There are only one or two more references to which I desire to call attention. In an article from Berlin published in December, 1917, it is stated:

There is a widespread belief among financiers, bankers, and financial writers in Germany that if two of Erzberger's plans are put into effect Germany will face a future overcast with black clouds, if not actual ruin.

* * * * * * *

They wish a comparatively small direct credit and disapprove of the much-discussed international loan, which, they believe, would saddle the debts of England and France on the United States and thereby, perhaps, reduce the amount of credit Germany might obtain.

There, Mr. President, is a recognition on the part of a German statesman of a fact to which our own Government seems to be completely blind, namely, the danger of having the war debts saddled upon the United States as the only solvent guarantor.

Maximilian Harden, another prominent German writer and thinker, who is thoroughly informed of the European situation, calls attention to an article that was published in our CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He says:

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, folio 53, No. 223, of September 7, 1916, contains two articles written by me in April of that year, placed there by authority of the United States Senate.

* * * * * * *

In one of those articles ("If I were Wilson") I made the proposition to convert all the loan bonds of the States of Europe engaged in war into international currency, to be guaranteed by all the debtors and to be accepted in all the countries belonging to the League of Nations by every creditor, at every cashier's window at their face value.

I also proposed that international currency was to be kept in circulation until such a time when nations, decimated by the war, should have recuperated sufficiently to redeem their bonds by issuing metal or paper in their place, or by paying for them in goods.

Mr. Max Warburg, another German financial authority, in a recent article, "An international loan to be guaranteed by all nations," is quoted as follows:

Mr. Warburg points to the necessity of establishing German credit, in a report he has made to the congress of the council for alleviating hunger.

He states that the World War can be healed in a financial respect only by the whole world. * * *

The League of Nations—

This is his disinterested and detached view. He is not obsessed, as some of our people are, by the contest in which they have been engaged to establish the League of Nations. He says that—

The League of Nations could promote this plan "if it were a real league," but it would have to be altered so that all countries should be included.

By that he means Germany.

Since time is precious, he said, there should be created an international loan whereby debts which have been made and debts which are likely to be incurred can be regulated.

So, Mr. President, I might cite numerous other authorities, which I refrain from doing, to indicate that without a doubt, should the covenant of the League of Nations be ratified, as soon as the council are assembled there will immediately be presented to their consideration the question of the refinancing of Europe, which, upon the authority of British, French, and German financiers, can not be done except with the assistance of the United States, acting with the other members of the League of Nations through that organization; and what could the United States do about it if the proposition came up?

It might be said that no such scheme could be adopted except with the consent of the representative of the United States. Who will that representative be, and what will his views be upon this matter, and what control will the American people have over his action? The theory in the formation of the American Government was that such were the imperfections of men, when power was vested in their hands, that the departments of the Government were divided and the powers kept within the hands of the people.

So it is that the mere provision that the adoption of such an international loan by the consolidated government of the league should not take place without the consent of the representative of the United States might prove to be altogether impotent as a protection to the American people. And who can say that the power of the league over the United States, once our international relations are merged within it, could not find means to secure the assent of the American Government? If one of the internationalists who has been responsible for the formation of the covenant of the League of Nations, and who believes in the supreme sacrifice that it has been said the American people should make, happened to be their representative upon this council, who can say he would not agree to the urgent request of the so-called impoverished countries of Europe that the United States should assume the obligation they incurred and saddle it upon the people of the United States forever?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I shall occupy but a very short time.

I think it opportune, in view of what the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has said with regard to the relations between Great Britain and Canada, to call attention to some authorities that I have upon that point. I refer to The Cambridge Modern History and to the article entitled "European Colonies," by E. A. Benians, M. A., fellow of St. John's College. At page 605 he says as follows:

The Anglo-French Conservative Party, which came into power in 1867 under the leadership of Sir John Macdonald and carried out the work of confederation, governed from 1867 to 1873, and again from 1878 to 1896. Its long tenure of office during a formative period gave it a controlling influence over the future destiny of Canada. It stood for a strong national government, protection for the encouragement of industry, energetic railway construction to promote the unity and settlement of the country, the strengthening of the imperial connexion, and close commercial relations with the mother country rather than with the United States. These principles, accepted with some qualifications and some accentuation by the Liberal Party when it came into power in 1896, may be regarded as the guiding lines of Canadian policy.

I would underscore what is said about "the strengthening of the imperial connection and close commercial relations with the mother country rather than with the United States."

That, I think, was written about 1910. I have here an article written for the New York Times in 1915, and now found in the New York Times Current History of the European War. I beg in this connection to read just two or three short excerpts from that article. It is by Edward W. Thomson, F. R. S. L., F. R. S. C. He says:

But indeed Canadians were never vassals. They have ever been Britons, whatever their individual origins, retaining the liberties of their political birthright. While in a certain tutelage to their own monarch's immediate ministries, they have continually, slowly, consciously expanded their freedom from such tutelage, substituting for it self-government or rule by their own representatives—

Now, I would have Senators note this—without forsaking but rather enhancing their allegiance to the common Crown. This has long been the symbol of their self-government, even as it is to old-country kinsmen the symbol of rule by themselves.

The writer quotes from an article by Sir Richard Jebb, whom he terms "a deep student of the empire problem," and I read from what he quotes, as follows:

That the war will in any event change the external relations is evident. But why, if we win, should it change the political relations between the parts, except to the extent of encouraging us to conserve and develop the existing system which has given so signal an example of effective imperial unity in time of need? Continually talking of imperial unity, we fail to recognize it when we have got it. There is never going to be a moment when one might say, "Yesterday we were not united; to-day the grand act—of imperial federation understood—has been signed; henceforth we are united."

Mr. President, of course none of this is to the reproach of Great Britain or the colonial policies of her statesmen; but I have been interested in the deep solicitude felt by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and others on that side of this Chamber in regard to the independence of Canada, as though Canada's place in the British Empire were compelled. Mr. President, as I read history, and as I study the relations between Great Britain and her colonies, it is absolutely voluntary, and they are proud of the great Empire of which they form a conspicuous part.

I remember a little incident which happened in Canada before we entered the war. It was while they were recruiting men. A regiment had been recruited and was marching to take ship for the front. The spectators were looking on as the regiment marched by, and among the spectators was a woman whose husband was among the recruits. She already had two sons in France; and as the soldiers went marching by husband and wife recognized each other, and she turned to her friends and said, "Thank God, I am a Canadian!"

That, I think, illustrates the spirit of the people not only in Canada but in every other great British colony as well.

How was it but a few years ago, Mr. President, when South Africa was arrayed against Great Britain in the Boer War? And yet what leader in South Africa at that time who survives to-day did not loyally stand by and for the cause of Great Britain in the late terrible war? The same feeling, I think, exists in Australia and in New Zealand as in the colonies, or rather self-governing dominions, I have named.

So, Mr. President, there need be no question in regard to the loyalty of the various colonies and self-governing dominions of Great Britain to the mother country when it comes to the votes allowed them in the assembly of the League of Nations. What Great Britain desires will, because of this spirit of loyalty and unity, be their desire, and their votes in any controversy will be cast on the same side with that of Great Britain.

Mr. CURTIS. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, March 11, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 10, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our heavenly Father, incline Thine ear and hear our prayer. Help us to guide our frail barks along the turbid and stormy sea of life, and finally, when we have finished the work Thou hast given us to do, bring us to a safe harbor where we shall dwell in peace and tranquillity forever. In Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 167, filling a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 167) providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress that will occur on March 19, 1920, by reason of the expiration of the term of Charles F. Choate, jr., of Massachusetts, be filled by the reappointment of the said Charles F. Choate, jr., for the ensuing term.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the passage of the resolution, but I think these resolutions ought to go to the Committee on the Library. I do not remember whether the Board of Regents meets this month or not. Can the gentleman from Massachusetts inform us?

Mr. LUCE. I can not. This is a reappointment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand, and the reappointment ought to be made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a member of the Library Committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the reason that the Committee on the Library ought to have acted on the resolution.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, has this gone to the Library Committee?

Mr. LUCE. It has not; the chairman of the Library Committee is out of town. Delay might ensue, and unless there is some good reason for delay I think it should be considered at the present time.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I think in the interest of orderly procedure this should go to the Committee on the Library unless there is some urgent reason for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio objects.

MILITARY MOTOR TRUCKS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 491.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to transmit to the House of Representatives forthwith the following information, namely:

Whether the War Department during the present fiscal year purchased, contracted for, or agreed to purchase motor trucks or tractors of the type or make known as "Millitor," and separate parts for same; and if so, the number of such trucks or tractors, the stipulated price per truck or tractor, and for separate parts for same, the purpose for which they were or are to be used, the appropriation from which payment for same was or is to be made, the authority of law under which the department purchased or agreed to purchase them, and whether any such trucks or tractors so procured are now available, whether the United States Government now owns any such trucks or tractors other than procured by the above purchase, and how many; also the number of trucks and tractors used or made for handling ordnance which were sold by the War Department or its agencies abroad, and the number sold or distributed in the United States, and the number on hand; also set out the carrying capacity of such trucks or tractors so sold, distributed, or on hand; if said purchase or any part of same was ever disapproved by any branch of the War Department, set out the facts in connection therewith.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the rule adopted for the consideration of the reorganization Army bill were not all other matters except that bill displaced?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is simply a resolution of inquiry calling for certain information from the War Department for the convenience of the House. I move the previous question.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand that this comes from the Committee on Military Affairs with its unanimous approval?

Mr. KAHN. It does.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have made up my mind that we ought to have a sufficient number of Members here to pass on the bill, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum, and evidently no quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doorkeepers closed the doors, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Ackerman	Burke	Classon	Davis, Tenn.
Baer	Burroughs	Cooper	Donovan
Bell	Butler	Copley	Dooling

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and thirteen Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. Under the authority which the House kindly granted the Speaker yesterday, he names the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH, to act as Speaker pro tempore for the week or 10 days that he expects to be absent. [Applause.]

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June, 1916.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, general debate has concluded, and I ask that the Clerk begin the reading of the bill for amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, is the bill to be considered by sections or paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be considered by sections. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, be amended as follows: That section 2 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 2. Composition of the Regular Army.—The Regular Army of the United States shall consist of the Infantry, the Cavalry, the Field Artillery, the Coast Artillery Corps, the Air Service, the Corps of Engineers, the Signal Corps, and the brigade, division, Army Corps, and Army Headquarters, which shall be designated as the combatant arms or the line of the Army; the General Staff Corps; the Adjutant General's Department; the Inspector General's Department; the Judge Advocate General's Department; the Quartermaster Corps; the Finance Department; the Medical Department; the Ordnance Department; the Chemical Warfare Service; the officers of the Bureau of Insular Affairs; the officers and enlisted men under the jurisdiction of the Militia Bureau; the chaplains; the band leaders; the professors and cadets of the United States Military Academy; detached officers; detached enlisted men; unassigned recruits; the Indian Scouts; the officers and enlisted men of the retired list; and such other officers and enlisted men as are now or may hereafter be provided for. Except in time of war or similar emergency when the public safety demands it, the number of enlisted men of the combatant arms of the Regular Army shall at no time exceed 250,000; of the Philippine Scouts, 12,000; of the unassigned recruits, 7,000; and the total enlisted strength of the Regular Army, including the combatant and the noncombatant arms, but excluding the Philippine Scouts and the unassigned recruits, shall not exceed 280,000."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to make a statement about this section. I think we can save considerable time if we would pass over this section until the bill is concluded, because it provides for the various units of the Army. The Committee of the Whole House may, as each section is reached, referring to a particular branch of the Army, make some amendments, and after all of the paragraphs are read and passed upon by the committee it would be an easy matter to go back to this section and correct it in conformity with the action of the committee. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over until we have concluded the other sections of the bill, to be reverted to later to make such amendment as the action of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union may dictate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the section of the bill just read be passed over until the remainder of the bill is concluded, to be reverted to for amendment later. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it seems to me that that would not be the wise course to pursue. This is the first section of the bill and relates to the composition of the Army. I think it ought to be settled before we proceed with the balance of the bill. This is the fundamental principle upon which the legislation is based. Unless we settle this first section of the bill we will be proceeding in the dark by undertaking to amend it here and there. As I said, this first section of the bill relates to the composition of the Army. My first and fundamental objection to the bill lies in this section, because it is in this section that Congress surrenders to the War Department the right to fix the size of the different organizations of the Army. We have got to settle that question, and it seems to me that we might as well settle it now; and after that is settled there ought to be smooth sailing in the consideration of the remaining portions of the bill. I do not want to delay the consideration of the bill, and I am willing to agree to any program that will expedite its passage; but it seems to me that we might as well settle this question to-day, and then the balance of the bill will be easy.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. DENT. I shall not object for the moment, if the gentleman desires to make a statement. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman has not forestalled the right by objecting, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of making a suggestion. This is the situation, as I view it: While I share in the general estimate of the importance of this section, as indicated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], I think his logic inverts the situation as it actually is.

This is the fact: Like all statutes setting up an organization, the first section really is the puckering string that ties in the final knot all of the things subsequently treated of in detail. It is the first direct statement that the Army shall consist of this, that, and the other thing. Then the bill goes on in the following sections to indicate what those things are or shall be, the character and extent of those things. It is obvious that until we have had the detail of those things presented to us, as they will be in the subsequent sections of the bill, we can not know whether we want them written into the first section or not.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In a moment. Having decided as we read along through the bill that we may or may not want these different things indicated in the first section, and having decided it at the only time when the details of the proposition are before us, we may then easily return to the first section and button up our work by striking out or inserting in the first section what we have concluded to embody therein.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably, if we change some of the details of the bill, we will have to return to this section.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. DENT. And rewrite it. That is unquestionably true. The objection that I am making goes to the fundamental principle. This section contains the proposition, to which I am unalterably opposed, by which Congress surrenders the right to fix the size of the different organizations and units of the Army. I think that question ought to be settled now, because that will settle the general principles in the balance of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Let me suggest this to the gentleman, that in determining as to the character and detail, the size and the composition of any one of these items set up in the first section, as we will do when we come to the different paragraphs that specifically set them up, we will not have waived our right finally when we return to the first section to determine whether this objection the gentleman has proposed shall be sustained or not. He will lose no rights by waiting until we find out, and we may determine then, having seen from the inside, whether we want a particular thing in the bill or not. Then, having determined that, it is an easy matter to say whether the proposition the gentleman advances shall remain in the first section or not. We would have the first and only opportunity to get a proper perspective of the thing and know what the first section actually means.

Mr. DENT. Well, if the gentleman will yield, I think when the gentleman hears the substitute that I propose to offer to this section he will find that issue is raised and presented to the House.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But I do not see how a man can determine whether he wants such a thing as an air service in that section of the bill until he has gone a little further over in the bill and finds out what the air service is, and then finds out what relations it bears to the rest of the Army service, and how it is composed in the section that creates it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I wanted to offer a perfecting amendment before the substitute was considered. I have no objection to the substitute being read first, but I have a perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment will be a preferential amendment. The Clerk will read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENT: Page 1, line 5, strike out all of section 1, after line 5, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That section 2 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the entire section and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"'SEC. 2. Composition of the Regular Army.—The Regular Army of the United States shall consist of 54 regiments of Infantry; 18 Infantry brigade machine-gun battalions; 11 Infantry division machine-gun battalions; 2 Infantry tank brigades; 17 regiments of Cavalry; 4 Cavalry machine-gun squadrons; 36 regiments of Field Artillery; a Coast Artillery Corps; the brigade, division, Army corps, and Army headquarters with their detachments and troops; a General Staff Corps; an Adjutant General's Department; a Judge Advocate General's Department; a Quartermaster Corps; a Medical Department; a Corps of Engineers; an Ordnance Department; a Signal Corps; an Air Service; a Chemical Warfare Service; the officers of the Bureau of Insular Affairs; the Militia Bureau; the detached officers; the detached noncommissioned officers; the chaplains; the Regular Army Reserve; all organized as hereinafter provided, and the following as now authorized by law: The officers and enlisted men on the retired list; the additional officers; the professors, the corps of cadets, the General Army Service detachment; and detachments of Cavalry, Field Artillery, and Engineers, and the band of the United States Military Academy; the post noncommissioned staff officers; the recruiting parties, the recruit depot detachments, and unassigned recruits; the service-school detachments; the disciplinary guards; the disciplinary organizations; the Indian Scouts; and such other officers and enlisted men as are now or may be hereafter provided for: Provided, That hereafter the enlisted personnel of all organizations of the Regular Army shall at all times be maintained at a strength not below the minimum strength fixed by law: Provided further, That the total enlisted force of the line of the Regular Army, excluding the Philippine Scouts and the enlisted men of the Quartermaster Corps, of the Medical Department, and of the Signal Corps, and the unassigned recruits, shall not at any one time, except in the event of actual or threatened war or similar emergency in which the public safety demand it, exceed 185,000 men: Provided further, That the unassigned recruits at depots or elsewhere shall at no time, except in time of war, exceed by more than 7 per cent the total authorized enlisted strength.'"

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I have an amendment which will come properly to be considered only on page 16, because it involves the striking out of some matter and adds new matter. The purpose of my amendment is to provide for a separate construction corps, and I desire therefore to ask unanimous consent to pass over, so far as the amendment is concerned, the subject at this time with the privilege of reverting to page 2 and adding a construction corps if the committee desires to do so. I therefore ask unanimous consent, whether the substitute is adopted or not, to go back to page 2 in the event the committee desires to add a provision for a separate construction corps.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think that is necessary. When that section is reached the gentleman can offer his amendment at that time, and I have already stated whatever changes shall hereafter be made in the constitution of the bill that I will not object, and will ask myself that we return to this section so as to make it conform to different amendments.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not stated the unanimous-consent request. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. DENT. I will yield for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that permission be given to return to this paragraph after the consideration of section 8 on page 16——

Mr. SANFORD. And 17, in the event a separate construction corps is adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. For the purpose of offering an amendment in accordance with the statement of the gentleman from New York. Is there objection?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to couple with that request a similar request to return to page 2——

Mr. GARD. I object to both for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HARRELD. For information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. HARRELD. I want some information; that is all I want.

Mr. DENT. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARRELD. Will I have an opportunity to offer an amendment after this amendment is disposed of to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer perfecting amendments to this section before this amendment will be voted upon.

Mr. HARRELD. I want to offer an amendment at this time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for that purpose. I trust this is not to be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes on his amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this substitute which I have offered to this bill is a reproduction of the national defense act with the addition of a chemical warfare service and a separate air service. It changes the national defense act by reducing the number of regiments of Infantry from 65 to 54. It reduces the number of regiments of Cavalry in the national-defense act from 25 to 17. It increases the number of regiments of Field Artillery from 21 in the national defense act to 36. It reorganizes or authorizes the reorganization of the Infantry with machine-gun battalions. It provides, in other words, for 54 regiments of Infantry, 18 Infantry brigades of machine-gun battalions, 11 Infantry divisions of machine-gun battalions, and 2 Infantry tank brigades. That is all the change that is made from the national defense act. I think it is generally conceded by all Army officers that the machine gun played an important part in the war, and I think its organization ought to be recognized by law. Under my amendment to this provision of the bill the size of the Army is increased only by 10,000 over the national defense act, so as to take care of the chemical warfare, the air service, the machine-gun battalions, and the tank corps, so that instead of having an Army of 175,000, as is provided in the national defense act, under this section it increases the strength of the Army to 185,000. Now, if you adopt this amendment, then you will preserve the national defense act with the recognition of the machine-gun organization, the tank corps organization, the chemical warfare service, and a separate air service. That is the only change that this substitute makes to the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Under the gentleman's proposed amendment he fixes upon 54 Infantry regiments?

Mr. DENT. I do.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Now, the standard of Infantry regiments is 15 companies of 250 men each. And, making a rough calculation, it seems to me your 54 regiments with 15 companies of 250 men each——

Mr. DENT. How many?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Fifteen companies of 250 men each.

Mr. DENT. No company has that number in peace times.

Mr. GRIFFIN. You increase your Infantry to about 200,000 men.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is speaking of war strength; but the size of an Infantry company in peace time, under the national defense act, is 100 men, and not 250 men. The strength of an Infantry company was raised during the war to 250 men, but that is war strength. The national defense act provides a company may be increased by 50 per cent in time of war or any emergency.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May I not ask if elsewhere in the bill it is provided that the strength of regiments of the various units may be fixed by the General Staff?

Mr. DENT. That is elsewhere in the bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. So that the General Staff would have the right under your amendment to fix the strength of the company at 250 men, and therefore, instead of——

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is very much mistaken about that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I hope I am.

Mr. DENT. I know the gentleman is mistaken about it, because, as I stated to the gentleman a little while ago, if he would read the national defense act——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, may I propound a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. DENT. I can not yield until I answer the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. BEE. I wanted to ask more time for the gentleman from Alabama. He is not going to have sufficient time.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will read the national-defense act, he will find that the Infantry company is composed of 100 men in time of peace. I propose to preserve that strength of organization by this substitute.

Mr. GRIFFIN. May I ask the gentleman if he does not intend by this act to change the national-defense act? You are creating a new act and giving certain powers to the General Staff.

Mr. DENT. I did not know where the gentleman was when I made the statement that this substitute of mine simply provided for machine-gun organization, a tank corps, a chemical warfare service, and a separate air service, and increased the enlisted strength of the Army from 175,000 to 185,000 men. That is all. That is the only difference between the national-defense act and my substitute.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARTER. Does not your amendment cover the very thing suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] when it provides that the entire strength of the Army shall not exceed 185,000?

Mr. DENT. Congress retains the right it has always exercised in every Army bill in the entire history of the country of fixing the strength of the different organizations of the Army in my substitute.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Right in line with the gentleman's last remark, there was a time in which Congress, ever since the beginning of the history of the country, bought and paid for and turned over to the Army smooth-bore cannon, and probably they resisted the introduction of a rifled cannon because we never had any before, but they learned a few lessons in the war.

Mr. DENT. I hope my colleague from Vermont will use his own time in order to make a speech.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I wanted to use a little bit of yours in order to ask if you think by the proposed amendment of yours you will put on paper all the lessons that have been learned from the last war in regard to the constitutional composition of the Regular Army—I mean so far as law is concerned?

Mr. DENT. As far as we ought to go in the law, it does.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You think the difference before the war—that in the provisions in your amendment the world's lesson is only represented by the changes you have made there so far as those things are concerned?

Mr. DENT. I think it represents the fundamental lessons learned from the war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. One of the first things we did when we went into the war was to change the national defense act so that there was absolutely no former statutory organization whatever.

Mr. DENT. I think one of the greatest mistakes in the way of legislation Congress made during the war was the passage of the Overman Act, by which Executive authority was given to absolutely organize all the bureaus in the different departments of the Government so that Congress can never put its finger on a responsible head. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How much would your amendment, if adopted, reduce the aggregate cost of the bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio that I had intended to put in the RECORD this morning the cost of the Army under this proposed bill, but I did not have time last night to do that. I have the figures, and hope to put them in the RECORD to-morrow morning.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Can you give us the approximate, intelligent estimate of the average cost to the Government per soldier in maintaining an Army in peace times—the total cost of everything?

Mr. DENT. My recollection is it is a little less than $1,400 per man—$1,382 is my recollection of the figures; and an officer costs on an average, $3,600.

Mr. OLNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. OLNEY. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama if his proposed amendment does not reduce the temporary officers' strength of the Army from 18,000 to about 15,000?

Mr. DENT. To a little over 14,000.

Mr. OLNEY. Did not this war demonstrate more than anything else, if we learned any lessons from the war, that we needed all the officers we could possibly have?

Mr. DENT. Unquestionably the war demonstrated we needed all the officers we ought to have. That is a very plain proposition. But what are you going to do with 18,000 officers when you can get along with 14,000 officers? If 14,000 officers will take care of 185,000 men, why will you want 18,000 officers? Will somebody please explain that to me? I am willing to give as many officers as necessary to take care of the Army, and for all training purposes in schools, and colleges, and in the National Guard, but I am not willing to have 4,000 extra officers around when they have nothing to do.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. BEE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, is it not possible that we can reach some time agreement upon this section? The gentleman from Alabama, the author of the amendment, has had no chance at all to explain his amendment or his substitute. Other gentlemen are anxious to speak on the question. The members of the committee will use most of the time. Is it not possible to reach an agreement as to the amount of time to be consumed on this section?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], that he may have five minutes additional?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. I would like to know if, under the gentleman's substitute, there will be sufficient officers to train young men in the colleges and universities and in training camps under this program?

Mr. DENT. I think undoubtedly there will be. It was certainly my intention in drafting this amendment and the subsequent amendments that I propose to offer in the event this should be adopted to take care of that situation. This bill as proposed by the committee has a detached officers' list of something like 2,000. Under my bill the detached list is 1,400. I think—and I have the advice of some of the best and ablest officers of the Army—that 1,400 detached officers will be sufficient for all purposes. We had only a thousand under the national-defense act, and we have been training under the Reserve Officers' Corps section of that act 100,000 young men annually. I think 400 more will be absolutely sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Is there anything in the gentleman's amendment for the creation of an air service corps? And if so, how many men does it provide for?

Mr. DENT. This particular amendment does not provide for the details of the organization. It simply names it, and a subsequent amendment will take care of the details.

Mr. HICKS. It provides for a separate air service?

Mr. DENT. Yes; it provides for a separate air service; and I have another amendment carrying out the details, which I will offer when we reach that section of the bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will ask the gentleman if his amendment provides for a separate transportation corps and finance section?

Mr. DENT. It does not provide for a separate transportation corps and finance section.

Mr. CALDWELL. Nor for a separate construction corps?

Mr. DENT. Nor for a separate construction corps.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. What is the reduction in the number of men in this bill as compared with the original bill, and the reduction in the number of officers?

Mr. DENT. I increase the number of men in this amendment by 10,000 over the national-defense act. The bill proposed by the committee adds 75,000 enlisted men to the list of the Army and some additional enlisted men in the staff corps, running the strength of the Army up to about 300,000.

Mr. PARRISH. Your amendment would put the total strength of the Army at about 186,000?

Mr. DENT. It puts it at about 185,000—the staff and line.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. Before the war the total strength of the Army was 175,000, was it not?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WELTY. Was that quota ever filled?

Mr. DENT. It never was.

Mr. WELTY. How many soldiers did we have before the war under the national defense act?

Mr. DENT. The largest Army we ever had was when we declared war. I gave those figures yesterday in the remarks I made on this bill. My recollection is that in round numbers the total strength of the Army when we declared war in April, 1917, was practically 127,000 officers and men; about 120,000 men and a little less than 7,000 officers.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. Does your substitute provide for the use or detailing of the members of the Reserve Officers' Corps to be used in training in the States or with the National Guard?

Mr. DENT. No. That would not come properly under this section. That would come under later sections of the bill.

Mr. HARRELD. I understand.

Mr. DENT. This section simply relates to the composition of the Army. The real issue between the committee report and my amendment is this: Congress retains under my bill its control in fixing the size of the units in the organization of the Army while Congress surrenders it under the proposed bill. That is the difference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have a substitute on which I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I rise for the purpose of asking the committee to fix the time for this debate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman mean on this paragraph?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. The debate has been proceeding here in the greatest confusion and nobody can tell head or tail about it. If you fix the time, people could get their heads clear.

Mr. ANTHONY. How much time does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know. I simply submit it to the gentlemen interested on the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Let it go ahead. If any time is fixed, I want to say there will not be anybody here to listen to the debate. If you are going on without the time being fixed, everybody will be anxious about what is going on and you will get a vote. All you have to do, however, to empty the House will be to fix the time and then the membership will vanish away and will come back here at the end of the time without knowing what to vote on. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this substitute to the amendment, and after a while I propose to offer some amendment to this section before this substitute is voted upon.

I have listened to the argument made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] in the committee for many days upon the question. I am just as proud of the national-defense act as he is, or as any other man is who has had to do with the drawing of it, because to my mind the Hay bill is one of the greatest pieces of military legislation ever put on the statute books by any nation in time of peace. But we would not be Americans if we did not learn by experience. The reason why our country is great and the reason why we succeed in our undertakings is because the wise people of America are willing to forego any feeling or sentiment of pride that they might have in any creature of their organization or in any creature of their Government in order that they may develop and improve the institution that we call the American Government.

Now, we have had a war, and men say that the Overman Act was the one great thing that caused waste and caused duplication of service. That is true; but without it you never would have won the war, because it would have been impossible for the executive branches of the Government to function and to create the organizations that were necessary to carry on the Great War. One of the things that it was necessary for us to create at that time and create quickly without waiting for legislation was a transportation service. The substitute carries no provision for a transportation service. It turns the whole thing back to the Quartermaster Corps, where it was before the war, when we did not know what conditions would arise when great countries came into a great conflict such as we have had.

Now, what are you going to do about it? Suppose you have a war to-morrow or next week or next year with our neighbor on the south. The organizations that you used against another enemy would not be the organizations you would use against Mexico. Are you going to wait until we actually get into a war and then pass legislation, or are you going to have a flexible arrangement by which the executive branch of the Government can reorganize certain branches of the Army and get it into shape so that when the great crisis does come and they have to meet it they will have something to meet it with? The executive branch of the Government is warned in advance, through its diplomatic channels, of the conditions that surround the country and will realize those conditions sooner than some other branches of the Government. Are you going to hamstring the President? Are you going to hogtie the Army of the United States and say to it, "You must fight our battles, but you will have to fight them with the club we put in your hands and not with the machine guns that you might be able to buy"?

This is a question of progress. Are you going to turn the clock back and refuse to benefit by the experiences of this war? Have you found one man in the Army of the United States, high or low, who says that the Hay bill was sufficient for a war? Have you found one man who says that this war has not demonstrated that you must have flexibility in the organization of your Army? It is the opinion of the General Staff, it is the opinion of the Secretary of War, it is the opinion of all men who went overseas with whim I have talked, and it is the opinion of Gen. Pershing, who organized these units, who made them large or made them small as the conditions required it, that we should have flexibility. He won the war, and now you are here asked to pass a new bill reorganizing the Army in the light of the experience of these men who fought for you. Are you going to say to them, "Your experience does not count, and we people who sit here in the Congress of the United States know more about the organization of the Army than men who have spent their lives in the study of this thing, and the men who went across the sea and fought under the conditions that they found there, and who now recommend a different thing"? Are you going to say that you know more about it than they do? Or are you going to take the benefit of their experience and turn down this substitute? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] is recognized.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order. I desire to have the time fixed upon this amendment, or I shall insist upon the point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word, and is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. McKENZIE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. As I understand the situation, the only gentleman who has spoken on this amendment is the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. I do not recall that anybody has spoken in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] spoke in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. DYER. What became of my point of order that I made?

The CHAIRMAN. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. DYER. My point of order is that the amendment has been discussed under the rule, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] speaking in favor of it and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] against it, and that we are now entitled to a vote upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has moved an additional amendment and is recognized. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Illinois will proceed.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, much as I dislike to differ from my genial friend and colleague [Mr. DENT], I am compelled to do so. I feel, gentlemen of the committee, that this is one of the important propositions involved in the legislation now before the House. It is a question of fundamental policy. It is a question whether the Members of Congress sitting here as we do in a legislative capacity shall undertake to frame by legislation the various tactical units of the fighting branches, particularly of our Army. It is true that has been done in the past. It is true that heretofore men without any knowledge of military affairs, men without any conception of tactical units, have in their wisdom determined what those units should be in the Military Establishment of our country.

I am one of those who helped to frame the national defense act and had to stand on this floor and defend it against the criticisms and slurs of men who opposed it, but I am ready now, with the other provisions contained in this legislation, to take a step forward, in my judgment, in the matter of our Military Establishment. I believe that it is the duty and the function of the representatives of the people in Congress assembled to fix the size of the Army. I have always differed with those critics who have undertaken to tell us that we should fix the size of the Army in this country according to the testimony of military experts. In my judgment that is a civilian function, and one that we ought to exercise; but, after having once fixed the size of the Army, after having fixed the number of commissioned officers in the Army, we ought to have at least sufficient confidence in the ability and patriotism of the officers of the Army to allow them to prepare and prescribe the various tactical units of our Military Establishment. That is what is involved in this fight.

Heretofore there was a reason why Congress should fix the size of the Artillery, the Infantry, and the Cavalry, and the other branches, and that was because of the vicious system of promotion by branches in the service. We propose in this bill to put all the officers of the Army on a single promotion list, and it is absolutely immaterial whether or not this is in the Cavalry or Artillery or any other branch of the service, an officer will be protected in his rights on that single list of promotions. Heretofore if you increased the Artillery, you destroyed the position of the man over in the Cavalry and injured his chances of promotion. If you increased the Cavalry, as we did a few years ago, you did an injustice to the infantryman and the artilleryman; but under this system of the single list further along in this bill adopted, turning over to the Military Establishment the power to fix the tactical units of our Army, I think it will be the longest step forward in military legislation that has ever been taken in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask my friend from Illinois if I understand him correctly. He has stated that an officer in the United States Army, if we adopt this bill, will be an officer of all the branches of the military service.

Mr. McKENZIE. Oh, no; he will be commissioned in the Cavalry or the Infantry or in the Artillery or the particular branch of service he desires to enter, but when once in there and on the lineal list he will move up along with all the other officers.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman stated that the increase or decrease in any particular branch would not affect the promotion of the officer.

Mr. McKENZIE. If we adopt this bill.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. To the section?

Mr. KAHN. No; to the amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 30 minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama. Is there objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Reserving the right to object, that does not apply to any amendment to the section, only to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. KAHN. It applies only to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. CALDWELL. If we want to offer an amendment to the construction corps——

Mr. KAHN. That will be all right.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the first section, as I understand, is a summary of what is in this bill.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. A number of us have substantive amendments changing either the organization or adding new organizations, and that will not come up until the latter part of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman will have a right to offer those amendments even if the request I have made is granted.

Mr. REAVIS. There is no question about that; but if the bill is amended later by the addition of another organization, somebody must recognize the right to come back to the first section and put it into the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Reserving the right to object, I want to ascertain from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs whether or not he has made any arrangement for disposition of the time?

Mr. KAHN. I have not; but I suggest that the gentleman get five minutes by communicating with the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is, Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five mintues to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it strikes me that, after all, this is simply a business proposition, and one that does not really involve any anxiety about the exercise of the constitutional power of Congress to control the Army or to control the use of the Army, or to control the money that is employed in the maintenance of the Army. We all realize that, after all, the Army can do nothing unless it is supported by the power of the purse. We know that our ancestors won for us long ago the control of the power of the purse, regulating the executive and the Army, in the Commons. We have it yet. That is a bogey that is sometimes raised here. If we know how much the Army costs, if we provide for certain numbers of officers at certain amounts of pay for certain military grades, and no more, it does not matter to you or me whether that is expended for the Cavalry, Infantry, machine-gun battalions, the net total will be what we prescribe. The movements around the chess board of duty of this or that particular officer do not change the balance at the foot of each column, because that is prescribed by statute—what each officer and man shall have, and they can get no more. We prescribe the limit of the number of men and officers in the Army, and there can be no more.

Now, having specified this, you have this control of the purse as men responsible to the taxpayer and people. What do you know, what do I know, about the arrangement of soldiers in a tactical organization so they will be a fighting army, which we are trying to raise to support with our money? [Applause.] What do we know about it? The true purpose is to educate officers through a lifetime of service to be able to regulate the details of their own trade, and why should we worry about it when we have fixed the control and have the power of the purse?

Let me say in regard to this amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, by which he proposes to establish by statute the unit of organization in the Army of the United States, that today the whole staff system, as far as the details of bureaus are concerned, is not regulated by statute and never has been. He seeks now to regulate by statute the combatant Army which, under a strategical situation, must be changed according to war problems only to be met on the battle field. For years and years we have given millions of money to the staff departments and never insisted on a distribution of the functions of that department strictly by statute.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] knows that right in opposition to the very theory he is presenting to you now we do not specify—and never have, even in his ideal national defense act—how the organization of the Coast Artillery Corps shall be set up. We have simply done by the Coast Artillery Corps for years what we propose to do now for the whole Army.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. When I have finished the statement. We all know that we put an outside limit upon the number of men in the Coast Artillery Corps, established certain kinds of grades and officers' positions in that, but did not undertake to regulate the strength——

Mr. DENT. Oh, the gentleman from Vermont does not mean to say that under the national defense act we do not fix the number of officers and the grade of each officer in the Coast Artillery.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not say that, and that is not pertinent to the question. I said that we do fix the number of officers, but we do not distribute them according to tactical duties, which the gentleman seeks to do in this amendment of his.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You fix the regiments.

Mr. DENT. I leave the Coast Artillery Corps exactly as it was created under the national defense act, except that I reduce it to 25,000 men. It is 30,000 men under the national defense act.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know; but the point is what we are asking for is that the interior arrangement of these arms shall be flexible. Having fixed the outside limit of the Coast Artillery Corps, you permit the President to rearrange and redistribute the details as he may.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I dislike very much to differ with the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] on the proposition of the reorganization of the Army, because I have the very greatest respect for his judgment on military affairs, and we who were here in the last Congress, when the country was at war, appreciate the very splendid service that he rendered to the Nation in the matter of legislation necessary to carry on the war effectively; but we have to-day before us a reorganization of the Army, and a reorganization of the Army to-day is a very different proposition from a reorganization of the Army at any other time in the history of our country. Over 4,000,000 men were in the military service, and most of those men have sifted back into the civilian population.

Outside of the 4,000,000 men there were many who were actively doing service for the Nation but not armed and in uniform. We had the draft boards to carry out the selective-draft law, Red Cross organization, the Liberty loan committees, and other committees in all of our communities that were doing war work. They are familiar, every one of them, with the work of the War Department, particularly with that which applied to the service which was rendered to the private soldier, because throughout the war these organizations and committees were appealed to for relief.

A separate finance service is not included in the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. That service rendered most efficient work, not only as to the pay of the Army, but in paying the bills of the War Department. In so far as the pay of the private soldier is concerned, we all know that at the beginning of the war the delay in paying the soldiers of our Army caused more trouble than any other thing connected with the War Department, in so far as complaints came to the attention of Members of Congress. The complaints of the private soldiers who did not get their pay reached not only the Red Cross workers and local draft boards, but they reached every committee doing war work in every community, and complaints were sent not only to the War Department but to every Member of Congress. All in turn took it up with the Quartermaster Department, where there was created a very great congestion, which could not be relieved and which was not relieved until there was created a separate finance service, which functioned efficiently and removed the trouble. The Members of Congress were no longer troubled, the organizations and committees handling such matters throughout the country were relieved, and the private soldier who had complained and who had been dissatisfied at the delay of the War Department thereafter became satisfied. In this way the great mass of the people of our country were advised of the functioning of a separate unit which produced efficiency, and they will not welcome a drop back into the old way.

Outside of the pay of the men, before this war the average merchant would not do business with the War Department, and why? Because he thought it was necessary for him not only to get a notary public before he got his bills paid, but to execute any number of affidavits and probably to get an accountant and a lawyer. All of these things he thought were essential, and it was pretty nearly the fact. The finance service changed this entirely. We find that they paid the bills for supplies for the War Department promptly and they often got discount rates. Instead of having merchants dissatisfied because the Government held back the pay for supplies they praised the new organization. Instead of having merchants who would almost avoid an officer who wanted to buy supplies for the War Department, under this service the merchants, knowing that they could get their money promptly and have their accounts settled on a business basis, sought an opportunity to sell to the Government and furnish supplies for the Army.

Mr. DENT rose.

Mr. FISHER. I can not yield now, as I have only a moment or two. It will not do to go back to the old system, because those in this country who recognize that this service functioned efficiently and upon a business basis demand its continuance. It has to-day the indorsement of the best business men of the country. I am not going to give my vote to discontinue this service, because those who knew of this service will certainly inquire, "Did Congress let the War Department fall back into that same old rut which caused so much trouble in getting the pay for the soldiers and for supplies?" I want to say to them that we did not, but that we followed the recommendations of the business men of the country and continued a service which proved of such great value during the war. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I have no complaint to make against the provision in this bill for 17,000 officers. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the arguments of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], in which he urges the reduction of the commissioned personnel in time of peace. From my point of view there is much merit in his appeal to reduce the enlisted strength of the regular enlisted establishment, for I do not believe in large standing armies.

If he had confined his amendment to an outright reduction of the peace establishment I would have gladly supported the proposal; but as he couples with it a proposition to return to the old, inflexible, obsolete custom of having Congress name the number of regiments and other units in each branch of the service, I feel constrained to differ with him. He tries to make it appear that some great principle is at stake and that Congress, by permitting the General Staff to assort the enlisted men among the various branches of the service according to their availability and the needs of the service, is surrendering its proper hold and right of supervision over the disposition and use of the Army. That such a right exists or that it is in any way hallowed or venerable I refuse to believe. Congress, of course, has such a right, but that it cares to exercise it I utterly deny. Congress is concerned only with having an efficient Army in time of peace, properly trained and prepared at all times for action. The question as to how it shall be divided or distributed among the different branches of the service is one for determination of those skilled in the military art. It is not the proper sphere of Congress to attempt to put at the disposal of those intrusted with our defense an inflexible, arbitrary, unelastic skeleton and expect them to be responsible for the result if it will not work. Our fundamental duty has always been and now is to furnish the military authorities with a stated force of commissioned officers and men and let the General Staff arrange them into such units and such branches as the exigencies of the times require. Instead of hugging our favorite fallacy or making an idol of it we should relentlessly hurl it from its pedestal.

If experience is to be of any advantage to us at all in this world, it seems to me that now is the time to take advantage of our past lessons. Gentlemen will recall that when the clouds of war appeared upon the horizon we were more or less in trepidation. We realized that we would have to mobilize a great number of men and that we had not officers enough to officer and drill them. We resorted to the expedient of the Plattsburg idea of trying to make an officer out of a rookie in six weeks. There is one position upon which I stand inflexibly from my own observation, from my own experience in the Army, and from study of the recent and past wars, and that is that officers are more essential than men in time of peace and that the reverse is true in time of war. If the principle of preparedness has any virtue, we need a well-trained and competent force of officers in time of peace ready at a moment's notice to drill troops hastily mobilized and get them ready for conflict when the occasion requires. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] complains about the vast number of officers which this bill provides. How many does it provide? Why, only six officers to every hundred men. Instead of being too many, in my opinion, that number is too small. Gentlemen saw the table yesterday that was before them. Between 1850 and 1860 the average was 10 officers to every hundred men.

The moment the Civil War broke out, with the immense mobilization of men, the number of officers immediately dropped to five per hundred men. There was a dearth of officers.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will be glad to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I desire to supplement the gentleman's statement by saying that we may add 150 enlisted men to each 1 of the officers and will keep only those 6 officers. There is no fixed ratio of commissioned officers to enlisted men in a military organization of this kind.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; it is absolutely essential that we should consider in time of peace the necessity of having highly skilled and well-trained officers to look after the mobilization and the drilling of men in time of war. You can not make officers in the course of six weeks but you can make fighting men in six weeks. I am a great believer in the American volunteer. I believe that the average American boy knows how to shoot, and it does not take long to put him into good military form to meet the enemy anywhere.

Our experience in the last war illustrated that very vividly and very forcefully to the satisfaction of ourselves and of the entire world. Our men can fight if they are given the chance, but you must give them a fair start. You must in time of peace prepare for war by providing them with men competent to lead them and control the machinery of war. One of the blights of the Regular Army in the past was the skeleton organizations which Congress insisted upon maintaining. The officers were never able to command or practice with forces adequate to their rank. The joint maneuvers with the National Guard was a godsend to them. As early as 1895, in an address delivered before the United States Military Wheelmen, I advocated such joint military maneuvers. In conclusion, let me say that we should not attempt to dictate to the General Staff the number of units in any branch of the service. Give them the men and say to them, "Here, make out of these men infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineers; dispose of them as you think wise and get them in shape so that when they are confronted with war they will be able to do their duty." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, the Great War taught a number of valuable lessons in the way of strategy and otherwise, and I assume that the War Department has made use of those lessons in assisting the Military Affairs Committee in drafting this bill. I agree fully with my friend from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] that we should adopt a flexible military system in this country. The War Department, or, rather, the General Staff, should have the power to make such changes in our military system as may best meet the rapidly changing times. The conditions to the south of us are critical. Suppose that situation should arise that called for 100 regiments of Cavalry. Under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, and for whom I entertain the most profound respect and admiration, the War Department would not have the power to make such changes in the establishment as to meet the necessities down there.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. For a question.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman think under the bill as reported by the committee you could organize 100 regiments of Cavalry?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the War Department will be much more free to cope with any situation that might arise down there under the bill prepared and reported by the committee than they would under the provisions offered by the gentleman from Alabama. Of that there is no doubt in my mind at all. I do not pose as a military expert, and I do not believe that very many men on the floor of this House can qualify as such. We will have to trust to the good judgment and patriotism of the War Department and the General Staff in this matter. Let us not close our eyes to the fact that we need in this country, above all other things in the way of protection, a flexible military system that will allow the War Department and the General Staff to make such changes as will meet any critical situation that might arise on a moment's notice. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there seems to be considerable sentiment here on the floor of the House in favor of a separate finance department. My amendment will not prevent the House, later on when we reach that section of the bill, from incorporating in the bill a separate finance department. I am not going to discuss the question of a finance department at this time except to say I can not see any logic in the demand that there should be a separate authority to pay for goods from the authority which purchases the goods. I think as a business proposition it is absolutely absurd that the man who has the right to buy property, to buy goods that the Army wants, can not agree with the seller as to when he is going to get his money, but must go to some other authority when he wants payment. So far as the statement is concerned, made by my friend from Tennessee, that the business men of this country want it, I have received letter after letter, now on my desk, from prominent merchants of the country stating that under the system we now have of a separate finance department they would not deal with the Government at all, because one man buys the goods and he can never guarantee when payment will be made. I think it is an absurd proposition, and for that reason I am opposed to it. Yet those who want to support that proposition can vote for my substitute and still incorporate a finance department when we reach that section of the bill. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask to put in the RECORD a statement showing that if this substitute of mine is adopted there will be 8,529 officers of the line, 185,000 enlisted men, and that the total strength the Army may be organized with 14,231 officers and 226,000 men. That reduces the number of officers from the 18,000 proposed in the bill to 14,231, and it reduces the number of enlisted men from 299,000 to 226,000, the total strength, line and staff. I except in my amendment, as was done in the national defense act, the Medical Department and the Quartermaster Corps, because they may vary.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Does the gentleman think it is a wise policy to combine the purchasing power and paying power in one and the same person?

Mr. DENT. I certainly do. Every institution in this country does that.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Examples can be cited where the combination of these duties in one and the same person leads to the widest opportunity for fraud in Government business.

Mr. DENT. That is a statement which the gentleman makes which is not borne out by the facts as testified to before the Military Committee of the House. On the contrary, this separate finance department has increased the number of officers at every military post of the country that you have. They have used five officers where you had formerly but one.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true that under the old system you seldom had more than one or two officers anyway at every post, and is it not a fact that all doubled up in their duties? And is it not a fact that the proponents of this finance system now say that when you get back on the July 1 basis of organization those duties may again be doubled in small posts?

Mr. DENT. Of course, there was a lot of doubling up during the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DENT. I append herewith the statement to which I have referred.

Analysis of organization.

Branches.	Officers.	Men.
General officers of the line	63	.....
54 regiments of Infantry	2,754	74,628
18 Infantry brigade machine-gun battalions	324	8,838
11 Infantry division machine-gun battalions	110	2,387
2 Infantry tank brigades	148	2,334
17 regiments of Cavalry	833	17,323
4 Cavalry machine-gun squadrons	60	1,376
36 regiments Field Artillery	1,584	31,572
Coast Artillery Corps	1,000	15,004
7 regiments Engineer troops	231	5,224
2 mounted battalions Engineer troops	32	488
30 brigade headquarters	120	600
10 division headquarters	70	1,440
Air Service	1,200	12,000
	8,529	173,217
Corps of Engineers (less number with Engineer troops)	244	.....
Signal Corps	290	5,000
Judge Advocate General's Department	43	.....
Quartermaster Corps	1,000	18,000

Total	14,231	226,060

Officers of the General Staff, Adjutant General's Department, and Inspector General's Department are included in the detached officers as they are all detailed from the line.

The total number of officers in the several branches of the line as given in section 25 includes the detached officers' list of 1,400.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is recognized.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of a separate finance department, and to that extent I do not favor the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, but I do favor that portion of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama which fixes the number of regiments in the different arms of the service. It has been very persuasively argued here by gentlemen on the committee that since the Members of Congress do not know anything about the proper formation of military units that matter ought to be delegated absolutely to the War Department, and allow the War Department to change the organization and formation of the different units from time to time as it may see fit.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. I just wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the bill the number of men in each arm of the service is specified and the flexibility is only 10 per cent.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand the gentleman. That is true, and that is pertinent to the matter under discussion.

We hear a great deal about flexibility in this bill. It is very flexible, because the bill provides for an authorized enlisted strength of 299,000 and a commissioned personnel of practically 18,000, based on an authorized strength of 300,000 enlisted men, when everybody on the committee and everybody in this House that has kept up with the history of military legislation knows that you do not expect to get 300,000 enlisted men by voluntary enlistment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman may have fallen into a misapprehension. It has been distinctly stated several times that the number of officers provided for in this bill does not bear a dependable ratio to the number of enlisted men, because they are not all assigned to the tactical units represented by that number of enlisted men.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman also ought to know that you will have 18,000 officers, no matter what the number of men may be.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is also a provision for expansion under one officer.

Mr. CONNALLY. The element of flexibility in this act is the flexibility provided for the War Department to expand the total number of officers to 18,000 on the specious argument that 300,000 enlisted men are to be authorized, when everybody who knows anything about the question at all knows that the War Department itself does not expect to get 300,000 men by voluntary enlistment.

Now, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] says that Congress in passing this bill still retains control of the purse. That is true. Of course we will retain the control of the purse, and yet when you put these men on the rolls and fix their salaries by law, we are going to have to make the appropriations. I think it just as well in a country like our own, where we have civilian control of the Army, that we keep control not only of the purse but that the Congress keep control of the sword. The Army must know, and ought to know, that it is organized not for the particular benefit of those persons who are members of that force, but it is organized as a branch of this Government, and Congress ought to say what the organization of the Army is to be.

The gentlemen on the Military Committee say they do not know what it ought to be. I assume that the Military Committee in framing this bill had before it gentlemen from the General Staff and the War Department who testified what the organization of the Army ought to be. And I assume that they acted on that advice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the gentleman from Alabama has made his amendment embrace such a large scope. I would be with him in his provisions for consolidating some of the useless separate corps that the bill provides for. But as regards his principle of specifying the regimental organization of the line of the Army, I disagree with him. Now, the only difference in regard to the size of the Army, as between that advocated by the gentleman from Alabama and that authorized by the old national defense act, which really authorizes the maximum of 239,000 men, if its full authority is used, and this bill, which provides 299,000, is not great. There is a difference of only about 50,000 between the two measures.

The other point is in regard to fixing rigidly the number of regiments of Infantry, Cavalry, and Artillery. The committee felt it did not have the technical military knowledge sufficient to arbitrarily fix these proportions as they should be, but preferred to leave it to men more skilled in technical military matters, and I think the committee is absolutely safe in so doing, because conditions will all be greatly changed as an outgrowth of opinion formed by military men following the war. So I hope the provisions of the bill in section 2 will be permitted to stand as they are written, and that we may improve by proper amendment the other sections when we reach them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the other amendment, to perfect the section——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Has it been offered?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have not heard of any being offered.

Mr. CALDWELL. I offered one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Would it be possible to vote on this substitute first, and then, if it is defeated, to offer this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It would be possible, but if it were not defeated——

Mr. CALDWELL. It will be defeated, so I am perfectly willing to wait.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no amendment offered, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it possible in regard to the Dent amendment to obtain a separate vote on the various propositions? One proposition relates to having these tactical organizations named, and other propositions are with respect to what shall be the corps. Is it possible to get a separate vote on it?

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is open to amendment, but the debate is closed.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish to offer an amendment to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order after the vote. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KAHN. I desire to ask unanimous consent that now this paragraph be passed over for the present, in order that the various sections of the bill may be read for amendment, and if the amendments disclose the fact that the committee will remove some of the separate features of the bill——

Mr. CALDWELL. Or add to them——

Mr. KAHN. Or add to them, we can come back to this section and amend it in accordance with the action taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] asks unanimous consent that this section of the bill be passed over until other sections of the bill are read, to be returned to for amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment which I wish to offer, which is only pertinent and useful if it is offered now, before we proceed to the other sections. If the gentleman can wait long enough to allow me to offer an amendment and say a word, I shall be glad.

Mr. KAHN. I simply made my suggestion in the hope that we would be able to save some time, but I do not press it.

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do not think by passing over this section we shall expedite the consideration of the bill. I think we might as well perfect the composition of the Army as we go along.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] withdraws his request.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I ask the Clerk to report.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, a member of the committee, offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 2, line 1, after the word "Engineers" insert the words "the Transportation Service."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I explained something of the reason why I favored this amendment to this section. The experiences of the war demonstrated beyond a doubt that you could not transport the Army, its supplies and matériel, by the archaic method of depending upon a Quartermaster Corps that was already overburdened with the enormous detail of its services. During the war the greatest thing we had to contend with was the lack of transportation facilities, all the way from the mine and the farm in America to the factory and through the factory to the seaboard, and from the seaboard across to the other side, and from there on up to the front. In order that we might meet that trying situation the Overman Act was passed. The President created a transportation service, in fact three transportation services; and now, under a study by the staff, and following the advice of the best military scientists that we have in our country, and based upon the experience that we had in the war, the Secretary of War has written to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a letter upon the subject, which I am going to ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARCH 5, 1920.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: An examination of a bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," now pending before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, discloses the fact that no provision is made either for a separate transportation service or for a separate construction service. In order that the position of the War Department, with reference to these two important branches of the service, may not be misunderstood, I beg to advise you that our judgment and experience dictates the wisdom of making provision for such services.

At a very early period in the World War it became necessary to take from the Quartermaster Corps and set up these two services into separate bureaus, reporting originally directly to the Secretary of War, because of the overburdened state of the responsibilities of the Quartermaster General.

In addition to the duties of supervising the transportation of the Army, the transportation service has recently been charged by the President with the supervision and operation of the inland waterways, recently under the charge of the Director General of Railroads. This activity includes the operation and maintenance of Government barge lines on the Mississippi River between St. Louis and New Orleans, on the Warrior River from Birmingham to Mobile and New Orleans, and on the New York Barge Canal between Buffalo and New York.

It is to be noted that under the provisions of section 9 of the bill the Quartermaster General is charged (as appears at line 3, page 17) "with the direction of all work pertaining to the construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities connected with housing the officers and enlisted men of the Army, and with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies." With this limitation of construction in the Quartermaster Corps it is apparent that it is the intention of the proposed bill that all construction, maintenance, and repair work other than housing of the Army and storing of quartermaster supplies is to be performed by the other bureaus and services of the War Department. This contemplates a return to the prewar conditions when each service and bureau of the War Department carried out its own construction, maintenance, and repair work. Each bureau, therefore, will be called upon to create within itself a distinct construction department, thereby giving encouragement to interdepartmental duplication and loss of economy.

It is therefore my respectful recommendation that in due consideration of this subject provision be made for a separate transportation service and a separate construction service in the proposed bill.

Respectfully, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I want to call your attention to the fact that when the Esch bill was in conference and it was found necessary to do something with the transportation facilities acquired by the Government during the war, they looked to some governmental agency that could handle the Government boats that were on the rivers, and the thing they found most available was the transportation service of the Army, and naturally provided that these boats be placed under the control of the Secretary of War. Now, in this bill that has been reported by this committee no provision whatsoever is made, unless the bill is amended so as to carry a transportation corps, to carry on this great enterprise in which the Government has already invested its millions of money, and in addition to that we must have trained, skilled men, prepared on a moment's notice to expand their service so as to transport our Army, its men, supplies, and matériel wherever the Nation requires its manhood to fight. I therefore respectfully submit that it is wise, that it is just, that it is scientific to amend this bill by incorporating a transportation service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], will do away with one of the economies that is attempted by this bill. His amendment provides for the continuation of a separate transportation service, a separate Motor Transport Corps. The figures submitted to the committee show that by doing away with the Motor Transport Corps as a separate bureau and placing its administration back under the Quartermaster General, where it was before the war, we can make a saving to the Government of over a million dollars in overhead expenses right here in Washington alone. A summary of the cost of the corps as a separate bureau shows that as now constituted it consists of 92 commissioned officers and 338 civilian employees in the city of Washington. The civilian employees cost $537,000 per annum.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say to the gentleman that if my amendment is carried, when we reach page 16, referring to the Quartermaster Corps, I propose to offer amendments reducing the number of officers and men below the number that will be carried in the provision providing for the Transportation Corps.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, there are 338 civilian employees in the office of transportation alone, costing over half a million dollars. There are 686 civilian employees here in the Motor Transport Corps, which is costing a million dollars, approximately; and under the provision of the bill it is estimated there will be required for the Motor Transport Corps division, when consolidated in the office of the Quartermaster General, 22 officers instead of ninety and odd as at present, and but 320 civilian employees, at a cost of $554,000, as against 1,000 civil employees as now constituted, making a saving of $1,079,000 in this one corps alone, without in the slightest impairing its efficiency. It simply means its abolishment as a separate entity or bureau of the Government and placing its administration in a bureau that already exists. The question before the House is not alone one of efficiency, it is simply as to whether the House desires to save $1,000,000 annually in overhead expenses of operation in Washington alone in one swoop, as is proposed in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SNELL). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 2, line 25, after the word "thousand," insert all in lines 6 to 15, inclusive, page 34, beginning with "immediately," as follows:

"Immediately upon the passage of this act, and thereafter in September of each year, the President shall convene a board of not less than five general officers, which shall arrange all officers in two classes, namely: Class A, consisting of officers who should be retained in the service, and class B, of officers who should not be retained in the service. Until the rendition of the report of the original board, all officers shall be regarded as belonging to class A. The findings of the board shall not be subject to review by any authority."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, as I caught the reading of the second section it purports to indicate the real purpose of the bill. I think it should be made complete so that it does. The real purpose of the bill is indicated in the amendment which I have offered. That provides that as soon as they get it passed the fellows down in the bureau shall pick out five of their friends and those men shall put everybody out of the Army they want to put out and, further, that there shall be no appeal. The purpose of this bill, if this section I have called attention to stays in the bill, is to allow the red-tape worms down in the bureau to run the fighting men out of the Army. That is all this bill is intended for. I do not propose to press this amendment and shall ask leave presently to withdraw it, but I want this House to know now what this bill is about and what its purpose is, and that is the reason I offer the amendment and challenge attention to it. The staff already has done this. They have picked out five of their friends and they made a list of them they were going to put out of the Army. I have seen the result of some of it. I asked the Chief of Staff by what authority he got up such a list and appointed such a body of men to act, and he has never answered the question. I have seen some of the men they put out. I know the record of some of them. They are men who volunteered to enter the service of the United States, who went in as soldiers twenty-odd years ago, who went to war and fought their way up from a private to the shoulder straps, who went into this war after serving for 20 years as an officer in the Regular Army. The purpose is to throw such men out. I have seen men like Gen. March take advantage of their positions in the swivel chairs and run better men out of the Army, and I propose later on to mention some men and indicate their records. One day there was a drum beat in a little town and a man who was a traveling man said, "What is it about?" He then went down and enlisted as a private, in a strange town, among strangers.

He came home a lieutenant and he was transferred to the Regular Army. He was shot through the jaw while in the Army and was the first man to cross the Bag Bag bridge in the Philippine Islands, an act which goes down in history. When this Regular Army was arranged after that war he was made an officer. He had served faithfully and was chief of staff or adjutant general down at Panama, one of the most efficient and capable men in the Army, in every respect the equal of Gen. March and a better soldier and a man who had fought twenty times as many battles as he. But he was marked for slaughter. The men with whom he served at Panama and everywhere else have said for him that he is efficient and capable. I shall discuss others later. I just want now to have you understand what the purpose of this bill is. Later on I shall offer an amendment to strike this out. I do not know how the rest of you are, but if you are going to pass the bill here and let the bureaucrats throw the fighting men out of the Army, I am not for it. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, once more I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over for the present and that we read the other sections of the bill for amendment. Then if amendments are made which will change the organization provided for in this section we can make the changes in this section when we return to this section. In that very connection I call attention to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL]. He said that if his provision for a separate transportation corps should carry he would move to change the organization in the Quartermaster Corps when we reach that section, so as to deduct from the Quartermaster Corps the number of officers and men required for the transportation corps.

So I think we would save time if we were to take up the various other matters and come to this section afterwards. I ask unanimous consent to pass it over temporarily.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to pass over this section temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I defer to the wish of the gentleman in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee. As far as I am concerned, I think the bill would be expedited if we finished the composition of the Army in this section of the bill; but in view of the fact that the chairman of the committee wishes it to go over, thinking it will expedite the bill, I will withdraw any further objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. JONES of Texas. I object, Mr. Chairman. I have an amendment which I wish to offer to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. HARRELD. Will the gentleman from Texas yield just a moment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. Can we not have the request submitted that at the conclusion of the consideration of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and of the amendment which I wish to offer the section may then be temporarily passed over?

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to modifying the request in that manner, and I will make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of the amendments of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] this section may be temporarily passed. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 19, after the word "exceed," strike out "250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "175,000"; and in lines 24 and 25, strike out "280,000" and insert in lieu thereof "205,000."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to interfere with the reorganization of the Army. I would rather leave its arrangement and subdivision, therefore, to those who have studied the question more thoroughly and exhaustively than I have. However, I can not see any reason for the United States Government maintaining an Army of enlisted men of more than 200,000 in peace time. All through the war we heard constantly and continuously that one of the purposes of the war we were fighting, and one of the lessons that not only this country but every nation on earth would learn was the utter folly of continuing the immense armaments that the world was cursed with and which had brought on the war. I believe if there is any nation on the face of the earth that is in a position from the economic point of view, from the military point of view, from the standpoint of prestige, or from any other point of view to set an example, it is the United States of America. Moreover, I believe that for the present at least we will not be able to get more than 200,000 men into the Army. Why not get the benefit before the world of saying, "We are going to set the example, and if you people will follow we will cut down the military strength of the various nations of the earth."

In 1914, before the war came on, the peace-time strength of Germany's Army was 870,000 men; of the army of France, 783,000 men; of Russia, 1,500,000 men; of Austria, 435,000 men; of Italy, 306,000 men; of Great Britain, 262,000 men; and of Turkey, 230,000 men. I have always believed that a "pistol-toting" man would sooner or later get into a fight. I believe that applies to nations. Look at the nations of South America. The South American Republics are, of course, small and comparatively new. They have practically no peace-time military strength, and they have not had any wars to amount to anything for many years. In 1914 Argentina had a peace-time army of 18,000; Chile, 19,000; Peru, 6,000; Venezuela, 9,000; Bolivia, 3,000; Colombia, 5,000; while in Europe even little Bulgaria, in 1914, had a peace-time army of 65,700 men. There have been more than 30 wars in Europe in the last hundred years, and during that same period no war of any consequence in South America. Europe has had these vast armies. The South American countries have lived in peace. They have had small armies. For the present year at least it seems to me, inasmuch as perhaps not more than 200,000 will volunteer, it will be well to put that limit upon the number.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that the Argentine Republic is one of the greatest countries in South America?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. It has universal military training.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It has a peace-time army of 18,650 men.

Mr. CALDWELL. And it has universal training of every young man 19 years of age.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; and every nation in Europe that I have mentioned had not only universal training but universal service and had had for years—Germany, France, Russia, and all those nations. Germany had not only a peace-time army of 870,000 men, but she had a reserve force of 5,000,000 men, all of whom had seen not only universal training but universal service, and that is true of the other great European nations. You can not escape the proposition. You are driven inexorably to the conclusion that if you have military establishments bristling all over the face of the earth you are going to have war, and if you tell the great nations of the earth, as the United States Government is to-day telling the world, that we are going to arm as though for an immediate fight and have a great standing army, the other nations of the earth in the due course of self-defense will arm themselves. I should like to see any man escape that conclusion, because it is inevitable. I submit that the United States Government is now in the most favorable position that it has been in any period in its history to say to the world, "We will set the example and let you follow." But if, disregarding the lessons that some of the men who have talked here have spoken about, we are going to throw aside the lessons of the war and establish a great army, on what kind of a platform will we go to the nations of the earth and say, "Reduce the fighting strength of your armies." [Applause.]

The cost of maintaining such an army is not a matter to be lightly considered. The adoption of my amendment will reduce the annual appropriation by much more than $100,000,000, assuming, of course, that the Army will be recruited to full strength.

Somehow, somewhere, these tremendous appropriations must be reduced. National economy is absolutely necessary; and yet each committee asks us to begin with some other bill.

I am in favor of reducing the appropriations all along the line. As a matter of fact, for the next year or more at least we do not need an army of 300,000, so why in the meantime burden the people with the expense of such a machine. The National Guard organizations did magnificent work during the war. No finer or more dependable soldiers trod the soil of Europe during the entire war. These organizations supplementing the reduced Regular Army will be amply sufficient for the time being.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, I think it is well understood in this House that I am not classed as a "big-army" man. At least I have been criticized very severely in the past as a small-army man. I am one of those who did not believe in a large standing professional army in our country in time of peace. But I can not agree with my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. JONES] that in a great Nation like ours of 110,000,000 population a law which provides for the authorization of an army of 280,000 men is a provision for a large standing army. I am not unmindful of the fact that we have our foreign possessions, and that it is necessary that we have a division in the Philippine Islands. It is necessary that we have a division in the Hawaiian Islands.

It is necessary that we have troops to protect American rights at Panama; it is necessary to have a sufficient number of troops to beat back the ever-appearing war cloud on the Texas frontier.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman think that 200,000 men will volunteer the next year?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am getting to that. I will say that while the bill provides for an enlisted strength of 280,000 men, I can assure the gentleman that we will not get 280,000 men in peace times, but we will have the law on the statute book so that if necessity should require, if we should need 280,000 men on the Texas border, the young men of this country can come in and enlist, and we have provided by law for that orgnization. In other words, it is simply a safeguard.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think that in case of war we will go back to the draft system? What will be accomplished by telling the world that we have a 300,000 Army and turning around and only providing 200,000?

I agree with the gentleman, but what do you accomplish by saying to the world that you are going to have 300,000 men and then adopting a system that can only provide 200,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say that in the history of our country whenever we needed a larger force the American youth have been ready to volunteer, and they will provide a volunteer army of 280,000 men.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It has also been the history of our country that Congress can pass a law in two or three days that will provide for raising a larger Army.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman know that in all the history of this country we have fixed a maximum strength of the Army at a certain figure, and yet the War Department has never filled the maximum because Congress holds in its hands the appropriation that is given for the force we want?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is true.

Mr. KAHN. May I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to an article I have from the London Times of Wednesday, February 18, 1920. England has a volunteer army, just as we have, and they have asked for appropriations for this coming fiscal year for their army of $625,000,000, based upon an estimate of 525,000 enlisted men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to say in that time to my distinguished friend from Texas that this bill provides for the defense of our country and is an alternative to some other form of preparedness. Two hundred and eighty thousand Regular troops, with the reserve forces that we provide for, trained in school and training camp, and all the activities provided for in this bill, in a way takes the place, in part, of compulsory military training.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that my amendment does not affect the officers, but only the enlisted men.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that, notwithstanding the argument of the gentleman from Texas that big armies invite war, the United States had the smallest Army of any great nation in the world in 1917, and yet it was drawn into the Great War and had to go into the fight without preparation. We had an Army of 127,000 men, a joke in number, and if we had not had a National Guard educated on the American border to assist the Regular troops in the Soisson-Chateau Thierry Battle could never have crossed the highway and railroad and cut off the German supplies to Chateau Thierry.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will yield, we had 127,000 at the outbreak of the war, and we won the war in 19 months.

Mr. CALDWELL. But we had 7,000,000 British and French troops to hold the line until we got ready, and yet we made the most enormous sacrifice ever known in the world. We ought to be ashamed of ourselves for sending the manhood of America into the Great War without giving them an opportunity to train replacements for the boys that were killed. We sent as replacements men who had not had a gun in their hands until five weeks before they were killed in the trenches. Shame on the Congress of the United States that with that experience staring us in the face that we here to-day calmly legislate and fail to correct a condition for the next generation that must fight for this Nation's liberty where the boys shall die and suffer as they died and suffered even without any training. [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I am not going to discuss this matter very fully. I regret to find myself in disagreement with my distinguished colleague from Texas on this question. I am not a big-army man. I do not share the fear that seems to be prevalent in this land that we are to become a military Nation because, perchance, we assemble a maximum strength of 280,000 men. In other words, because we contemplate enacting a law under which in an emergency, under which in a time of stress there may be a contingency that will call for the enlistment of this number of men.

As has been well stated here, the standing Army in the national-defense act was 175,000 men, but it never reached above 120,000; but let me say to my friend from Texas, and my other colleagues here, that while we are a peaceful Nation—and God grant that we will always be a peaceful Nation—we are an expanding Nation. When you have a Regular Army of the United States you do not confine its activities to a garrison camp in the interior of this country. You expand its activities into the Philippine Islands and into the Hawaiian Islands, and far off and what was long ago considered bleak Alaska. These forces must from time to time go into Cuba, and we have a border extending from California to the southern part of Texas that is a standing menace to the safety and the prosperity of the people who populate the territory of that tremendous border.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman concedes that we will not get above 200,000 by the volunteer system, how can we get any more under the terms of the bill as reported than under my amendment?

Mr. BEE. The gentleman misunderstands. If you are going to have 200,000 as the maximum you might just as well have 280,000 as your maximum, because when the emergency comes you may just as well need 280,000 as you need 200,000. Let me say, furthermore, I am a great believer in the National Guard of this country; and when the time comes in this bill I propose to raise my voice in behalf of that character of legislation which will upbuild the National Guard, at last the safety of the people. [Applause.] I do not want the National Guard boys taken from their homes, from their occupations, and from their professions, and called from time to time, as they were a few years ago, to serve upon the border of Mexico, because we have not got Regular troops enough to defend American interests on the border. [Applause.] Therefore we are not doing any harm by this. Why, my friends talk as if this country is to be converted into a military camp because out of the 110,000,000 people we contemplate a maximum Army of 280,000.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. In just a minute. Gentlemen of the House, this country, I trust, will never again engage in war, but I am not one of those men who agree with Tennyson that—

> When the war drums beat no longer,
> And the battle flags are furled
> In the parliament of man,
> The federation of the world.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman believe in universal military training?

Mr. BEE. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas if he asked that question of me to get me to declare myself, it was futile, because here and elsewhere I have asserted my belief that in the sane, reasonable military training of the youth of this land is found the safety and salvation of this Republic. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEE. May I have one minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEE. Because in the physical welfare of the youth of this land, in the greater upbuilding of the youth of this land, in the inculcation of the love of country, in the love of patriotism and reverence of that flag, no young man ever acquires it any better and as thoroughly as he does in a training camp for a few months where every day he is taught the lesson of physical culture, where every day he is taught the lessons of moral, upright living, where every day he is taught to love his country and its institutions, not militarism, but in high school, in college, and in training camps reasonably and sanely we will stop the necessity of having 280,000 men, let me say to my friend from Texas, with an able citizen soldiery in the background, who may spring equipped, armed for the country's defense whenever its honor and integrity are assailed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were—ayes 22, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 19, after the word "exceed" strike out "250,000" and insert in lieu thereof "150,000."

Mr. HARRELD. Does the gentleman from California desire to let this matter go over? If so, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. KAHN. Let it be considered now, and let us speak to it.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Chairman, I had intended offering this amendment simply to accord with the speech that I made on the floor of this House yesterday, that my acts might square with my words. However, there are a few things that I want to say in connection with this. The argument has been made on this floor that although you expect to fix the limit to which the Army may be recruited at 250,000, you have no hope of ever having a recruited force of that size. Now, I want to say to you that since the beginning of this Government there has never been a time when there has not been a considerable part of this country which was in favor of building up a military caste in this country, and one argument they have always made and insisted upon was that Congress should open the gates that they might bring that about by fixing a high maximum limit that might be attained in the recruiting of the Army. That is a sinister argument. I do not mean to say that Members of this House are parties to that sinister motive, but they have gotten that idea from the people who are building up in this country a militaristic spirit and are making the argument that element has made since the beginning of this country's history. In my speech yesterday I advocated a strong National Guard. I believe in adequate preparation for the national defense, and I believe it is the policy of this Government that we should only have a standing army of sufficient strength to take care of the immediate needs of the country, and that we should have a second line of defense in the way of a strong National Guard that might be called into service when an emergency arises.

I believe I am justified in saying that it offers a better opportunity of having a great defensive Army in this country.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRELD. I will.

Mr. MILLER. I will ask the gentleman if the provision in this bill for the National Guard is not the best provision the National Guard has ever had in this country?

Mr. HARRELD. As I said on yesterday, it does provide the machinery for the establishment of a State guard, but that is the very thing I am talking about. The trouble with this bill is, and the trouble with this provision which fixes the maximum to which the Army may be recruited is, that it serves to build up a standing Army and minimizes the National Guard system. I want to build up the National Guard and minimize the standing Army, and the way to do it is to provide here for only that size of a standing Army that is necessary to meet the purposes of the country, and that is the reason I am offering this amendment.

By providing in this bill for an Army of 250,000 privates, to the exclusion of officers and certain special troops, you are playing into the hands of those who want to Prussianize the Army. You may be doing it unconsciously and unintentionally, but you are doing it none the less effectually, and I for one believe in smiting that hydra-headed monster upon his many heads every time one of them is stuck in the air.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 4. Officers.—Officers commissioned to and holding in the Army the office of a general officer shall hereafter be known as general officers of the line. Officers commissioned to and holding in the Army an office other than that of general officer, but to which the rank of a general officer is attached, shall be known as general officers of the staff. There shall be 1 general, until a vacancy occurs in that office, after which it shall cease to exist; 21 major generals and 46 brigadier generals of the line; 599 colonels; 674 lieutenant colonels; 2,245 majors; 4,490 captains; 4,266 first lieutenants; 2,694 second lieutenants; and also the number of officers of the Medical Department, chaplains, and band leaders hereinafter provided for, and professors as now authorized by law, and the numbers herein prescribed shall not be exceeded: Provided, That major generals of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of brigadier general of the line, and brigadier generals of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of colonel of the line.

"Officers of all grades in the Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Corps of Engineers, and Medical Department; officers above the grade of captain in the Air Service, Signal Corps, Judge Advocate General's Department, Quartermaster Corps, Ordnance Department, Finance Department, and Chemical Warfare Service, and all chaplains, band leaders, and professors shall be permanently commissioned in their respective branches. All officers of the General Staff Corps, Adjutant General's Department, Inspector General's Department, Bureau of Insular Affairs, and Militia Bureau shall be obtained by detail from officers of corresponding grades in other branches. In any other grade and branch an officer may, with his consent, be permanently commissioned, provided he was originally appointed in the Regular Army under the provisions of section 23 hereof, or has served efficiently for at least two years on duties related to those of such branch, and not otherwise; and the remaining vacancies in such branch shall be filled by detail.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENT. I understood the bill was to be read by sections, and section 4 (a) is different from section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Clerk is on a part of section 3.

Mr. KAHN. And this section goes onto page 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Section 3 in its entirety goes over to page 8.

Mr. DENT. That is very true, but it contains an entirely different subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not responsible for that. The committee is responsible for the form in which the bill appears. It is being read by sections according to the rule.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. In view of the fact that this section seems to be divided into paragraphs, is it to be understood that an amendment can be offered to any paragraph of this section?

Mr. KAHN. When the section is read; yes.

Mr. SISSON. That is what I wanted to know. So nothing is lost by letting the whole section be read?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely nothing; and it is the usual procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4a. Warrant officers: In addition to those authorized for the Army Mine Planter Service, there shall be 1,575 warrant officers, appointed by the Secretary of War from among noncommissioned officers who have had at least 10 years' enlisted service, or from among enlisted men who served as officers of the Army at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and whose total service in the Army, enlisted and commissioned, amounts to five years: Provided, That if there shall at any time be vacancies for which there are no applicants possessing the necessary service and such other qualifications as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, such vacancies may be filled by the appointment of persons serving or who have served as Army field clerks or field clerks, Quartermaster Corps; and hereafter no appointments as Army field clerks or field clerk, Quartermaster Corps, shall be made. The warrant officers authorized by this section shall be assigned to the several branches of the service as the Secretary of War may direct, shall receive base pay of $1,320 a year and the allowances of a second lieutenant, and shall be entitled to longevity pay and to retirement under the same conditions as commissioned officers: Provided further, That warrant officers shall take rank next below second lieutenants and among themselves according to the date of their respective warrants.

SEC. 4b. Enlisted men: The grades of enlisted men shall be such as the President may from time to time direct, with monthly base pay at the rate of $75 for the first grade, $60 for the second grade, $50 for the third grade, $40 for the fourth grade, $33 for the fifth grade, and $30 for the sixth grade. Of the total authorized number of enlisted men, those in the first grade shall not exceed 2 per cent, those in the second grade 2 per cent, those in the third grade 10 per cent, those in the fourth grade 10 per cent, and those in the fifth grade 32 per cent.

Existing laws providing for continuous-service pay are hereby repealed, and hereafter enlisted men shall receive an increase of 10 per cent of their base pay for each five years of service in the Army, or service which by existing law is held to be the equivalent of Army service, such increase not to exceed 40 per cent.

Under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, enlisted men shall receive monthly pay for qualification as follows: As expert gunner, Field Artillery, as expert telegrapher, Signal Corps, and as expert rifleman, Infantry, Cavalry, Air Service, and Engineers, $5; as first-class gunner, Field Artillery and Coast Artillery, as telegrapher, first class, Signal Corps, and as sharpshooter, Infantry, Cavalry, Air Service, and Engineers, $3; as second-class gunner, Field Artillery and Coast Artillery, as telegrapher, second class, Signal Corps, and as marksman, Infantry, Cavalry, Air Service, and Engineers, $2. Detached enlisted men shall be eligible for qualification pay as in the branches to which their service is assimilated.

Under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, enlisted men of the fifth and sixth grades may be rated as specialists, and receive extra pay therefor per month, as follows: First class, $20; second class, $18; third class, $15; fourth class, $12; fifth class, $8; sixth class, $3. Of the total authorized number of enlisted men in the fifth and sixth grades, those rated as specialists of the first class shall not exceed 0.7 per cent; of the second class, 1.5 per cent; of the third class, 1.9 per cent; of the fourth class, 4.7 per cent; of the fifth class, 5 per cent; of the sixth class, 15.2 per cent: Provided, That all laws and parts of laws providing for extra duty pay for enlisted men are hereby repealed: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall operate to reduce the pay which any enlisted man is now receiving during his current enlistment and while he holds his present grade.

SEC. 4c. Assignments.—Officers and enlisted men shall be assigned to the several branches of the Army as hereafter directed, a suitable proportion of each grade in each branch, but the President may increase or diminish the number of officers or enlisted men assigned to any branch by not more than a total of 10 per cent: Provided, That the total number authorized in any grade by this act is not exceeded: Provided further, That no officer shall be transferred from one branch of the service to another under the provisions of this section without his own consent. Except as otherwise prescribed by law, chiefs and assistants to the chiefs of the several branches shall hereafter be appointed for four-year periods by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among general officers of the line or officers commissioned in the respective branches in grades not below that of colonel, and such appointments shall not create vacancies. In the Adjutant General's Department, the Inspector General's Department, and the Bureau of Insular Affairs such appointments may be made from among officers commissioned in any of the combatant arms. Upon the retirement of any officer who has served as chief or assistant to the chief of any branch, unless in the meantime he shall have been promoted to a higher grade, he shall receive the rank and retired pay of the grade which he held as such chief or assistant. In time of peace no officer of the line shall be or remain detailed as a member of the General Staff Corps unless he has served for two of the next preceding six years in actual command of troops of one or more of the combatant arms; and in time of peace every officer serving in a grade below that of brigadier general shall perform duty with troops of one or more of the combatant arms for at least one year in every period of five consecutive years, except that officers of less than one year's commissioned service in the Regular Army may be detailed as students at service schools: Provided, That an officer commissioned in a staff corps shall not be or remain detailed as a member of the General Staff Corps unless he has served for one of the next preceding five years with troops of one or more of the combatant arms. In the administration of this provision, all duty performed between April 6, 1917, and July 1, 1920, inclusive, shall be regarded as satisfying the requirements of service with combatant arms. Existing laws in so far as they restrict the detail or assignment of officers are hereby repealed. The Secretary of War shall annually report to Congress the numbers, grades, and assignments of the officers and enlisted men of the Army, and the number, kinds, and strength of organizations pertaining to each branch of the service.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KAHN: Page 3, line 18, after the word "general" insert the words "as now authorized by law."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 19, after the word "exist" change the semicolon to a period, and on line 20 insert at the beginning of the line the words "on and after July 1, 1920, there shall be."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is obvious. It practically makes these provisions go into effect on the 1st of July, 1920.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following additional amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 12, strike out the words "general officers of the line or."

Mr. KAHN. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. I also offer another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 14, after the word "vacancies" change the period to a colon and insert: "Provided, That any officer who shall have served as a chief or assistant chief to the chief of any of the several branches herein provided for or similar branches during the World War shall be eligible to appointment as chief or assistant to the chief of any of such branches."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move a substitute to that.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California wish to speak to the amendment?

Mr. KAHN. Possibly if I explain it the gentleman from Illinois will not offer his substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to allow the appointment to these positions of certain officers of the Army who at the present time are serving as chiefs or assistant chiefs of certain branches of the Army. These officers in their regular positions in the Army are of considerably lower grade. I understand there are several majors who are now acting and have acted during the war as brigadier generals. That is true with respect to Gen. Marshall, who is at the head of the Construction Division, and Gen. Drake, who is at the head of the Motor Transport Corps. Now, if this amendment is adopted it will enable the President to appoint these officers to the head of the divisions they have been commanding. Of course, that ought to be done, in fairness to the service of these officers during the war.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would the amendment suggested by the chairman of the committee enlarge or increase the relative rank or file number of these particular officers who get the assignment?

Mr. KAHN. It is not a permanent assignment, as I understand it. It is only during the time they happen to be the heads of a division. That is the case now in many of the departments of the Army. For instance, a man who is The Adjutant General may hold a lower position in the Army if he were detailed away from the position of chief of that particular department. That was notably the case with respect to Gen. McCain, who was The Adjutant General of the Army when we got into the war, and he was only a regular colonel in his branch of the Army. But while he was holding that position in that particular branch of the Army he was acting as major general.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One further question, in order that we may understand the application of the amendment: Take a man, for instance, whose rank is that of major. You provide by this amendment that temporarily he may be assigned as chief of a division or on the staff of some particular branch. That may last four years, as I understand it?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. During those four years what would be, according to the regulations, his temporary rank if he were a major on the regular lineal list?

Mr. KAHN. His temporary rank would be the rank of the position created by law for the position he holds temporarily.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And he would get a commission for that period of time for that rank?

Mr. KAHN. He would hold that rank by virtue of law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How would that affect your scheme, hereafter provided in the bill, with reference to the promotion list?

Mr. KAHN. Not at all. It would make no difference or change in the promotion list. He would simply hold that rank temporarily while occupying the position of head of some branch or some particular staff position in the Army.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is, then, no further exception to the rule?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I want to ask the gentleman who is it particularly that you want to take care of here?

Mr. KAHN. I have mentioned the fact that there are several officers who are provided for in this proposed amendment. Gen. Drake, of the Motor Transport Corps, is one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. And the officer who is the head of the Construction Corps, Gen. Marshall. There may be several others.

Mr. SISSON. Would it not really be better just to take care of those men specifically than to make this exception for that particular class which is singled out in this general way?

Mr. KAHN. These gentlemen have shown singular ability in their respective positions in the Army. Under the language of the bill, if some exception of this kind is not made, they could not be appointed to these positions that are provided for in this bill. They are ineligible, and it is simply for the purpose of making them eligible for appointment, if the President desires to appoint them, that the amendment is offered.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. Do I understand the gentleman from California to make the statement that unless this provision is adopted, Gen. Marshall could not be placed at the head of the Construction Corps if that corps were put under the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. KAHN. So I understand.

Mr. DENT. By what provision of law?

Mr. KAHN. Under the provisions of this bill, which provides, on line 13, page 8, that no officer below the grade of colonel can be appointed to these positions, and men now in several of these positions occupy the grade of major in the Army.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KAHN. I simply wanted to say, in conclusion, that this amendment is not intended to benefit any men, but it is the purpose to utilize the services of certain officers rendered during the war for the benefit of the Army organization.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has offered an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MADDEN to the amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: At the end of the Kahn amendment add the following:
"Provided further, That no officer shall be eligible for appointment to assistant to the Chief of a Staff Corps or branch unless such officer shall have been recommended for such appointment by the Chief of the Staff Corps or branch in question."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it must be apparent to every person who has given any consideration to this question that the man who may be selected as assistant to the chief of a staff corps or branch holds a confidential relationship to the man in charge, and it would be unwise and against the best traditions of the service to appoint men haphazard to these confidential positions. It frequently has happened in the past that officers have been assigned as assistants to commanders of these branch staff corps who have not been in harmony with the man in command, and the best results have not followed. In fact, the worst results have followed such assignments. My purpose in offering this amendment is to create the harmony and the efficiency which ought to obtain in the service for all these positions occupied by the chiefs of staff corps, which are of the most important in the Army.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman if he would make it imperative that the board could not appoint anyone unless he had been recommended by the chief? In other words, do you want to throw the door wide open so that the chief may select a man, regardless of his qualifications, whom the board probably would turn down?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course I would not under any circumstances presume to say that a man should be selected if he were not qualified, and I assume in that connection to say that the man at the head would be a fool, to say the least, if he did make a recommendation for the appointment of his assistant if he was not qualified.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman know, or has the gentleman information as to whether those who are sought to be taken care of in this way are graduates from West Point?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no knowledge whatever as to that.

Mr. SISSON. There would be no reason for this language unless it were to take care of somebody who was an exception to the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no exception to the rule in the suggestion I have made, and my purpose is simply to provide for the operation of the bureau or the staff. I have nobody in mind. There is not a man in the Army that I am interested in except in so far as I am interested in his functioning as he ought to function to create the conditions that ought to prevail.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under this amendment, as I caught it, would it be a fact that no one could be appointed as an assistant chief unless he had been picked out and selected by the chief of a bureau or division?

Mr. MADDEN. Not unless he has been recommended.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suppose the chief refuses to recommend anybody but one person. Then they must appoint that person?

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I assume that no such condition as that would ever arise, and that no chief would put himself up against the judgment of those who had some participation in the effective management of the department.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But this would give the power so that if the chief wanted some particular person, no one else could be selected, and I think that would become the practice, and they must take whomsoever the chief of the division says he wants in the way of an assistant.

Mr. MADDEN. I think if that practice did prevail it would be very advantageous to the department, for in no line of business in the world would any man at the head of a great business institution be called upon to accept a confidential assistant who was not satisfactory to him and in whom he could not place the utmost confidence. So I say that instead of creating embarrassment we are creating efficiency by the adoption of some such amendment as that which I have proposed.

Mr. KAHN. There is a provision later on in the bill which is practically on all fours with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois; but it provides only for the original appointments.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, there ought not to be any disposition on the part of anybody to duplicate language in the bill, and I have no disposition to do that.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman's amendment provides for these appointments in this section; but the bill later on has a somewhat similar provision for original appointments. The situation that the gentleman points out, as far as original appointments are concerned, is provided for on page 29, line 13, of this bill. The chief makes the recommendation of his assistant; there is such a provision in the bill.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask my colleague what would happen if the chief selected a gentleman whom another chief did not want to give up?

Mr. MADDEN. If it can be presumed that the object of all the men at the head of these staff corps is to hamper the operations of the department, then some such condition as that which my colleague describes might exist, but I apprehend that it will not be the purpose of the chief of any staff corps to embarrass the operations of the department, but rather to facilitate them, and I do not believe that any such conditions could arise as the imagination of my colleague has pictured.

Mr. JUUL. If the man is so efficient that the chief under whom he is now serving does not want to part with him, what will happen in such a case as that if two men desire the same assistant?

Mr. MADDEN. My amendment does not provide that the particular man shall be selected, but it provides that no man can be appointed without the recommendation. It does not mean that the recommendation shall be confined to one man. It means that he shall have the right to pick from the whole Army the man whom he believes best qualified. If he can not get the man whom he thinks is best qualified, he will be compelled to recommend somebody else.

Mr. JUUL. To take the next best man?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I regret very much that there is not a larger attendance, not because I can contribute especially to the delectation or instruction of my colleagues but because I am anxious that the Members of the House should know what the bill in this section and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California propose to do. This bill in so many words provides that an officer can not be appointed as the head of any branch or staff corps in the Army unless he has the rank of colonel. That means colonel in the Regular Army and not in the temporary force.

To all of those soldiers who went overseas and fought with temporary rank and who have come back to the United States and been demoted and sent out into the various camps of the country this bill says that in order to be appointed as assistant chief or chief of any branch of the War Department they must be colonels. The gentleman from California and his committee in drafting this bill have presented a measure which ought really to be called a bill to take care of certain gentlemen, and they have overlooked somebody. They did not draw the bill originally so that all of certain gentlemen in the department who are majors and lieutenant colonels, and who have been snugly ensconced in the department all through the war, could continue to remain there with increased temporary rank. The bill omitted those gentlemen, and provided that they could not continue in those temporary grades as brigadier generals, as chiefs or assistant chiefs of staff corps, unless they are colonels in the Regular Army. Not being colonels in the Regular Army, the gentleman from California comes in at the eleventh hour with an amendment which provides for them. The gentleman from California might as well have provided by name for these officers who are to continue in the temporary rank of brigadier general. We all know who they are. One of them, I understand, is the head of the construction division. Another is the head of the automobile or Motor Transport Corps, and another one is the head of some other branch in a bureau.

Now, I want to tell you what you are doing. You are saying to all of the line officers, including colonels who fought and who were out in the training camps and did not get to go to France, as they desired to go, "You shall stay out yonder in your camps. You shall stay in your demoted rank, and this man in Washington, who is only a major, who had had for three or four years the temporary rank of brigadier general, with all the allowances of a brigadier general, shall continue for four years more as a temporary brigadier general." That is the effect of this amendment. Those officers now occupying these positions shall continue for four years more as temporary brigadier generals. Now, gentlemen of the House, do you consider that fair to the rest of the Army? Will that improve the morale of the officers of the Army, who are already dissatisfied in the belief that rank favoritism has been practiced in many instances in the matter of promotions? The Military Committee ought to bring in a bill that does not seek to take care of individuals. The committee ought to draft a measure that has at heart not the individual welfare of any particular officer of the Army, but it ought to be based on the welfare of the whole Army and the welfare of the people of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from California has admitted that the purpose of his amendment is to take care of certain officers in the War Department who have had an opportunity all through the war of coming before the Military Committee. Officers of the Army are gentlemen, officers of the Army are courteous, and when they come in contact with the Military Committee day after day for four long years they are able to impress the committee with the fact that they are men of ability, of pleasing personality, and so forth. But I want to say to the gentleman from California that if some of the officers out yonder in the posts, if they had had the same opportunity of appearing before the committee day after day and week after week, might also have impressed the committee with their qualifications and their ability. Whenever you single officers out by law and say that they shall be promoted over other officers, you are saying that which the Congress of the United States ought not to say, and you are saying that which will be destructive of the morale of the Army.

Now, I want to call the attention of the committee to one other thing. Listen to this language on page 8:

> Upon the retirement of any officer who has served as chief or assistant to the chief of any branch, unless in the meantime he shall have been promoted to a higher grade, he shall receive the rank and retired pay of the grade which he held as such chief or assistant.

There is another inequality. Here is a major of the Regular Army who has temporary rank of brigadier general and you appoint him, under the terms of the amendment of the gentleman from California, as assistant chief of staff or assistant chief of a bureau. That temporary assignment carries with it the rank of brigadier general, while officers who are his seniors—colonels and lieutenant colonels—who have been his seniors in service and in time, are still colonels. What do you do? You not only give him the temporary rank with increased pay, but when he comes to retire, no matter if it may be 20 years from that time, he does not retire like the ordinary colonel, who was out in the camp at work, but he retires with the rank of a brigadier general, because that was the rank which was attached to his temporary assignment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has entirely misinterpreted this proposed amendment. The Senate bill—the Wadsworth bill—has a provision which makes officers eligible who are majors. It was thought by the Military Committee of the House that that opened the door too wide for selections down here by the staff, and so it was determined to make the rank that of colonel; but obviously it worked a great injustice to those men who had rendered very efficient service and who are now rendering efficient service but who have not the necessary rank.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will it work any great injustice to these gentlemen to be demoted to their prior rank——

Mr. HARRISON. It is not a question of demotion or appointment; it is putting them on an eligible list. Here is an officer who during the whole war and at the present time has discharged distinguished services in this rank and in this position. Here comes a statute which would make him ineligible. We are simply providing that in cases of that sort he can go on the eligible list. Why make a man ineligible who is discharging his duty in that position and doing efficient work?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Several of these officers saw service in Europe, did they not?

Mr. HARRISON. Sure.

Mr. KAHN. So they were not here in the War Department.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman from California tell us who these men are that saw service in Europe? Tell us who they are; I think it is due to the House. The gentleman has in mind somebody. Will he tell us who these men are?

Mr. HARRISON. For my part, I do not know to whom the statute does apply, except in one or two instances, where men have faithfully done the work and have done efficient work in this position, and they should be permitted to be on the eligible list. It is up to the President, who selects them, after all. It seems to me to be wholly unjust for a statute to make a person disqualified—ineligible—for appointment who discharged every duty that was placed upon him and is now discharging most effective and efficient work.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under the terms of this bill, would these heads of divisions be required to be reappointed right away, or will they fill out the term for which they were appointed?

Mr. HARRISON. My understanding is that they would have to be appointed. I may be mistaken. My understanding is that the bill makes an eligible list, and in order not to give too wide a field to the appointing power to select favorites, we have required that the officers who may be appointed to this work should have attained a certain rank.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The bill says "hereafter appointed." Take the Construction Division; that is the division of which Gen. Marshall is the head?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If that should be continued, would Gen. Marshall have to be reappointed, or would he serve out the term for which he was appointed?

Mr. HARRISON. No; my understanding is that when the bill goes into effect he would be demoted.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I understand Gen. Marshall has a temporay rank of brigadier general until the 1st of July. When this bill goes into effect he will lose his temporary rank and then would not be eligible.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It being a division not authorized by law beyond the time of the declaration of peace.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; he will go out of office when this bill passes.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield? The purpose of the bill is then to fix it so that Gen. Marshall shall continue in his position?

Mr. HARRISON. It is to enable faithful and efficient officers to be put on the eligible list.

Now, this is not in the interest of Gen. Marshall or any other officer; I think it is in the interest of the Army——

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Let me finish the sentence. I say it is in the interest of the Army that we shall retain in the position the men now holding those positions who have shown themselves specially adapted and qualified for the work.

Mr. LITTLE. Was the gentleman from New York mistaken in his statement? The gentleman from Virginia said it was not the purpose of the bill to take care of Gen. Marshall, and the gentleman from New York said it was.

Mr. HARRISON. I said it is not to take care of anybody. Reference has been made to Gen. Marshall as being affected to some extent by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman from Virginia think out of the 500 colonels provided for in this bill there could be found a sufficient number of men of that rank of proper qualifications to fill these appointments?

Mr. HARRISON. I think they could be found. But is there any reason on the face of the earth that a man should not be eligible who is shown to be efficient? [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman know what Gen. Marshall's permanent rank is?

Mr. HARRISON. He is a major.

Mr. DENT. Does not the gentleman think that it would be better to have a provision making majors eligible instead of singling out individuals?

Mr. HARRISON. That is the proposition I originally submitted on my part to bring this bill into harmony with the Senate bill, reducing the rank to major. There is no trouble about that. But, as I said, the committee thought it was giving too great a latitude to the General Staff to select, or rather too wide a field from which to select, and therefore they retained the provision that the man must have the rank of colonel, but at the same time they introduced this provision not in the interest of Gen. Marshall or in the interest of any other officer but in the interest of efficient service in the Army. An officer in the Army who is in a great position like that of the head of the Construction Corps, expending millions of dollars every year, who has discharged his duty efficiently, who has shown a special capacity for that sort of work, who could command a very much larger salary in private life than by retaining his position as an officer of the Army, why, at least make him eligible to be there, and that is the only proposition that this amendment involves. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FRENCH. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman from Texas seems to think that the amendment offered by Mr. KAHN, the chairman of the committee, refers especially or only to a few officers who were granted high rank and who were in this country. Now, I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I do not know how many officers would be affected, but it just happens that I know of one man who was overseas for two and a half years and who is now a lieutenant colonel in the Regular Army, but who attained the rank of brigadier general and was at the head of the Chemical Warfare Service overseas—Lieut. Col. Amos A. Fries. Col. Fries would be ineligible to continue in that work unless the amendment of the gentleman from California shall prevail.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Everybody recognizes the work that Gen. Fries did during the war, and everybody who has followed the subject in the War Department or outside of it recognizes him as one of the greatest authorities in the world upon the Chemical Warfare Service, and unless the amendment of the gentleman from California should be adopted it would prevent the department from even considering Lieut. Col. Fries for a continuation of his work.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is he at present an assistant chief in some department?

Mr. FRENCH. Since the war closed. He was overseas for two and a half years——

Mr. CONNALLY. But he is at present assistant chief or chief of a division?

Mr. FRENCH. He now is continuing the work, and is transferred, of course, to the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. But is he an assistant chief?

Mr. FRENCH. Surely.

Mr. CONNALLY. Of course, he is eligible.

Mr. FRENCH. No; I think not, unless the Kahn amendment shall prevail. I do not have any list of those who would be affected by this amendment and I simply cite Lieut. Col. Fries as one who had a service of over two and a half years overseas, a strenuous service, in which this officer rendered as capable and efficient work as any officer in the Army during the recent war. My point is the department should be in position to utilize his services.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. My question is: If this does not pass he will be in the same fix as other officers who won promotions on the battle field and came back and were immediately demoted by gentlemen in the department? Is that right? Would he be in that fix?

Mr. FRENCH. He would be in the position of a man who overseas attained the rank of brigadier general during the war but who since the close has dropped back to lieutenant colonel, and who under the language of the bill as it was originally reported would not be eligible to be considered.

Mr. LITTLE. Is he not in the same position as men who won their promotions on the battle fields of the Argonne and elsewhere and had them taken away as soon as they got back here by these very men in the department, who never fired a shot?

Mr. FRENCH. Surely. They are all alike.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, let him. I do not care.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, this situation arose by reason of the fact that we had no trained personnel——

Mr. LITTLE. Were not all of those in the Regular Army trained personnel when the war began? What did they do all these years when they were supposed to be educated?

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will content himself long enough to let me finish the sentence, he will understand what I am talking about. We had no trained personnel in the particularly technical branches of the service which were high enough in rank if we took them from the top of the list, because the men who had reached the grade of colonel under the system that has been pursued in the past had not the technical or business training, and no such were available who did have technical and business training such as the officer referred to by the gentleman a few moments ago, and Gen. Marshall had.

We had to go below the grade of colonel to get these men; they were put into these responsible positions, and because of their particular fitness for the positions they made good, and now because of the great training they had in the positions they were placed in during the war they are the best fitted men in the Army for these places. It is not a question of personal preferment for these men, but it would not be fair to the Government if you denied to the President of the United States the power to appoint them if he could not find any better in the Army. And the proposition here is whether or not the President shall have the power to appoint these officers who have had special training and had this peculiar experience during the war to carry out this technical branch of the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 19, after the word "served" insert the words "not less than one year."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KAHN. Is the gentleman opposed to the amendment?

Mr. HULINGS. I oppose the amendment for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. It seems to me that this language—

Upon the retirement of any officer who has served as chief or assistant to the chief of any branch * * * shall receive the rank and retired pay of the grade which he held as such chief or assistant.

Looks as though it was a fix-up to take care of some particular officer. And it seems to me if that language should be changed so that it would read like this:

Upon the retirement of any officer he shall receive the rank and retired pay of the highest grade which he held in the service.

That would take care of all of them. And I would like to ask the gentleman if there would be any objection, since you are taking care of some of them, to taking care of all?

Mr. KAHN. In reply to the gentleman, I want to call his attention to the fact that that language is the law now. We did not change the law as it exists in the Army reorganization act of 1901, I believe, and the amendment that I have offered limits the service to at least one year. It helps the provision as it now stands in the law.

Mr. HULINGS. Well, I do not see why if this is the law now, you have offered an amendment at all, or why it should be recited in this proposed amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Well, it was necessary in framing the proposed amendment to the national defense act to retain some of the provisions of existing law in framing the new section, and the committee has simply done that very thing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I am under the impression, though I am not certain about it, that the law does not now retire an assistant chief at the grade which he reached as assistant chief. If any member of the Military Committee knows whether that is the case or not, I will be glad to yield for an answer.

Mr. KAHN. I will try to find the section.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It does not apply to assistant chiefs.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was under that impression. Personally I am not in favor of the provision of the bill at all. I can see no reason why, because a man has been selected as chief of a division and given special preferment during his term, gets higher pay and rank during the time that he performs the duty, thereby receiving a benefit over the others of the same lineal line with him, when he retires he should be given still further preferment. [Applause.] There is not any one of these officers in the Army who would not prefer to be appointed chief of a division for four years and receive the extra pay and rank while he served. That gives him a preference over his fellow officers. Why should that preference be continued when he goes to retire?

The whole retirement business in the Army sometimes makes me feel sick and discouraged. I admire the fighting qualities of the officers of the Army; I admire their skill; I admire their economy when they practice it; I admire their whole work in the Army; but I get absolutely disgusted at times with the selfishness which actuates most of them in regard to matters which relate to their personal convenience, their habits, or their pay. We give preference to the Army and Navy over all other people by a retirement provision. Everywhere they want to get something better. They want more pay as retired officers. They want to be retired at higher rank. Great guns! there is no one in this House who would not be mighty glad if he could be retired at one-half the pay of a Member of Congress, much less three-quarters pay and emoluments; yet the Army officers always want more than the law provides. We never propose to retire anybody else on the same basis of pay as we retire the Regular Army and Navy officers, and those officers are never satisfied. If I had my way about it, I would keep a retired list of the Army. I would retire them upon a reasonable basis, but I never would give a preference to a man who happened to have a better thing while he lived than his fellow officers, and continue that as long as he lived after he retired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last 10 words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I very seldom find it necessary to take issue with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He suggests he does not particularly care to see a man who has had a nice job down here, and sitting around the department, given a preference in retirement over a man who has not. He fails to grasp the entire situation. Now, the man in the line gets a chance to go and fight. The man in the department does not. You should equalize them by giving the officer in the department something to compensate him for his lack of opportunity. The man in the line only must go out and fight. It is the business of the staff officer to do the more responsible duty of telling him how to do it. You know Gen. March tells us a mere soldier fighting does not have a responsible job like a staff officer in Washington. The man in the line escapes that responsibility. All he has to do is to go out and take the chance of getting killed. The staff officer here does not have that chance, or if so, only occasionally, if he is down here in the department. The man in the line also gets the chance of getting his name in the papers as a hero, as a fighter for his country. All that the man in the department gets is a promotion or perhaps a distinguished service medal. The officer in the line gets the chance of promotion by fighting on the field. The officer on the staff does not get that chance. The man on the line has the splendid opportunity of dying on the field of battle for his country—a chance which the fellow down here in the department does not get. Perhaps some day there will be a dispatch in the newspapers telling how the man in the line had a splendid chance, and took it, and died in battle. The other fellow had no such chance. The widow and the children of the man in the line some day may be able to point with pride to a splendid monument on which is inscribed the list of the battles in which the husband and father fought in behalf of his country. The dependents of the other officer do not have that opportunity. You must take that into consideration in trying to make the thing equal by giving the staff officer more promotions, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois. That is the theory of this provision of this bill.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the sarcasm of the gentleman from Kansas, I think this is hardly the place to indulge in anything of that kind. The purpose of this provision in the law is simply this, to give the men who, during the past war, have efficiently served at the head of these different departments the rank on retirement, provided they have not reached that rank already, that they held during the war.

Here is what happened: Instead of being led to believe, as some gentlemen have been led to believe, that the officers of the Army are seeking these staff appointments, the exact reverse of that occurred during this war, and it was practically impossible, even with pleas and commands at times, to keep the men here in the higher ranks of the Army away from their troops, with the chance of winning added laurels and promotion, and to keep them at this routine drudgery work, so essential in the preparation for the great conflict in which we were engaged. These men, had they been allowed to go on the line, to go onto the field of battle, would have won, many of them, higher rank than the rank they had in the department. But they were placed there, with no chance of promotion, and it is only fair for us to recognize the fact that these men at the head of the different departments served our country as well and faithfully in keeping our Army in the field and keeping it organized to a fine point of efficiency, as much so as the men who were at the front and who, when they were at the front, were doing the very work which these men here all wanted to do.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Is it not a fact that these men of the staff corps were just as important in the Army as the men in the front line?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. And could the men in the front line have successfully attended to their duties if the men in the Staff Corps had fallen down on theirs?

Mr. CRAGO. Of course they could not; and the men at the head of the Service of Supplies in France had their work to do, just as important as the men in the front.

Mr. LITTLE. The men in the staff are just as important as the boys who work in the factories?

Mr. CRAGO. That may be the gentleman's conception, but I do not think that would go with the people who know what happened.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman think it was a little unkind on his part to accuse me of sarcasm and then tell us that these gentlemen could have won greater distinction and got more promotions on the field of battle than they did here? I think that it was a little unkind to indulge in sarcasm at my expense in that way.

Mr. CRAGO. If the gentleman had followed the testimony not only of the heads of departments but the civilians in the departments he would have known that at the beginning of the war it was almost impossible to make our Army function because these men in the staff departments were so anxious to get back to their troops that it was difficult to prevail on them to stay in these departments, and the men who remained in the departments did so at the most urgent requests of their superior officers.

Mr. LITTLE. How does it happen that the distinguished gentleman who has been in the Army for 45 years and was never under fire in his life was promoted to so high a place as we read a few days ago?

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman is probably influenced in the opinions he entertains by the fact that he served in the Army, as I did, at a time when we did not have men at the head of these departments who could cause them to properly function and because we did not have them then properly conducting these departments, so that our Army could be properly supplied and equipped; naturally those of us who saw service during these times had a biased opinion of the men in these departments. It was to avoid these very failures that competent officers were urged to remain in these departments and thus give up their natural desire to return to their organizations and see active service at the front.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want, Mr. Chairman, to make only one suggestion. I think if we search the law we will find that the only way for an Army officer to get a rank except in the regular way through seniority in the lineal list is through the machinery invoked by the selective power of the President. If a general rank is to be given to the men who have tactical command of tactical units for line operations, it does not fall to men in the staff corps. Their hope of attaining, as the ultimate prospect of a long and ambitious service in the Army, this same enviable rank, must be based on some statutory provision relating to the branch or corps in which they served, even if they served temporarily, because men who are quartermasters can not hope to come out as brigadiers in command of tactical units in the field.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Does not the gentleman know that one of the most distinguished generals in France was a quartermaster up to that time?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Those were the war-time temporary ranks that the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. LITTLE. That was at the time of the Spanish-American war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We have learned something a little later.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Some of us have.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes. The man in the staff corps enters the service in the Army with the same reasonable hope—and it ought to be encouraged—that if he applies himself ambitiously and intelligently and energetically to the service as well as the officer of the line, they may both come out on something like equality in the realization of their ambitions. But the odds favor the line officer in the matter of promotion to general rank. The staff officer must get his general rank from the administration of his staff corps, and it is only fair, when he retires, no matter what his place may be on the lineal list as a permanent officer, that he should have the same chance of preferment as his brother who served over in the line.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Are there not two more committee amendments pending?

Mr. KAHN. No. I think they have all been offered and acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. There is none on the desk except that of the gentleman from Texas. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 8, line 18, after the word "arms," strike out the balance of the line all down to and including the word "assistant" in line 23.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not offer this amendment in any hope inspired by the disposition of the committee toward other amendments that it will be adopted, but I do desire this committee to go on record on this flat-footed proposition as to whether or not it is in favor of a major who may be temporarily detailed as an assistant chief or chief of a branch or bureau for a length of time as short as one year, and who then goes back to his rank of major in the Regular Army, being retired as a brigadier general, when a man who is his senior in service and senior in rank can not be so retired. I thoroughly and heartily agree with the gentleman from Illinois in the argument which he made on that proposition. He stated it much better than I could; but I want to say that it is the duty of this committee to be absolutely impartial between the staff and the line. I do not make any strictures against the gentlemen who served here in the departments. I realize that their duties were just as important and that those duties had to be performed just as well as service in the field. I realize that many of them would have much preferred to seek fame on the battle field than to perform the irksome and less glorious duties which were assigned to them in the department. But, gentlemen of the House, that period has gone. This bill is legislating for times of peace. Now, I am not in favor of saying that a man who was fortunate enough to be temporarily raised above his regular rank, and who enjoyed four years of life as a brigadier general or a major general, with all of the emoluments connected with that office, shall be retired with the rank and emoluments of his temporary promotion which he enjoyed, in preference to his brother officer in the line who still retains his lower rank. That is favoritism. I want to say to you, gentlemen of the House, that the matter of promotions in the Regular Army is, of course, one of great interest to those gentlemen. They are all interested in it, and nothing could be more harmful to the morale of the officers of the Army than for this House to make distinctions and discriminations as it is doing in the provisions of this bill as written by the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I should like to state to the gentleman that no line officer has made any complaint to the committee in regard to this legislation, and if it did the line officers any injustice, it seems to me they would have been sure to complain.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to say to the gentleman that the line officers are not permitted to go before his committee and are afraid to go before it. One of the Army regulations prohibits an Army officer, without the consent of higher authority, to seek in any way to improve his condition or to do anything that affects his rank.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRAGO. Does the gentleman realize that in these different staff corps the promotion is limited? It is fixed, and very few officers——

Mr. CONNALLY. How is it fixed?

Mr. CRAGO. It is fixed by law.

Mr. CONNALLY. How?

Mr. CRAGO. By the number. One brigadier general, for instance, in a certain class, or one major general.

Mr. CONNALLY. Ah——

Mr. CRAGO. Just a moment, until the gentleman gets the idea. This provision is only an attempt to equalize the rank of the men in these staff corps with the rank of the men in the line. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] says, the men in the line have no objection to this, and if it kept them back they would have objection to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not authorized to say that the gentleman from Illinois said that the officers of the line have no objection to this. The gentleman from Illinois said that the officers of the line had not made objection. I understand the provision about which the gentleman speaks, but by this bill you do away with that distinction. You do not limit the number of colonels in any one branch of the Army. You make one lineal list, so far as promotions are concerned, and when the time comes a man in the line or in the staff will receive his promotion.

Mr. CRAGO. That will be true when we once establish this system.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania certainly expects this bill to pass?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. And I am addressing myself to this bill.

Mr. CRAGO. But the gentleman is providing for something that has already gone by. The men in the line have had their chance, and under the reorganization provided for in this bill will have advances in rank. The majors will be lieutenant colonels, and the lieutenant colonels will be colonels, and so forth.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly they will.

Mr. CRAGO. This is the only way that the matter can be equalized——

Mr. CONNALLY. Do not take up all my time. I understand the point the gentleman from Pennsylvania is trying to make. In this very bill you seek to equalize promotions amongst all grades in the Army, to give the line and the staff the same chance of becoming a general officer, do you not?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If you do that, then you ought not to go further and make a preference in favor of the man who may have temporarily held a staff position.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like just one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAGO. I hope the gentleman may have five minutes. I should like to read the provision of the present law, which is as follows:

Any officer now holding office in any corps or department who shall hereafter serve as chief of a staff corps or department and shall subsequently be retired, shall be retired with the rank, pay, and allowances authorized by law for the retirement of such corps or division chief.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I assumed that everybody knew that. I was not trying to claim it was not the law, but the fact that it is existing law does not necessarily make it right.

You are now seeking to change existing law by this bill, and I do not know of any particular section of existing law that is so sacred that this Congress, if it may desire to change it, has not the power. Because these gentlemen during a number of years have had that preference they have no vested right in it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman will notice that the present law does not cover assistant chiefs.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the gentleman from Illinois. Under the present law we do not have as many assistant chiefs of bureaus as the act provides for. The existing law does not authorize the retirement of an assistant chief of a bureau with the rank that he held at the time he was assistant chief of the bureau. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in addition to these objections the present bill gives advanced rank to both chiefs of the bureau and assistant chiefs over that provided by the present law. As I understand it, under the present law The Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, and the Chief of Ordnance are brigadier generals.

Mr. KAHN. Major generals.

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the defense act they are brigadier generals.

Mr. KAHN. My impression is that we made them major generals.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They were major generals under the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and it is permanent law.

Mr. CONNALLY. It was never permanent law until it was put in as an amendment to a war-risk insurance bill, and I am warranted in saying that there were a very small number of Members present who knew that it was in the bill.

Mr. LITTLE. It was in the last line of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. During the war we made them major generals, but they were not allowed any assistants as brigadier generals. In this you make them all major generals, and in some instances you allow them three assistants as brigadier generals, and when they retire they all retire with advanced rank.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is mistaken; under the proposed bill they are not all made major generals. There are several places where they are only brigadiers.

Mr. CONNALLY. The ones I referred to are The Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, and the Chief of Ordnance, and those are all major generals. I mentioned those explicitly.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Do I understand that the gravamen of the discussion is the question of rank of these officers when retired?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there any objection to the fact that men who have held high rank in the war, demoted by the cessation of the war, should not be retired under the rank they had during the war?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the provision applied to all officers who had held advanced rank the gentleman's inquiry would be apt. However, the bill only applies to those who served as chiefs or assistant chiefs of bureaus. But men who were major generals in France and are demoted on their return to grade of colonel will not be benefited. The only gentlemen benefited by this provision are the gentlemen who may be detailed as chief or assistant chief of a bureau or branch. This bill greatly increases the number of officers. It increases their rank. It provides for a lot of major generals to command divisions which will never be mobilized. It provides for brigadier generals to command brigades which will never be brought together in peace time. If this bill provided for brigadier generals and major generals, not to command paper divisions but detailed to some staff department, required to do real work, that would not be so objectionable. The result of the bill will probably be to provide promotion for a lot of old worn-out major generals to sit around in the various territorial departmental commands and theoretical tactical commands as division and brigade commanders, with nothing on earth to do—warming benches, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota. I am rather surprised that the gentleman from Minnesota has departed from his usual duties as whip on that side, because the way the vote has been going to-day it indicates that the silent arm of the steering committee has been placed on the military shoulder of the gentleman from California, and he has been given the signal to hard boil this bill and ram it through. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct the gentleman from Texas in one particular. The instruction to those who are voting on the bill comes from the military department and not from the steering committee.

Mr. BEE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BEE. How did the steering committee happen for the time to abdicate its power over gentlemen on that side?

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman is speaking for the steering committee, all right. I will say that they have not been around me. Now, there is one feature of this bill, Mr. Chairman, which accentuates and emphasizes the injustice of what is being done. Suppose there are two majors and one goes into the staff and works his way up to a brigadier general and is appointed to a staff position. Suppose the other goes across the seas and fights his way up to a brigadier general.

The fellow from Europe comes home and the fellow over in the department promptly demotes him, and he is just a major again, and that fixes him. Now, you are endeavoring to pass a bill fixing permanently the temporary promotion of a fellow on the staff, maintain him there, and that is the injustice in this kind of legislation. If we provided that the fellow who went to Europe and fought for his temporary rank should keep it, that would be more equitable, but this merely provides a way in which the fellow who got a temporary promotion by staying in Washington, and perhaps did good work, is taken care of. If you will arrange it so that the men who were demoted from brigadiers or colonels, or the like, from the positions that they won by fighting, I will cheerfully vote for it and I would vote to give the other fellows permanent rank in order to give it to those boys. But, gentlemen, if you will not do it, if you will not give promotion to the man who won his high rank in battle, do not come here and vote to give permanent rank to some fellow who won his by sitting down here and chewing his thumb. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill does not just take care of the men who were here in Washington during the war; that there has been an honest and conscientious effort to take care of those men who earned high rank on the other side of the ocean. On page 64 of the bill there is a provision to take care of the combatant officer who had earned his high rank at the time that he retired, so it is not a one-sided affair at all. It is only fair to the man who earned his preferment that he be given recognition for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY) there were—ayes 31, noes 32.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. CONNALLY and Mr. KAHN) reported that there were—ayes 49, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page, 6, line 2, after the word "warrants" insert: "Provided further, That former noncommissioned officers who had already retired and who were called to active service between the dates of April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and commissioned in the Army and who have again reverted or will revert to a retired status when their services are no longer required, shall be placed on the status of warrant officer and receive the benefits of this act in so far as retired pay is concerned."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, if the point of order is going to be sustained on this matter, I have no desire to take up the time of the committee in talking about a thing that is not going to be acted upon, but I can not quite understand how a point of order would lie against the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. It provides for the retirement of officers, as I caught the reading of the amendment, and the bill is not a retirement bill.

Mr. KEARNS. It is a bill for the reorganization of the Army, and it provides for the pay of retired officers when any of these officers are retired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state just what his point of order is?

Mr. KAHN. It is not germane, as I caught the reading of the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. May we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for just a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. The question is as to the germaneness to the bill of this proposition. I turn to the next page and find that we have been discussing the question of what would happen upon the retirement of any officer who served as chief or assistant, the bill having that in it.

Mr. KEARNS. That is a Regular Army officer, however.

Mr. LITTLE. I turn to the amendment on the page before, and I find it was an amendment offered about the retiring of some other officer. If a part of the bill is germane to the question of retirement, any amendment involving the question of retirement is germane. That is all there is of it, and there is no question of a point of order at all, and I am surprised the gentleman should offer it.

Mr. KAHN. When I first heard the reading of the amendment——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section to which it is introduced.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, that is better.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in this section with reference to officers on the retired list. How can it be held an amendment relating to the pay of officers on the retired list is germane to a provision that does not in any other respect relate to officers on the retired list at all?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he notices on page 5, near the bottom of the page, there is a reference to the question of retirement?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; but that is in reference to officers on the active list; but the amendment relates wholly to officers now on the retired list, and there is no provision in the section at all relating to officers on the retired list. One relates to the proposition of putting men now on the active list on the retired list, and the other relates to the pay of officers who are on the retired list. There is no relation between the two.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will yield for a question, as I understand the existing law on the argument that preceded this there is no existing law creating the position of warrant officers in the Army, so this is entirely new legislation on the entire subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio wish to be heard in opposition?

Mr. KEARNS. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to find anything in that portion of the bill to which the gentleman's amendment is offered to which this would be germane and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer that as a new section. On page 6, at the end of section 4 (a), insert this as 4½ (a)—a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEARNS: Page 6, line 2, add a new section to be known as section "4½ (a)":

"Provided further, That former noncommissioned officers who had already retired and were recalled to active service between the dates of April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and commissioned in the Army, and who have again reverted or will again revert to a retired status when their services are no longer required, shall be placed on the status of warrant officer and receive the benefits of this act in so far as retired pay is concerned."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. If the gentleman desires to offer that amendment, it may be that it would be in order in the last section of the bill, which contains various legislative provisions, but it is not in order in this place in the bill.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I am not attempting by this amendment at this time to amend any section. It is entirely a new section.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As it is reported it is an amendment to this section and comes right in the middle of it.

Mr. KEARNS. It comes in as an entirely new section.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Even then, it would not be in order at this place in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers a subsection to this bill. The gentleman does not offer it as a section as a whole, because this section has not been completed and it would not be in order to offer it. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 4, line 14, after the word "Department" insert "the Transportation Service."

Mr. CALDWELL. I offer that as a part of the amendment that is to come in order to be consistent with the amendment that I have offered.

Mr. KAHN. May we have the amendment again reported? There is so much confusion on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have already stated that I offered that as a part of the amendment that is to come creating an extra transport service.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is not that substantially the amendment the House voted on a short time ago?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes. And most of the men here now are not men who were here then. They have just come in, and I want to see how we stand now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKENZIE: Page 6, line 2, after the word "warrant," insert: "Provided further, Warrant officers shall not be entitled to promotion."

Mr. McKENZIE. The purpose of the amendment is simply to make the language clear to carry out the purposes of the committee.

Mr. BEE. I desire to ask the committee whether or not there is a good deal of danger in a provision that seeks to create a set of men with the emoluments of second lieutenant and at the same time not giving them a commission and authorizing the Secretary of War to make the appointment? As I understand the law all commissioned officers are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. I have no objection as to these noncommissioned officers who have rendered faithful service receiving this reward, but it occurs to me that it might be construed as an evasion of the law and is in danger of being so construed. You say that noncommissioned officers shall be made to draw the basic pay of a second lieutenant, with the emoluments, and shall be retired with that pay, and add the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, if I may suggest as an additional vice, to the proposition, by saying to these men in the Army of the United States that they shall receive no promotion by act of Congress. No matter what they may do, no matter what distinguished and meritorious service they may render, a commissioned officer of the Army takes his promotion in turn, and a noncommissioned officer of the Army takes his promotion in turn; but a warrant officer, created by this section, without commission, assigned to duty as a noncommissioned officer, draws almost a commissioned officer's pay, and is stopped at the threshold of meritorious service by being notified that he can not receive a promotion and that Congress does not propose to let him have such promotion.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. I do.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not think the gentleman means to insist that the warrant officer is getting a commissioned officer's pay.

Mr. BEE. The warrant officer receives the base pay of $1,320 a year and the allowances of a second lieutenant.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know. But the only point about that I think is this, that the base pay is not the commissioned officer's pay. The lowest commissioned officer's pay is that of a second lieutenant, $1,700.

Mr. BEE. I understand that.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is the only way of describing the kind of allowance these men get; not a money allowance, but heat and light and quarters, which under certain circumstances are commuted to him. He is assigned to quarters just as are commissioned officers.

Mr. BEE. I understand that. I am not going to object to the section, but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that they are treading on very dangerous ground when they seek to select from noncommissioned officers who have been made lieutenants by order of the Secretary of War, and afterwards who shall become warrant officers with basic pay with a second lieutenant's allowances, and then provide by act of Congress that they shall not be entitled to promotion. In other words, suppose a noncommissioned officer is made a warrant officer under this law. No matter what he might do, if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is accepted he can never stand an examination that will make him a second lieutenant.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can quite concede that the gentleman has good grounds for apprehension, because it might unwisely close the door——

Mr. BEE. And here is another question that I would like the committee to answer. Upon what system of report, upon what system of service, is the Secretary of War authorized to select the noncommissioned officers who shall become warrant officers? I submit again to my friend that we are treading upon very dangerous ground in the question of the legality of a provision of this kind, and one that ought to be given very careful consideration.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think my friend will find that the first suggestion as to the desirability of having the grade of warrant officer at all was made in order to take care of a certain class of splendid old-time noncommissioned officers.

Mr. BEE. I am in favor of the proposition.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Men who could not hope ever to be able to prepare themselves subsequently by educational qualifications to become commissioned officers.

Mr. BEE. I am in favor of that, but I would stop right there.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We are trying to stop there. We had an experience some time ago when we took up the question of veteran pay clerks, men who had been in the service a long time, and somebody suggested: "If we can only create a halfway place for them, that will be the end of it, and it will serve as a reward for faithful service of a limited capacity in a certain grade. The men will be satisfied." But as soon as they had become accustomed to the fit of the new suit they came in here with as nice a lot of propaganda as you ever saw and began to agitate for an opportunity to acquire a higher grade.

Mr. BEE. I anticipate that the Comptroller of the Treasury, when called upon to pass upon that section of this bill, as written, especially if the provision of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] is included, will hold that it is an evasion of the law, conflicting with the right of the President of the United States to make appointments, and putting a discretion in the hands of the Secretary of War not authorized by law, because you are giving the allowance of a lieutenant in the provision made here.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know; but the allowance of a lieutenant will reduce this at once to the same measure, whether you call it by any other name. A lieutenant gets two rooms, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. BEE. Yes. I know what the allowance is.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You do not want anybody to get less than that, and if you called it, not the allowance of the lieutenant, but just said that this man shall have two rooms, it would not be objectionable?

Mr. BEE. No.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, that is the only part of his business that seems to resemble that of any other grade. The pay is not the same. He is only a medium between a noncommissioned and a commissioned officer, and may therefore be appointed by a power which is inherent in a lesser authority than the President.

Mr. BEE. I am not opposed to the proposition itself. I am anxious to see these men who have rendered meritorious service rewarded, but I do not want them to be put in the position of having "the word of promise given them to the ear and broken to the hope" by having them appointed in between the commissioned and noncommissioned officers and ultimately to find themselves without any status at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We have warrant officers already in the Army to-day, but not of this class.

Mr. BEE. Then that is not a new provision?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I want to get a little information if I can. The amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. MCKENZIE], as I understood it, would forbid the President from nominating any warrant officer to second lieutenant.

Mr. MCKENZIE. That was not my purpose. I do not so understand it. My purpose——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know; but that is what it says, that they shall not be promoted. I suppose my colleague had in mind the idea that they should not be automatically promoted. Now, may I ask my colleague what was the point he wanted to cover?

Mr. MCKENZIE. If my colleague will notice, the bill provides that these warrant officers shall take rank next below second lieutenant, and shall rank among themselves according to their length of service or their age.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Now, as to all the other commissioned officers in the Army, they take position on the single list, or will if this bill becomes a law.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the commissioned officers?

Mr. MCKENZIE. Yes. It was never the intention of the committee that warrant officers should be considered in the same class as the regular commissioned officers in the service, and my purpose was to have the language so plain that hereafter the question could never come up that a man by simply being a warrant officer could be considered entitled to move up and fill a vacancy in the grade of second lieutenant.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I should hope that it was plain enough as it stands, but my experience has been that nobody can tell how the law will be construed. It is not certainly the intention of my colleague to prevent a live young man going in as an enlisted man, or a young man who was in the war working his way up to be a warrant officer, with the expectation and ambition to become a commissioned officer in the Army?

Mr. MCKENZIE. No.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am afraid the language would prevent that.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] this question: He speaks of the rank being immediately below that of a second lieutenant. What is to be the position of a warrant officer with respect to a sergeant major? Has the sergeant major got to get out of the warrant officer's road when he meets him on the street, or has the warrant officer to get out of the road of the sergeant major? [Laughter.]

Mr. MCKENZIE. That would depend on the size of the major. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He would have to keep out of the major's way.

Mr. BEE. Will the warrant officer make the major get out of his way and salute him when he meets him in the road?

Mr. MCKENZIE. I think not. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois. I am sure the House will give him all the time he wants. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE], in the time of the gentleman from Illinois, that these warrant officers first came into the Army when we took over the mine planter's service, and they have done good work in the mine planter's service, similar to the work of the warrant officers in the Navy. The idea is to use these men in the technical branches of the Army, just as the Navy uses the same character of men in the technical branches of the Navy. The warrant officer will be between the "noncom" and the commissioned officers, in a rank by himself.

Mr. BEE. But he will get out of the way of a sergeant major if he meets him on the road?

Mr. CALDWELL. If the sergeant major is a better man, the warrant officer will probably get out of his way.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I am much impressed with the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois as to the phraseology of the amendment offered by his colleague from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE]. It will be noticed from the language of section 4a that it is possible for a young man to be appointed as a warrant officer who is only 28 years of age.

The presumption is that these men are entitled to this preferred status here created by this section because of meritorious service or efficiency of some unusual sort. But when a man has served in the Army for 10 years, as this bill provides he must have served in order to become a warrant officer, the natural presumption is that he has made Army service, in a large measure, his life work and his profession, and it seems to me a little unfair to a man of that type and of that efficiency to say that for all time the door of hope of securing a commission in the Army as a first or second lieutenant is forever barred to him. It seems to me the gentleman from Illinois ought to change the language of his amendment so that it will not present an absolute estoppel to that man, to prevent his securing a commission in any instance, either by examination or presidential appointment, but the gentleman ought to limit it so as to carry out his evident intention, which is that that man shall not be promoted by virtue of the fact alone that he is in the class of warrant officers. I hope the gentleman will give heed to that suggestion.

Mr. McKENZIE. Of course, the gentleman from Alabama will understand that it was not my purpose to put any handicap in the way of any American citizen, and it was not my purpose to prevent any of these young men from hereafter getting commissions, but I wanted it distinctly understood that in framing the single list for the promotion of Regular Army officers warrant clerks should not hold positions on the single list for purposes of promotion. I will say to my good friend that I am perfectly willing to take any language he may suggest, simply to put it in the way that warrant officers shall not have a position on the single list for purposes of promotion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think I understand the gentleman's position thoroughly, but I think the language employed by him in framing the amendment is unfortunate, in that by its terms, according to the ordinary construction of language, it would forever prevent the promotion by any method, either by appointment, examination, or anything else, of these warrant officers.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman from Alabama agree that an amendment simply providing that warrant officers shall not be placed upon the single list would accomplish that purpose?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think so.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment and to offer another amendment to read:

Provided further, That warrant officers shall not be placed upon the commissioned officers' promotion list.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKENZIE: Page 6, line 2, after the word "warrant," insert: "Provided further, That warrant officers shall not be placed upon the commissioned officers' promotion list."

Mr. MILLER. As provided in section 24a of this bill.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the gentleman what is the effect of this amendment; that is, not putting warrant officers upon the officers' promotion list? They would not be considered as on the commissioned officers' promotion list in any event, even if this amendment were not injected into the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. It was not so intended, although the language of the bill says they shall take rank next below second lieutenants.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But, with all due deference, the amendment proposed does not seem to make good sense. The idea of saying that warrant officers shall not be put upon the promotion list of commissioned officers is in itself preposterous. They are not entitled to rank as commissioned officers. Why should there be any question raised about putting them on the promotion list? They do not belong there. If they were on the promotion list they could not get commissions, could they?

Mr. McKENZIE. No; I think not.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then I can not see the purpose of the amendment. I ask that the amendment be passed over without prejudice.

A VOICE. No; let us vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment, on page 4, line 13, to insert the words "the construction service," in the event that an amendment which I shall offer hereafter is agreed to by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that if an amendment to be offered by him hereafter shall be adopted he shall have permission to return to this paragraph to offer a corresponding amendment here. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not that extended likewise to other branches of the service that may be injected?

Mr. SANFORD. I think it should be; and I will reform my request to that effect.

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, if we amend this law so as to incorporate additional corps, I do not think we will have any trouble in returning to this section.

Mr. SANFORD. I think not either, but I would like to preserve that right if the gentleman is agreeable.

Mr. DENT. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENT: That section 4 be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all except the first sentence thereof and inserting in lieu thereof——

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the amendment reads "that section 4." Does not the gentleman mean subsection 4, on page 3?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman means to amend subsection 4 of section 3.

Mr. DENT. It is called section 4, and the other section is called section 4(a). I think I have got it in proper form.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman's amendment to section 4?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Not to the subsection?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman will find these allusions to sections are the words of the text to be substituted, and that we are really on section 3, page 3.

Mr. CALDWELL. What the gentleman is trying to do, I think, is to substitute words for the words contained in line 12, on page 3, which is a subdivision of section 3. I think the Chair will agree with me.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The Clerk will read.

Mr. DENT. There is no question about that. My motion is to offer my substitute for section 4 of section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Beginning on line 12, page 3.

Mr. DENT. Line 12, page 3, to the end of line 2, page 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 4 be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out all except the first sentence thereof and inserting in lieu of the part stricken out the following:

"General officers of the line shall consist of 19 major generals and 44 brigadier generals: Provided, That hereafter in time of peace major generals of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of brigadier generals of the line, and brigadier generals of the line shall be appointed from officers of the grade of colonel in the Regular Army.

"From among the major generals of the line there shall be detailed, subject to the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 2, 1901, a chief of Infantry, a chief of Cavalry, a chief of Field Artillery, and a chief of Coast Artillery Corps, who will report to the executive head of the Army, will serve for a period of four years unless sooner relieved, and will be charged with the tactical efficiency of the branch of which he is chief.

"In order to accomplish the purpose of this act the present Chief of Coast Artillery Corps shall be recommissioned a major general of the line, with rank from the date of his original commission as major general and Chief of Coast Artillery Corps. Thereafter the Chief of Coast Artillery Corps shall not be an additional member of the General Staff.

"The original vacancies created by this act and subsequent casual vacancies in the grade of major general, chief of a staff department or service, and brigadier general, assistant to a chief of staff department or service, shall be filled by appointment from officers of that department or service not below the grade of lieutenant colonel; and the officer so appointed shall hold office for four years, and upon expiration of his appointment, unless reappointed, shall revert to the position which he occupied in his staff department or service by virtue of his permanent commission therein: Provided further, That the chiefs of new services created by this act shall be appointed from officers in the Regular Army not below the rank of lieutenant colonel who are serving or have served in such services: And provided further, That no officer shall be eligible for appointment as assistant to the chief of a staff department or service unless such officer shall have been recommended for such appointment by the chief of the department or service concerned."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, this section provides for the number of officers in different grades, from colonel down to second lieutenant. The object of my amendment is to eliminate that section so as to provide finally in the bill by subsequent amendments that I shall offer for a commissioned strength of something like 14,000 officers instead of 18,000 officers.

The bill as reported by the committee provides for a chief of Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery, as well as Coast Artillery.

I am in favor of that provision in the bill and have incorporated it in this substitute which I have offered.

There is another section in the bill, another provision in my amendment, to which I desire to direct the special attention of the committee. This Congress at the last session made Gen. Pershing commanding general of the Army, giving him the full title of general, but it did not prescribe any duties which he could perform.

From the date that act was passed until this hour Gen. Pershing has been practically without any duties to perform, holding the rank but with nothing to do. If you adopt this amendment you not only reduce the number of officers by something like 4,000 from that provided in the bill reported by the committee, but you give Gen. Pershing a right to supervise the work of these different chiefs of bureaus. In other words, instead of the chief of Infantry and the chief of Artillery and the chief of Cavalry reporting to the Chief of Staff for the purpose of executing their particular branches of the service, they report to Gen. Pershing, the commanding general of the Army, and their functions are performed through him instead of the Chief of Staff.

I call the attention of the committee to that because following this section I propose to offer another amendment, by which I shall undertake to carry out the ideas I have already expressed to the House of limiting the functions and duties of the General Staff strictly to devising and planning for the Army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe if this House could be convinced that you have got something like 100 per cent more field officers than you can find use for, for the size of the Army you are creating, the House will not adopt it. I challenge any man who favors this bill to tell us where in the world you are going to use 300 extra colonels. The trouble with this bill is that it is written all around one proposition that was in the mind of a good friend of mine, an Army officer who belongs to the General Staff, of having a single list. This whole bill has been written around that theory; and every member of the committee who was present when we had the hearings on that subject will admit, and certainly knows, that in order to have this single list you have got to have an extra reservoir of officers. You can not get along without it. Col. Spaulding, who knows more about the subject than any man that appeared before the committee, so stated. You can not fill the vacancies without this extra reservoir of officers.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Where in your amendment is there any provision which provides duties for the general of the Army?

Mr. DENT. It is in that section which provides that there shall be a chief of Infantry, a chief of Cavalry, and a chief of Coast Artillery, who shall report to the executive head of the Army, and that is the commanding general of the Army.

Mr. DEMPSEY. The gentleman does it by indirection. He does not directly provide any duties for the chief of the Army, but provides that certain officers shall report to him.

Mr. DENT. Yes; but I am willing to make it more positive if the gentleman wants to do it.

Mr. Chairman, there is no question on earth that in order to adopt a single list you must have a reservoir of extra officers. I started out in the original preparation of this bill in favor of the principle of a single list, but the more I studied it the more difficult I found it to put into practical operation. When Col. Spaulding first testified before the committee that it was necessary to increase the detached officers' list so as to have a large reservoir of officers in order to carry the single list into effect I became converted to the other side of the proposition. For instance, if the single list is carried out according to its original purpose and a vacancy occurs, either by death or resignation, in the rank of major in the Ordnance Department, the next ranking major on the list, according to the length of his service, may be an officer in the Infantry or in the Cavalry. You could not put that officer into the Ordnance Department and expect him to render efficient service. He may not be familiar with ordnance work. You either have to transfer a man from some other branch of the service to fill the vacancy or leave the vacancy open until some man who is qualified in the Ordnance Department reaches promotion according to the list.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. How many officers are provided for under the present national-defense act of 1916?

Mr. DENT. Eleven thousand four hundred and forty-five, excluding the Philippine Scouts.

Mr. BRIGGS. Then this provides for 60 per cent increase over the present number of officers?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, of course it is obvious to the gentlemen of the committee that the proposition that is submitted by our distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is to carry out the policy he first broached to us in the amendment which we defeated about three hours ago. To be consistent in following the details of the bill throughout he must now bring up this forlorn hope on this other proposition.

There is, of course, at first blush some appearance of argument in favor of the position that this bill is top-heavy in officers. I think, however, if gentlemen will consider the philosophy of the basic military law and the general theory of army organization they will agree, after all, that it is not a top-heavy proposition, so far as the commissioned officers are concerned.

In the first place, we have to remember one thing, that while we call this our Military Establishment, our Regular Army, a permanent establishment as a distinction from the provisional or temporary forces we may raise in time of emergency, the fact is that when we get down to the details of the law the only things that are permanent about it are the basic law upon which it is founded and the commissioned personnel. The commissioned personnel is the only part of the Army that starts out to make a life work of professional military service, and is therefore the only part of the Army that is in the service for life. The enlisted force ebbs and flows in varying strength by individual enlistments for varying periods. The ratio of enlisted men to officers at all times is dependable upon the number of enlisted men that happens to be brought in at the time being set off against the existing number of permanent officers. But there is no true military ratio to be reckoned upon such figures between them and these officers, except those that are attached for distinct tactical purposes to distinct tactical units.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the Army able to maintain its strength at in peace times——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Enlisted men?

Mr. BRIGGS. Enlisted men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is exactly what I suggest. As experienced heretofore, it has been somewhere around 100,000.

Mr. BRIGGS. And this bill is based on the theory of providing 6 officers for every 100 men?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is exactly what I have been trying to suggest several times during the afternoon and again to repeat, that this so-called ratio, which you arrive at mathematically by saying that if you put in 299,000 enlisted men against 17,000 officers it results in 6 officers to 100 men, is not an exact or military ratio at all. In many instances you could probably have much more than 100 men opposed to 6 officers and function properly; in some you might have much less, perhaps.

Mr. BRIGGS. And on that assumption it is correct?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. As it is thus presented it is only a mathematical problem to be worked out on a blackboard. You divide one sum by another and get 6 for a quotient and say that must be the ratio therefor; whereas it is only a quotient. That is not the reason for the 17,000 commissioned officers. You can not fix in a military establishment like ours an arbitrary ratio of commissioned personnel to enlisted strength.

I will give an illustration. In an Infantry company there is a captain and two lieutenants. In a Field Artillery battery, which corresponds to that unit in the other arm, there is a captain and four lieutenants, while the headquarters company at every one of those regiments may be commanded by a captain and first lieutenant, with no second lieutenant at all. You can not establish a ratio from such discrepancies as that, and that is only a glimpse at the conditions.

Mr. CALDWELL. Aviation?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; I was coming to that. Here is a flying machine, for our purposes to represent an artillery fieldpiece and its complement of men to take care of it. Yet that flying machine carries two commissioned officers and nobody else when it is in operation in the air.

Mr. MADDEN. And the Medical Corps.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; and yet right below that airplane there might be a section of field artillery with a 3-inch gun, which will outlast, outwear, and perform generally more hard service than the airplane can hope to, and yet that section is commanded by only a sergeant. You can not make any comparison——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont for five additional minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. I desire to ask whether this officer personnel is not based upon a force of 299,000 men, and if you do not keep your Army organization up to that strength that you are going to have a vastly increased number of officers out of proportion to the number of men whom you have got——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is what I am explaining——

Mr. BRIGGS (continuing). And have some basis for the accusation which the gentleman from Alabama asserted here of having 300 colonels too many?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is exactly what I am endeavoring to get at. If the gentleman will turn to page 4104 in the files of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 9, 1920, yesterday, he will find it set out where it is proposed to distribute the commissioned field officers throughout the service, if such number of officers and the proportion goes through.

Here is one of the things we are trying to do under the philosophy of this bill: To assign as many men as possible to as many tactical units as may be provided of such enlisted strength as we may have and organize such enlisted units, skeletonized if they have to be, into nine divisions; then have in this country constantly at work for training and educational purposes one, two, or three, or as many as we can raise, of these divisions organized, equipped, and operated exactly as we did over on the line in France, run our commissioned personnel of the line and the staff right through that demonstrating machine day in and day out and month in and month out through the years to come to give military training and education to our officers and men.

Now, along with that we are going to send men to the various service schools that have been set up in the Army, through which they must follow continuous courses arranged on a very scientific scheme and schedule, and which, as we hope and expect, will be in a constant state of progressive military education. Because, you see, eventually these men we are starting in as second lieutenants must some day turn out to be men of high field and general rank, the men who are not then going to look after the company drills and administration, but are going to plan battles for us as brigade, division, and corps commanders. And you must have some process for the gradual working up to that responsibility through a system of such tested education and administration as will keep these officers on their feet all the while.

In all this I have said nothing of the demand for Regular Army officers as instructors of the National Guard, of Reserve Officers' Training Corps units at schools and colleges, of various training camps, or in other miscellaneous capacities, all authorized by law at this time, and all taking them away from duty with tactical units of the Regular Army.

Now, here is another phase that comes into it: It is true, of course, that in order to start a man out in any life work anywhere you have got to offer him some reasonable prospect of promotion. He has to expect to get somewhere as the result of his efforts, and the problem as it is involved in this thing is to try to lay out a schedule of grades of commissioned rank in the Army that will serve at least two purposes, one to take care of the garrison, the training, and the domestic police functions which the Army is always expected to perform, and, second, that of preparing its own individual personnel through systems of such administration, experimentation, and training as to be ready to expand to help in the command of that great citizen soldiers' army that must always be raised to meet any great emergency. So we must prepare in peace times for this war service of officers, for, if we have learned one lesson out of this war, it is that hereafter the citizen-soldier armies are not to be raised by the hundreds of thousands but by the millions.

And if we had had more trained Regular officers of experience and maturity to sprinkle out over our millions of citizen-soldiers—not to take entire charge of them, but sprinkled among those millions, the levies that we raised in 1917—and helped to leaven the lump, we would have bettered our training and made speedier progress, and perhaps have avoided some of the melancholy experiences that we did have as it was.

Mr. BEE. As was exemplified in the training camps previous to the war.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If we make the list of commissioned officers so restricted toward the higher ranks that the neck of the bottle will not let out all there is in it in proper flow of promotion, we have defeated all the chances of opportunity for young men in professional military life; and, what is more, we have brought ourselves right back to that place where we used to be when they came in here soliciting special legislation in order to give them a chance for promotion.

One of the reasons why we have made such grades as the captaincy and lower field grades of considerable numbers, outside of exact tactical demands, perhaps, is that we want to open up the door to the lieutenants, so that they can be captains before they are grandfathers. We want a man to be in a responsible grade before he is too old to have any initiative capacity. It is the same old lesson that was learned during the recent war and in every war before it. There are men living to-day who actually served 29 years as first lieutenants. What shape is such a man in to begin to develop for the positions of field command? He is already in middle life and has begun to sit down and crystallize. We want to get these young men up into their first command rank, into captaincies, at an age when they are about ripe and fit, first serving out apprenticeship in the lieutenancies, to mature themselves in the first responsibility of command rank, and stay in them long enough, so that when they do come out in field rank they will not be old men, but will still have enough incentive and ambition left, so that they will be susceptible to a few new ideas when the occasion arises for them to have them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 10, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BEGG. To offer an amendment. On page 3, line 20, I move to strike out the word "twenty-one" and insert the word "thirteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BEGG: Page 3, line 20, strike out the word "twenty-one" and insert in lieu thereof "thirteen."

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, on that amendment I wish to say this: I have been advised by a military man to the effect that in peace times there will probably be a maximum of 11 positions in active service for major generals. Then that number 13 would provide that the Chief of Staff might, while in active service, have the rank of major general. I think there is one criticism that can be brought against this bill more than any other. I do not wish to set myself up as a critic with what limited information I have on military affairs, other than to say that at the death—I guess death is the only way the title can disappear—at the death of Gen. Pershing, the highest rank in the Army by this bill will be a major generalship. This bill provides for 32 men in the Army organization of equal rank. I do not know how it is in military life, but I know that no organization in civil life will reach the highest degree of perfection with 32 men of equal rank. I can not see any necessity, I can not see any justice, in having a man with the same rank at the head of a bureau as he has in active service at the head of a division. I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact. Much argument has been offered here as the excuse for this bill to the effect that we should be prepared for the next disaster that may hit us or the next call that may come for men. Some people say, "Let us train an army of officers, so that they can train our soldiery to fight." I want to direct the attention of this House to the fact that America did not fail in this war in her personnel, but we did fail in the material with which to equip that personnel, and America will not fail in the next war in men, even if we do not create a great army of high-titled officers.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion right there?

Mr. BEGG. I will yield for a short question.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman from Ohio believe that when officers are placed in command, for instance, on the border of this country, and at the heads of departments, that they carry much more respect and authority and are much more efficient at the higher grade than at a subordinate one?

Mr. BEGG. In reply to the gentleman's inquiry, the gentleman knows a good deal about the influence that goes with an officer on the border of Texas, and I know nothing about it; but I do not believe that conferring a high title or award on a soldier makes a bit of difference in his fighting ability.

Mr. BEE. Not at all.

Mr. BEGG. I believe you can send a brigadier general down to Texas if trouble comes, and I believe he will conduct his men in just as efficient a way as if he were a major general.

Mr. BEE. But he would be commanding a brigade and not a division.

Mr. BEGG. He may command a bigger unit than a brigade. He may even command a division. Then we ought to create a higher title for the man higher up. I do not believe in this policy of putting everybody on a top shelf in an organization where men are supposed to have superiors and also have inferiors, and on no other basis can you organize an efficient military institution.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman knows that the Committee on Rules now has lying before it several bills to make lieutenant generals of Republican favorites as soon as the election is over.

Mr. BEGG. So far as that is concerned, in my judgment that does not need an answer.

Mr. FESS. What Rules Committee?

Mr. CALDWELL. The Rules Committee of this House.

Mr. FESS. That is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. BEGG. Even if it is true or if it is not true, the country knows well enough who has been getting the promotions out of the War Department in the past few months. I am not arguing one way or the other as to who gets the promotions. I am arguing on a system. It is not an efficient system that has 32 major generals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request to proceed for two additional minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Where would you place the 13 major generals that you enumerate?

Mr. BEGG. I would place them at the head of every division and the Coast Artillery and the Chief of Staff. That takes them all.

Mr. MILLER. How about the department commanders?

Mr. BEGG. I would strike them all out. I would call them brigadier generals. I would not make any officer in the Army, when a major general is the chief officer, of equal rank to him. I would not make a whole school of major generals and duplicate their standing in the ranks.

Mr. MILLER. Did the gentleman ever hear of an army on the face of God's earth formed on such a basis as that?

Mr. BEGG. I regret I am not so well versed on these matters as the gentlemen of the committee, who are familiar with these matters, no doubt, nor do I make any such claim; but there are a few things that exist, possibly, that the gentleman is not advised of.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I regret that I can not yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to call the attention of the House to this fact: Title and rank do not make a man a fighting man or an organizer, and some of the best armies in the world are created with a lower title than that of brigadier general. We do not need in this country 32 major generals. My statement was that 32 major generals are provided for in this bill. The question has been raised that there are only 21, but I am reading from the statement in the report, and it says there are 32. I may be wrong, but that is the statement of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. But whether it is 32 or 21, it makes no difference. There are too many of them. They are in one another's way when it comes to a crucial time, and it does not appeal to me as the ideal way to build a system. Supposing at the head of a business concern you have 21 superintendents instead of 1, where would you get in the way of efficient and immediate results?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has quoted the proper figures as to the total number of major generals provided for in this bill, but if the gentleman will look at the table, I think he will see that the major generals provided for in the line of the Army number 21—1 as Chief of Staff, 9 as department commanders, 10 as division commanders, and 1 as Assistant Chief of Staff, or a total of 21.

I take it that anyone familiar with the formation of the Army would hardly question the advisability of having any one of these 21 major generals eliminated. Each division must have one. Each department commander should be at least a major general, if not a lieutenant general. We have kept the number of major generals in this bill at the minimum. The others provided for in staff corps are as follows: One in each of the several staff corps, namely, The Adjutant General, the Quartermaster General, the Surgeon General, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief of Engineers; the Chief of the Militia Bureau, who is provided for in this bill, and who it is provided in this bill shall be an officer of the National Guard detailed for that service; a chief of Infantry, a chief of Cavalry, a chief of Field Artillery, a chief of the Coast Artillery, and a chief of Air Service. In other words, if the gentleman's amendment would prevail, we would have no man of the higher rank at the head of any of these departments or staff corps of the Army, and we would not have enough major generals to properly officer our divisions and our different departments.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; gladly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What has the gentleman's amendment to do with staff officers?

Mr. CRAGO. The paragraph he referred to relates to major generals of the line, and his amendment reduces the number from 21 to 13, although his argument was to the effect that we were making provision for 32 major generals.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was asking for information.

Mr. CRAGO. I understand.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman's amendment would relate only to line officers.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman's amendment would, but his argument, explaining to the House that we are providing for 32, I thought needed some answer. As a matter of fact the amendment of the gentleman would take away from the line of the Army the men of higher rank, but still leave them with the staff corps.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. In the first place you are not duplicating superintendents, as the gentleman supposed; and then secondly, if you recognized only those who have rendered distinguished service during the war in that capacity, you would need to have a great many more major generals than you are creating.

Mr. CRAGO. Oh, yes; we can not even take care of the men who saw duty on the front with troops and on the line of battle who served as major generals. We are not able to do it in this bill.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Then there is no question of duplicating duties, because each one of these major generals will have a separate and distinct duty to perform.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes. I want to ask him a question.

Mr. KAHN. I suggest five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. I want to ask if the committee would accept an amendment providing that no officer should be made the head of a staff department or a major general unless he has been under fire somewhere while in command of troops?

Mr. CRAGO. I do not think we could consent to that.

Mr. LITTLE. The reason I suggest this is that if you put a man at the head of the staff who has been under fire and had command of troops in battle, you would have so much more useful an officer. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEGG. The statement the gentleman made a minute ago led me to believe that this bill was drawn with a view of rewarding the men who had fought in the late war. I want to say that if that was the intent I would rather increase it than decrease it, but I thought you were drawing a peace-time measure without any view of rewarding heroism on the battle field.

Mr. LITTLE. That is the reason I asked my question.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman will surely recognize that more men exercised these commands at the front than we are providing for, and the pity is that we can not take care of all those brave men in this bill.

Mr. BEGG. Was that the guiding factor in deciding the number of major generals?

Mr. CRAGO. No; it was not. It was a condition which confronted us, but it was not the theory on which this bill was framed.

Mr. BEGG. If that were the deciding or controlling factor, I should not oppose it.

Mr. CRAGO. As a matter of fact we are taking care of some of these men, but we are not increasing the rank of the men who have heretofore held these positions, because we always had major generals as division commanders and as department commanders and also as chiefs of staff.

Mr. LITTLE. I think it is very kind of the committee to have in mind the men who did the fighting over there, and in order to follow that up I do not see why the committee should object to my suggestion. Why not just offer an amendment that every chief of staff or head of a corps must be somebody who commanded troops in action?

Mr. CRAGO. Because, as I said to the gentleman about an hour ago, I believe that men performed service just as valuable to this country in these different staff corps, where they did their duty and helped the Army to function properly, as the men who were fortunate enough to be able to get to the front.

Mr. LITTLE. But you do not claim that a man is really equipped to be a thoroughly useful chief or head of a bureau in the Army of soldiers who was never in battle, do you?

Mr. CRAGO. Men may be good soldiers without ever being in battle, and it takes a good soldier to stay put where he belongs and where he can render the most efficient service, and not always want to go out and do the fighting, which is the easiest thing a brave man can do. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. That is true of every man who stayed at home and attended to his own business, and you had just as well cheer the man who worked in a blacksmith shop during the war. He did his duty as well as a man on the staff in Washington. You should cheer him, too.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We do. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. If he did his duty and worked patriotically, he is entitled to credit for it.

Mr. CALDWELL. How about the Congressman who stayed at home. Do you not think he is entitled to some credit?

Mr. LITTLE. I believe the gentleman got into the war a day or two before it closed. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, dismissing all the by-play in which we have indulged, I think that the committee thoroughly understands this situation, and having reduced these higher officers to this number, I think unquestionably the committee should be sustained in their action.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 5 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 5. General Staff Corps: The General Staff Corps shall consist of the Chief of Staff, the War Department General Staff, and the General Staff with troops. The War Department General Staff shall consist of the Chief of Staff and 4 assistants to the Chief of Staff selected by the President from the general officers of the line, and 88 other officers of grades not below that of captain. The General Staff with troops shall consist of such number of officers not below the grade of captain as may be necessary to perform the General Staff duties of the headquarters of territorial departments, armies, army corps, divisions, and brigades, and as military attachés abroad. In time of peace the detail of an officer as a member of the General Staff Corps shall be for a period of four years, unless sooner relieved, and such details shall be limited to officers whose names are borne on the list of General Staff Corps eligibles. The initial eligible list shall be prepared by a board consisting of the commandant of the General Staff College, the commandant of the General Service Schools, and one other general officer selected by the Secretary of War who is not then a member of the General Staff Corps. This board shall select and report the names of all officers of the Regular Army, National Guard, and Officers' Reserve Corps of the following classes who are recommended by them as qualified by education, military experience, and character for General Staff duty:

"(a) Those officers graduated from the Army Staff College or the Army War College prior to July 1, 1917, who, upon graduation, were specifically recommended for duty as commander or chief of staff of a division or higher tactical unit, or for duty in the General Staff Corps;

"(b) Those officers who, since April 6, 1917, have commanded a division or higher tactical unit or have demonstrated by actual service in the World War that they are qualified for General Staff duty.

"After the completion of the initial General Staff Corps eligible list the name of no officer shall be added thereto unless upon graduation from the General Staff School he is specifically recommended as qualified for General Staff duty, and after July 1, 1924, no officer of the General Staff Corps except the Chief of Staff and the assistants to the Chief of Staff shall be assigned as a member of the War Department General Staff unless he is a graduate of the General Staff College. The Secretary of War shall publish twice annually the list of officers eligible for General Staff duty, and such eligibility shall be noted in the annual Army Register. If at any time the number of officers available and eligible for detail to the General Staff is not sufficient to fill al vancancies therein, captains may be detailed as acting General Staff officers under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

"The duties of the War Department General Staff shall be to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the military forces and national resources in time of war; to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Army and its state of preparation for military operations; to render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff and to act as their agents in harmonizing the duties, plans, and operations of the branches and bureaus of the War Department and of the Army; and to perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may from time to time be prescribed.

"The duties of the General Staff with troops shall be to render professional aid and assistance to the general officers over them; to act as their agents in harmonizing the plans, duties, and operations of the various organizations and services under their jurisdiction, in preparing detailed instructions for the execution of the plans of the commanding generals, and in supervising the execution of such instructions.

"The Chief of Staff, under the direction of the President or of the Secretary of War, shall cause the preparation by the War Department General Staff of the necessary plans for recruiting, organizing, supplying, equipping, mobilizing, training, and demobilizing the Army for its use in the national defense. He shall keep the Secretary of War informed of all plans prepared by the War Department General Staff and advise him as to the practicability and desirability of such plans. Upon the approval of such plans by the Secretary of War, he shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment in such a way as to insure their effective development and execution. In case any recommendations for legislation for the national defense or for the reorganization of the Army or for any other requirements of the Military Establishment are presented by the Secretary of War to Congress or to one of the committees of Congress, such recommendations shall be accompanied by a statement from the appropriate division of the War Department General Staff setting forth the reasons for such recommendations and including the names of the officers of the War Department General Staff who prepared it, together with such pertinent comments for and against the plan as may be made by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, or individual officers of the division of the War Department General Staff in which the plan was prepared: Provided, That if such statement contains confidential matter the Secretary of War may inform the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Senate of that fact, and the statement thereafter shall be open to the inspection of members of the said committees, but shall not be taken from the War Department buildings or offices.

"Hereafter members of the General Staff Corps shall be confined strictly to the discharge of duties of the general nature of those specified for them in this section and in the act of Congress approved February 14, 1903, and they shall not be permitted to assume or engage in work of an administrative nature that pertains to establish bureaus or offices of the War Department, or that, being assumed or engaged in by members of the General Staff Corps, would involve impairment of the responsibility or initiative of such bureaus or offices, or would cause injurious or unnecessary duplication of or delay in the work thereof.

"SEC. 5a. Hereafter, in addition to such other duties as may be assigned him by the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War, under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with supervision of the procurement of all military supplies and other business of the War Department pertaining thereto. The Assistant Secretary of War shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum. The offices of Second Assistant Secretary of War and Third Assistant Secretary of War are hereby abolished.

"Under the direction of the Secretary of War chiefs of branches of the Army charged with the procurement of supplies for the Army shall report direct to the Assistant Secretary of War regarding all matters of procurement."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 11, line 22, after the word "all," change "vancancies" to "vacancies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 10, after the word "Army," change the comma to a period and strike out all thereafter down to and including line 12.

The amendment was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SNYDER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. NORRIS, Mr. BRANDEGEE, and Mr. KIRBY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.

The message also announced that, in pursuance of section 3 of the Post Office appropriation act for 1920, the President pro tempore had appointed Hon. LAWRENCE C. PHIPPS as a member of the joint commission on the part of the Senate to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. JOHN HOLLIS BANKHEAD.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 9, after the word "department," change the comma to a period and strike out all thereafter down to and including line 13.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from California what is the object of striking out that language?

Mr. KAHN. It was an amendment taken up by the committee either yesterday morning or this morning, and the committee thought that, although it was in the national-defense act, it was advisable to cut it out of the present bill. I want to say frankly to the gentleman that I was not present at the meeting of the committee.

Mr. DENT. Neither was I.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] was present and will explain the matter.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state to my colleague that these amendments were agreed to this morning at a meeting of the committee after the chairman had left the committee in charge of our colleague, Mr. ANTHONY, of Kansas. The purpose of the amendment is to clarify the language which we have been endeavoring to get into this bill to define the duties and powers of the General Staff. In other words, to get away from all criticism that might be made that we are leaving language in the bill that will enable the General Staff to operate rather than to fulfill the functions which are properly intended to be carried out by the General Staff. In order that there might be no doubt about our intentions, we have proposed to strike out the language mentioned in the second amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I really do not see how this committee amendment clarifies the situation. This language, as I stated a little while ago, was in the national defense act. I think I am safe in asserting that the Committee on Military Affairs was practically unanimous, or nearly so, on the proposition that the General Staff should be limited to planning and devising and not operating or exercising administrative functions. I think that was one thing about which the committee was unanimously agreed. I do not think by striking out this language that we are going to help that situation. That language is as follows:

Hereafter, members of the General Staff Corps shall be confined strictly to the discharge of duties of the general nature of those specified for them in this section and in the act of Congress approved February 14, 1903, and they shall not be permitted to assume or engage in work of an administrative nature that pertains to established bureaus or offices of the War Department—

That is pretty strong language. Now, this is the language that they propose to strike out—or that, being assumed or engaged in by members of the General Staff Corps, would involve impairment of the responsibility or initiative of such bureaus or offices, or would cause injurious or unnecessary duplication of or delay in the work thereof.

If the committee really desire to clip the wings of the General Staff so as to hold them down to functions for which they were originally created, I see no reason why that language should be stricken out of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I am rather inclined to agree with the gentleman from Alabama that perhaps a mistake has been made by the committee in attempting to strike out some of this language in one of the amendments proposed. I do think that we ought to go a little further than the committee has gone along these lines. I want to call attention of the committee to the language on the top of page 13, where it says:

He—

shall keep the Secretary of War informed of all plans prepared by the War Department General Staff, and advise him as to the practicability and desirability of such plans. Upon the approval of such plans by the Secretary of War, he shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment in such a way as to insure their effective development and execution.

To my mind, that empowers the Chief of Staff to continue to operate in the War Department whenever such plan is approved by the Secretary of War. I think we should go further and strike out as well the language I have read on the top of page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment, page 15, line 2: After the period strike out the quotation and add the following:

"He shall cause to be manufactured or produced at the Government arsenals of the United States all such supplies or articles needed by the War Department as said arsenals are capable of manufacturing or producing: Provided, That the cost of manufacturing or producing such articles or supplies at said arsenals shall not exceed the cost if purchased in the open market. And he shall operate or cause to be operated said arsenals economically. And all orders for manufacture of material pertaining to approved projects which are placed with arsenals or other Ordnance establishments shall be considered as obligations in all respects in the same manner as provided for similar orders placed with commercial manufacturers."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "arsenals," wherever it occurs in the amendment, insert the word "factories."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment so as to cover the case of a factory that has been recently purchased by the Government during the war and now lying idle.

Mr. SANFORD. Would not the gentleman say "Government-owned factories"?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say "Government-owned factories," Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "arsenals," wherever it occurs in the amendment, the words "and Government-owned factories."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, now I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be considered as offered wherever the word "arsenals" is used in connection with these manufactures.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I hate to take up the time of the committee, but I have been interrupted, and I would like to have the original amendment read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the original amendment be reported. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The original amendment was again reported.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it was not my purpose to say anything about this amendment, because it seemed so clear on its face. I have to confess I have in this matter that peculiar interest that any Member has when he has some interest in his district that is to be served by an amendment. There is one of the largest Government arsenals in my district, but the public interest to be served overtops that entirely. This amendment simply provides that the Government, wherever it can do so economically, shall use these arsenals to do work usually or often done by private contractors. [Applause.] In the second place, it provides when contracts are let out to be done at Government arsenals the rule with reference to the appropriation being available only for one year shall not apply.

The situation has been that large orders have been offered to the Watervliet Arsenal, for instance, which that arsenal could not accept because in a Government arsenal the appropriation dies at the end of the year, and inasmuch as the contemplated job would usually take longer than that time the Government has been obliged to let the job go to some private manufacturer. But on the face of it that restriction of the law is unfair to the Government and is unfair to the arsenal. The purpose of the latter part of the amendment is to remove that restriction of the law and to make these appropriations that are allotted for work to be done at Government arsenals available the same as if the work were to be done by a private manufacturer; that is, make the appropriation available for 365 days after the fiscal year in which the money is appropriated.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman's remarks would apply equally to the great factories that have been built up during the war and are now owned by the Government?

Mr. SANFORD. I should think so. If the gentleman has any Government-owned factories in his district I am glad of it, and he can speak up for them. I am speaking for the arsenal and the vast public interests involved there.

Mr. GARRETT. One of the provisions of the gentleman's amendment is the appropriation does not extend beyond the period of two years?

Mr. SANFORD. It does not. The wording of the amendment is that it shall be allotted on the same terms as if the contract were made with a private manufacturer, which would be 365 days after the fiscal year ended.

Mr. GARRETT. What I had in mind was the constitutional provision that money for the support of the Army could not extend beyond two years.

Mr. SANFORD. I assure the gentleman that that provision of the Constitution was kept in mind when the amendment was drawn.

The Government has invested at Watervliet over $20,000,000; there is employed there at this time a force of highly trained mechanics gathered together from all parts of the country to meet the emergency created by the war. The arsenal is now equipped to do work of the finest grade involving that most intricate of all machine work necessary to produce modern cannon. There are about 2,500 men employed there at this time, a large part of whom the Government plans to discharge in the near future.

I assure you that this plant can do as high-grade machine-shop work as the Bethlehem Steel Co. or any other private concern.

The purpose of this amendment is to compel the executive officers of the Government to have Government work done at such arsenals as this and to cease handing out appropriations to private manufacturers. It is perfect nonsense to allow such an investment as this to go to waste and at the same time turn over work to be done by contract by private manufacturers.

Unfortunately under the provisions of the general law appropriations of money for work to be done in a Government plant lapses at the end of the fiscal year for which the appropriation is made. This amendment removes this restriction and continues the appropriation for an additional year. This limitation of law has often compelled the Ordnance Department to turn work over to private manufacturers.

I, therefore, plead with you to pass this amendment not only because of the special interest I have because of my district, but because of the greater public interest that will be directly served by the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from California as amended.

The question was taken, and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12775, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CARTER, for five days, on account of being a witness in court.

To Mr. LONGWORTH, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MOORE of Ohio (on request of Mr. MURPHY), for three days, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. DENISON, for two weeks, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3696. An act to amend section 98 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we acknowledge Thy name in the beginning of this day and stand in reverent attitude toward Thee. We thank Thee for the blessings of life. We thank Thee for the vast resources of our land. We thank Thee for the unity of spirit that is among us and for friendships that are welded even stronger by conflict of opinion. We bless Thee for the common ideal and end that is before us. We pray Thee to lead us on to the accomplishment of the divine will in us as a people. For Christ's sake. Amen.

NAMING OF PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary (George A. Sanderson) read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker had designated Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, as Speaker pro tempore for a period not exceeding 10 legislative days.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3696) to amend section 98 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended, and it was thereupon signed by the Presiding Officer.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a resolution of the Chicago Association of Commerce, and ask that it be printed without reading and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution passed by the interstate and foreign trade committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce, February 10, 1920.

UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Whereas the efficiency of the United States Customs Service has become greatly impaired, due to resignations of many experienced employees, owing to inadequate compensation paid by the Government; and

Whereas the interstate and foreign trade committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce has caused to be made an investigation in the matter and the same discloses that during the last 10 years the Government has granted no material increase in compensation to employees in the Customs Service, notwithstanding the great advance in the cost of living: Be it

Resolved, That the interstate and foreign trade committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce direct the matter to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Committee on Appropriations, and to such other governmental authorities as have jurisdiction therein, and to urge support of the amendment to deficiency bill H. R. 12046, for the appropriation of $1,000,000 to be used in increasing salaries and filling vacancies in the Customs Service, as a matter of important interest to the importing business of the country, as well as fairness and justice to the employees; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the members of the Appropriations Committee, the Secretary of the Treasury, commercial bodies throughout the United States, and to Members of Congress as indicating the views and recommendation of the interstate and foreign trade committee of the Chicago Association of Commerce.

G. L. WALTERS,
Chairman Subcommittee Interstate and Foreign Trade Committee.

Mr. LODGE. I present a petition from the General Court of Massachusetts, which I ask may be placed in the RECORD without reading and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS, 1920.

An order relative to maintaining transportation through the Cape Cod Canal.

Whereas the United States Railroad Administration has ordered a relinquishment of the Cape Cod Canal and of the property connected therewith; and

Whereas the ownership of the canal is at present uncertain, the price to be paid therefor by the United States Government being a subject of dispute in the courts; and

Whereas it is of the utmost importance to the people of New England that the canal should not only be open but should be operated to the fullest extent for the transportation of coal and other commodities during the present emergency: Therefore it is hereby Ordered, That the General Court of Massachusetts hereby requests the United States Government to take such action as may be necessary to provide for the prompt and full operation of the canal, especially for the transportation to New England of coal and other commodities; and be it further Ordered, That copies of this order be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the United States Railroad Administration, to the Secretary of War, and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In house of representatives, adopted, March 1, 1920.
In senate, adopted, in concurrence, March 2, 1920.
A true copy.
Attest:

ALBERT F. LANGLEY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Bunker Hill Literary Club, of Waterbury; the Alpine Club, of Bridgeport; the Women's Club, of Waterbury; the Wednesday Afternoon Club, of Norwich; and the Federation of Women's Clubs, of Washington, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for vocational education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

PROTECTION OF TRADE-MARKS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "(b) All other marks not registerable under the act of February 20, 1905, as amended, except those specified in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 5 of that act, but which have been in bona fide use for not less than one year in interstate or foreign commerce, or commerce with the Indian tribes by the proprietor thereof, upon or in connection with any goods of such proprietor upon which a fee of $10 has been paid to the Commissioner of Patents and such formalities as required by the said commissioner have been complied with: Provided, That trade-marks which are identical with a known trade-mark owned and used in interstate and foreign commerce, or commerce with the Indian tribes by another and appropriated to merchandise of the same descriptive properties as to be likely to cause confusion or mistake in the mind of the public or to deceive purchasers, shall not be placed on this register"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendments as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "28 (as to class (b) marks only)," and on page 4, line 6 of the engrossed bill, after "act" insert "of a mark falling within class (a) of section 1," also on page 4, line 19, of the engrossed bill, after "date," insert "and the provisions of section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks,' approved May 4, 1906"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 9. That section 5 of the trade-mark act of February 20, 1905, being Thirty-third Statutes at Large, page 725, as amended by Thirty-fourth Statutes at Large, page 1251, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 918, Thirty-seventh Statutes at Large, page 649, is hereby amended by adding the following words thereto: 'And if any person or corporation shall have so registered a mark upon the ground of said use for 10 years preceding February 20, 1905, as to certain articles or classes of articles to which said mark shall have been applied for said period, and shall have thereafter and subsequently extended his business so as to include other articles not manufactured by said applicant for 10 years next preceding February 20, 1905, nothing herein shall prevent the registration of said trade-mark in the additional classes to which said new additional articles manufactured by said person or corporation shall apply, after said trade-mark has been used on said article in interstate or foreign commerce or with the Indian tribes for at least one year provided another person or corporation has not adopted and used previously to its adoption and use by the proposed registrant and for more than one year such trade-mark or one so similar as to be likely to deceive in such additional class or classes.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
G. W. NORRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN I. NOLAN,
FLORIAN LAMPERT,
GUY E. CAMPBELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

AMNESTY TO PRISONERS (S. DOC. NO. 249).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a further communication from the Acting Secretary of State replying to the resolution of the Senate, dated January 13, 1920 (No. 278), requesting that it be furnished with information showing what, if anything, Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium, or either of these Governments, have done through legislative or executive proclamation, or otherwise, looking to the granting of amnesty to military, political, or other prisoners since the signing of the armistice November 11, 1918.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
11 March, 1920.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 10th instant approved and signed the following joint resolution:

S. J. Res. 156. Authorizing the Secretary of War to bring back on Army transports from Danzig, Poland, residents of the United States of Polish origin who were engaged in the war on the side of the allied and associated powers.

PAY OF ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I beg leave for just a moment to make a statement to the Senate in connection with the condition of the Army and the Navy, and especially in connection with the pay problem of those services.

The Senate will remember that this body some time ago passed a bill increasing the pay of the officers and enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, and Coast and Geodetic Survey. Since that bill passed 150 more officers have resigned from the Army in desperation, unable to make both ends meet. The bill is still pending in the House of Representatives.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask, how long ago was that bill passed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can not state exactly; probably three or four weeks or a month ago.

Let me say in this connection that that makes a total of 2,358 officers of the Regular Army who have resigned since the armistice—one out of every four in the service. It is a serious question.

Mr. President, in addition to that, information comes to me to-day, which I understand is reliable, that 200 petty officers of the Navy have deserted, and that 13 of them were chief petty officers, unable to make both ends meet.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator able to state that the resignations from the Army were in large part or substantially due to the lack of pay?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Almost entirely. My own mail is filled with inquiries, some of them coming by indirection from officers of the Army, wondering whether they can afford to stay any longer, asking what are the prospects of this legislation. They owe it to their families and to themselves to see to it that they can live a decent life, but they can not do it in the service at the present rate of pay. The same is true of the noncommissioned officers of the Army and the petty officers of the Navy.

Information has just come to me from the Panama Canal Zone which I think I ought to lay before the Senate, indicating the situation. I have here a table showing the rate of pay accorded to bricklayers, carpenters, metal lathers, painters, plasterers, and plumbers in the Panama Canal Zone, all civilian employees. Most of them are West Indians. The bricklayers are receiving pay at the rate of $9.52 a day, carpenters at the rate of $8.40 a day, metal lathers at the rate of $8.56 a day, painters at the rate of $7.60 a day, plasterers at the rate of $9.52 a day, and plumbers at the rate of $9.36 a day. These men have their housing, their heating, and their light free of charge. We make no complaint—no one will complain—at the rate of pay given to people in civilian employment, but the average of the compensations which I have described is as high as that of a major in the Army. That being the case, how can we expect captains and lieutenants to stay in the Army?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will not the Senator from New York place in the RECORD at this point what the pay is of the several grades of officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think that was put in the RECORD at the time the Senate passed the pay bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I know it has been put in the RECORD; but I thought it would be very interesting to have the figures closely together here, in order that we could all have the comparison.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall endeavor to supply that information, but it has been placed in the RECORD at a previous time.

Mr. President, I intend to detain the Senate but a moment longer. I have here also a report in the form of a letter addressed to me by a colonel of the General Staff, whose business it is to keep in touch with the morale of the Army of the United States. He says in the letter, which is dated March 9:

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: As a matter of information bearing on legislation for increase of Army, Navy, and other service pay now pending, I am taking the liberty of inviting attention to the fact that between September 1, 1919, during which month the original bill for the above purpose was introduced, and March 1, 1920, the cost of staple goods as sold to officers and enlisted men at the Army commissary, First and B Streets NW., this city, has increased 23 per cent.

The increase prior to that time was in the neighborhood of 100 per cent as compared with the figures of four years ago.

Mr. President, under such circumstances we can not expect corporals and sergeants and quartermaster sergeants and the upper grades of the noncommissioned personnel of the Army, many of whom have families, to remain in the service. It would be stupid of them if they did so. They owe it to their families to make a living, which they can not get and which they do not receive in the service at the present rates of pay. The same observation applies to the officers.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, is the Senator from New York going to tell us what is the present parliamentary status of the bill? As I recall, we passed the Senator's bill, and afterwards we substituted it for a bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House and passed by that body. Is the matter now in conference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The other House has as yet refrained from acceding to the request of the Senate for a conference.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator going to suggest some action to the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senate is quite powerless in the matter as a body. It may be that the other House will eventually consent to a conference, but in the meantime men are leaving the service in droves. They are the very best men we have. It is a most unfortunate situation and a very serious one.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I regard it as a very serious matter, and should be greatly pleased if the Senator could suggest something that I and other Senators may do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, continuing the reading of the letter, which is a short one:

The list of items upon which the above figures are based is attached. There are various foods not of as common use, and not included in this list, on which the increase has been 50 per cent and more.

That, mind you, Mr. President, is since September 1 last.

The demotion of large numbers of officers, due to be accomplished during the coming week, will further add to the economic difficulties under which the Army is now laboring.

On March 15 the emergency rank will be withdrawn. Of course, it is inevitable that the emergency rank should be withdrawn sooner or later, as the condition now existing in the Army in that respect is artificial and unwarranted; but it adds to the painful situation which I thought it my duty to lay before the Senate and the public.

In connection with the letter which I have read I send to the desk the price list of staple food articles for sale at the Army commissary store at First and B Streets NW., Washington, D. C., showing the rise in cost between September 1 last and March 1 of this year, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Price list of staple food articles, sales commissary, First and B Streets NW., Washington, D. C.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from New York will pardon me for a moment, I wish that the effect of this deplorable condition to which the Senator refers would be a little more manifest in the personnel of the War Department. I am told by many officers that there are retained in the employ of the War Department a large number of officers unnecesarily and that there is a great duplication of work. An officer told me on day before yesterday that it seemed to him as though the purpose was to make jobs for a lot of men under the rank of brigadier general in the War Department when there was no necessity for their retention; that there were hundreds and thousands of officers of the Government whose terms by legislation were prolonged, but will expire July 1 who were remaining there when their services were not needed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Utah attacks an entirely different problem, and in some respects I am in sympathy with him, but he must remember, as we must all remember, that an officer goes where he is ordered; he has no choice in the matter.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York allow me a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I noticed in the newspapers the other day that the War Department was continuing Regular Army officers who had obtained extra rank during the war in the higher ranks instead of putting them back to their Regular Army grades where they were before the war, in order that they may continue to receive the extra pay which they were allowed during the war. Is that true?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The order is now out that on March 15 emergency rank ceases. All officers will be demoted to their Regular Army rank at that date, and that will undoubtedly increase the number of resignations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I merely want to corroborate, in its relation to the Navy, what the Senator from New York has said in regard to the Army. Most humiliating conditions exist in the case of officers, particularly subordinate officers, of the Navy. I am informed that there have not only been a great number of resignations, but that in the case of petty officers there have been a great number of desertions on account of the inability of these men to live decently on the pay which they receive.

I should like to make the further comment that I believe it is a mistaken policy for the Government, as it is a mistaken policy for the organization that is responsible for the conduct of legislation, to undertake to put into effect a kind of horizontal cutting down of appropriations, regardless of where the reductions occur. In order to meet with the approval of the public the policy of economy must be discriminating. We have been prodigal in the amount of money we have expended in connection with the war, not only in our own activities but in supporting those of our allies.

To show the difference in the attitude of the nations with which we were associated in the war and ourselves, we loaned many billion dollars to Italy and to Great Britain, for instance, and they used a portion of that money to give decent pay to the officers of their army and navy, while we who loaned them the money refused to do so. Whether or not that is creditable to us is a matter for the people to determine. I do not think that it is creditable either to our generosity toward the men who served us in the war or to our sagacity in the maintenance of a permanent defense—the Army and the Navy.

To show what little discrimination there is in the matter of the curtailment of expenditures, I have a long list of men who were employed in the War Department, such as have been referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]—I have the names, but I will not read them at this time; there is no trouble, however, about their identification—many of them receiving pay at the rate of $50 a day, others at rates of $1,000 a month, $833 a month, $40 a day, and one at $75 a day.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I simply want to say that, while I do not care to interfere with the remarks of the Senator, I am very anxious during the morning hour to get before the Senate a resolution. I do not ask for the regular order at this time, but I should like to have Senators realize that I am very anxious to secure the consideration of the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I appreciate that, and I will conclude immediately what I have to say. I desire simply to emphasize the importance of the enactment by Congress of the pay bill, at least in putting it in the way of consideration by Congress. It is now held up, I understand, so that it is not even receiving any consideration. If we want to curtail expenses let us make some inquiry into the purpose of maintaining in the War Department a large number of employees at rates of pay from $35 to $75 a day, while refusing to give enough for a decent living to the officers and men of the Army and Navy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator think that those rates per day are fair rates to be paid to the officers whom he mentions?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Paid to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator said that some officers in the department are getting from $40 a day to $75 a day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; I did not say officers in the department; I said employees. I do not think I said officers; I did not intend to say that. My understanding is that they are civilian employees.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I misunderstood the Senator. Does the Senator think that these rates are too high?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think they are entirely too high.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think the Senator would perform a great public duty if he would read into the RECORD the names of the men who are receiving these extravagant payments. There is nothing that will stop them, if unjust to the Government, as quickly as publicity, and I think if the Senator has the information—and I think he stated that he had the names——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. He would render a public service if he would read them into the RECORD and indicate what service they are performing.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will ask to have them incorporated as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed.

UNITED STATES GRAIN CORPORATION.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 319, Order of Business 420, providing for an investigation by the Committee on Manufactures of the reported wheat pool.

I suppose there will be no objection to this resolution. It is the ordinary resolution. The grand jury at Spokane, Wash., made an investigation, and its report contains certain charges, and the matter is one that it seems to me ought to be investigated. I presume the resolution will go through without opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution named by him.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have the resolution stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated.

The Assistant Secretary read Senate resolution 319, submitted by Mr. REED on the 2d instant, as follows:

Whereas the Federal grand jury sitting at Spokane, Wash., on February 29 made a report containing certain charges against the United States Grain Corporation and its directors of reported speculations in wheat; and

Whereas an account of such report was on March 1 made a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be directed to inquire into the reported wheat pool and investigate the United States Grain Corporation, and the dealings, operations, speculations, and manipulations, if any there has been of such Grain Corporation, its officers and agents, in wheat and wheat products, and report thereon to the Senate, together with their recommendation of any steps which they may deem it necessary to take in view of the findings.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to amend the resolution by adding, after the words "Committee on Manufactures," the words "or any subcommittee thereof"—the usual form. I notice that those words have been omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution is before the Senate, and the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG. What are the words?

Mr. REED. After the words "Committee on Manufactures," I wish to insert "or any subcommittee thereof"—the usual form.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall object to that, because the committee can elect their own subcommittee.

Mr. REED. That is exactly the point; but they have to have the authority to elect it in the resolution. It is the usual form.

Mr. KELLOGG. Can the chairman appoint them without a meeting of the committee?

Mr. REED. Oh, no; he would have to call the committee together.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution been put to the Senate?

Mr. REED. I am asking that it be put now.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I thought.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair put the motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not hear the Chair put the motion. I was listening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the motion. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 319.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of this motion. We have only 66 investigating committees out, and we have not enough. Each committee that is conducting an investigation is a joke, and we ought to have another investigation, for we need another joke. I am in favor of them. This is the season for jokes, so I think the resolution ought to pass unanimously, so that we will have 67 investigating committees, instead of 66; and let us hope that some of them some day will report, and that the ponderous tomes may be filed away to be used, of course, for campaign material.

I hope that no one will object to this resolution, for I understand it is not an investigation of the Grain Corporation but is an indirect thrust at Mr. Hoover. Let us, therefore, add the name of Mr. Hoover and strike out all the other parts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri what has become of the other investigation which the Senate authorized the Committee on Manufactures to undertake three or four months ago? It was on print paper, as I recall. Have any meetings been held?

Mr. REED. I am very glad to answer the Senator's question, although I am not the chairman of the Manufactures Committee. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is the chairman. Almost immediately after that resolution was offered the Senator from Wisconsin was taken ill and was obliged to leave the city. He was here a little while, under great stress of business. I have received a telegram from him in which he states that he desires to have the committee called together and proceed, notwithstanding his illness.

I think that answers the Senator. It is not my responsibility that the committee was not called together. As a matter of fact, substantially the whole delay has been on account of the sickness of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the circumstances, does not the Senator think the committee had better get through with one investigation, or at least begin it, before it takes up another one?

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the two bear no relation to each other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I recognize that.

Mr. REED. As I have stated, the Senator from Wisconsin has wired here saying that he desires to have the committee called together on the newsprint matter, notwithstanding the condition of his health. This is a matter which would naturally go to that committee.

Let me say in reply to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], who talks about jokes, that if there is any joke about this matter it exists only in the humorous brain of the Senator. He has a vein of humor that enables him to see funny things when other people do not see the humor. Let me say to him further, when he speaks about putting in the name of Mr. Hoover, that he is the first man I know of who has drawn Mr. Hoover's name into this discussion. As I understand the charges, they do not involve Mr. Hoover at all.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, what is the use of the investigation if it does not involve Mr. Hoover? I do not want to have a futile procedure here.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, again I might say that that depends on the man's viewpoint. If the charges set forth in this Federal grand jury report are true—and I did not put them in the RECORD; they were inserted by another Senator—then there is a condition affecting the public business of the United States. It happens to be a part of the grain dealings. It does not follow that that reflects on Mr. Hoover. Indeed, as far as I have read these charges, it would appear that they no more reflect upon Mr. Hoover individually than a charge that something has happened in the War Department on the part of the subordinate members of that department would necessarily reflect upon the Secretary of War.

I do not take it very kindly that the Senator intimates that this resolution is offered for an ulterior purpose. I have never shown any timidity in expressing my opinion about Mr. Hoover here or elsewhere. I hold no brief either for him or against him. This proposed investigation is based upon the charges that are made and solemnly recorded here. I do not know whether those charges are true or false. If they are not true, the facts ought to be disclosed. If they are true, they very gravely concern the public and the public business.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I have no intention to reflect on the motives of my friend the Senator from Missouri; but I do feel that in this time, when our nerves are all at high tension, and we only have 66 committees investigating, surely no Senator ought to oppose this investigation. We ought to have more committees out investigating, and I rose to support the resolution; and while it may appear facetious, it was my method of giving the country to understand that this investigation is a part of the policy that is now being pursued, and that the Senator from Missouri is the unwitting and innocent—he is perfectly honest—instrument that is being used to forward partisan plans. He is unconsciously being used to throw mud upon men who rendered valuable services during the Great War.

Now, I am told that I was wrong about Mr. Hoover being the person to be investigated; it is one Mr. Barnes. I never heard of Mr. Barnes before, but I think he ought to be investigated on general principles [laughter]; and I hope that no Senator will vote against this resolution; but it is time to tear away the camouflage that is being erected here, behind which politicians are artfully screening themselves and firing shots at other people. I do not include my friend from Missouri in that. I want the country to know that these 66, or it may be 76, investigations are now going on. You are investigating, but you never report, and the country has just as little confidence in your reports as it would have in the report of a police judge.

Mr. President, instead of investigating our fellow citizens, let us investigate ourselves and search our own consciences. Where is the peace treaty? Where is this treaty? Why is there no vote upon this treaty? Eighty-two Senators want a treaty. Are 82 to be overridden by 14? Why not vote upon this treaty? I am just as much opposed to a White House irreconcilable as I am to a Lodge irreconcilable. I want the Senate to do its duty regardless of Mr. Wilson's views, Mr. LODGE's views, or Mr. HITCHCOCK's views.

We talk about presidential candidates. I say again that Mr. Hoover never will be President, because he is not a Democrat; but if he would say the words, "I am a Democrat," he would be elected President, because he can do things.

On behalf of the American people I ask for action. I demand that the politicians who are now screening themselves behind this treaty come forth.

Let me tell you, Mr. President, why the politicians want the treaty before the Senate and want the treaty before the country in the coming campaign. The politicians hope that if they can keep the League of Nations—the peace treaty—on the screen before the country those politicians will escape a discussion of military training. They are afraid to discuss that. They can escape a discussion of the means of establishing a merchant marine. They know if they can keep the League of Nations before the country as an issue in the campaign they will not be required to discuss the Government ownership of public utilities, and the politicians dare not discuss that. They know that if they can keep the League of Nations before the country it will serve as artful camouflage behind which they can take refuge and prevent a discussion as to why they have failed to appropriate $250,000,000 for the irrigation of the deserts of the West. It will serve as artful camouflage to explain why you have passed no soldiers' settlement land law. The peace treaty and the League of Nations, if it goes into the campaign this fall, will serve as artful camouflage to excuse you from reducing the cost of living and curbing the profiteer.

It is time some masks were torn from the faces of officials, in the Senate and out of the Senate, so that the American people may know that their Government is capable of grappling with great public problems and settling them. They are asking us why we are not passing bills which will say to the American business man: "You may," "You may," instead of always saying to the American business man: "You may not." It is time we stopped ping-ponging great questions in this Chamber. It is time to call the roll, so that the American people may know who is responsible for the death of the peace treaty.

As a friend of the President, as one who has loyally followed him, I solemnly declare to him this morning: "If you want to kill your own child because the Senate straightens out its crooked limbs, you must take the responsibility and accept the verdict of history."

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield the floor. I have said enough. I have said too much, perhaps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. I yielded to the Senator from Arizona to ask a question. I think he has asked it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota, who rose first.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, so far as Mr. Barnes is concerned, whose name has been brought into this discussion, I wish to say that he does not object to any investigation the Senate desires to make. When Mr. Barnes heard of the grand jury report in the State of Washington, he immediately asked the Attorney General to make a thorough investigation, and, if there was anything wrong, to prosecute. I do not know Mr. Houser. I do know Mr. Barnes. I have known him for a good many years. As I have said before, when the war broke out Mr. Barnes disposed of his business, and he has given his time without compensation to the Government for the last three years. He has done the best he could with the Grain Corporation, and I know him to be an efficient and an honest man. He may make mistakes, but if he makes mistakes they are not intentional.

If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me for a moment, I would like to make a brief statement. I am not going to oppose the resolution, although the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has already investigated not this particular charge but the general standing of the Grain Corporation. The Senate will recollect that when the Grain Corporation was organized it was given a capital of $150,000,000. Since then it has made a profit by selling to neutral countries and now has a surplus, I believe, of about $50,000,000.

The crops of 1917 and 1918 were handled by that corporation without any additional appropriation from the Government. The Grain Corporation had to borrow large sums of money, and it was because the public had confidence in its management that it was enabled to get the money and not call on the Treasury for it.

I shall not go into the details of it, but we all remember that in the winter of 1919 the President had made a guaranty for the crop of 1919. That guaranty of $2.26 a bushel was made in September of 1918. There was an enormous planting of winter wheat, and it was expected by everyone I think in the winter of 1919 that there would be anywhere from eleven hundred million to twelve hundred million or thirteen hundred million bushels, and the public naturally, and the Treasury officials, were very much disturbed about how it was going to be handled. Congress came forward and appropriated $1,000,000,000 for the handling of the wheat crop of 1919. In addition the Grain Corporation had $150,000,000, and I understand $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 in surplus that it made out of selling grain to neutral countries, making something like $1,200,000,000 available for handling the crop. If we had had such a crop as people generally expected, it would have been needed, and undoubtedly the losses to the Government would have been great. Unfortunately for those who raised it, but fortunately for the Government Treasury, the crop was not equal to what was expected. It was somewhere about 950,000,000 bushels.

Mr. GRONNA. Nine hundred and eighteen million.

Mr. KELLOGG. Nine hundred and eighteen million bushels, the Senator from North Dakota says. Mr. Barnes hopes to be able not to touch a dollar of the billion-dollar appropriation or to use any of the capital of $150,000,000 and the $50,000,000 which has been made in profit; but we must realize that that will depend upon whether the grain market is above the Government guaranty or below it.

Out in Washington the grand jury charged that the price had been kept up by the Grain Corporation and here before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry some charged that it had been kept down. It could not have been both. As a matter of fact the Grain Corporation only buys grain or flour at the Government price, and when it goes above the Government price the public buys it and handles it as usual. The Grain Corporation to-day has on hand about 6,000,000 barrels of flour which it bought in the market at the Government price. Five million barrels represent spring wheat flour and will not keep over the hot weather. They have been unable to sell it to American purchasers and are now trying to sell it abroad, but the trouble is that the rate of exchange is so great that it is a question whether it can be sold before the hot weather arrives.

These are facts that I learn from the Department of Agriculture and officials of the Grain Corporation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. If I am correctly informed, there is a move on foot in the House to make an appropriation of 5,000,000 barrels of flour to take care of the suffering people of Europe. Does the Senator know whether that legislation is under way or not?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; it is. The Grain Corporation has the power to sell on credit, but I think the officers feel that they would not be justified in selling on credit unless they could get securities which were good. The Rules Committee of the House called before it Mr. Barnes and some other witnesses from the Department of Agriculture, and it appeared that people interested in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, and Armenia were asking that we give authority to the Grain Corporation to sell 5,000,000 barrels of flour on credit. The House has that measure under consideration, and I understand that it will probably be passed and will be submitted to the Senate. It is not appropriating anything, but simply authorizing the Grain Corporation to sell that amount on credit.

Mr. SMOOT. If that bill does become a law, then it will take care of the 5,000,000 barrels of flour to which the Senator has just referred, it being impossible to keep it over the hot weather?

Mr. KELLOGG. It probably will. I assure the Senator that I have no desire to prejudge or discuss these questions, but I think I should make the statement that one of the charges made was that the Grain Corporation would buy grain at the high prices now. Winter wheat is now somewhere in the neighborhood of 20 cents above the Government price, but they can not buy it except at the Government price, and they can do nothing except when it is offered at the Government price. Mr. Barnes is anxious to have the public absorb the balance of this crop, which I understand is in the neighborhood of 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels, or a little over, as stated by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. The report of the Department of Agriculture on March 8 gave it as 165,500,000 bushels. Of course, the Senator understands that it takes 30,000,000 bushels of that for seed. Mr. Barnes stated that there is a shrinkage of at least 5 per cent, which would be 46,000,000, and there are 23,000,000 bushels in dispute, which would really leave on the farms about 66,000,000 bushels.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not talking about what is on the farm. I am talking about what has to be sold abroad to take the year's crop.

Mr. GRONNA. If the report of Mr. Barnes is correct, that is between 170,000,000 and 180,000,000 bushels.

Mr. KELLOGG. To be sold abroad?

Mr. GRONNA. Which has to be sold abroad. The Senator knows that we had less than 300,000,000 bushels in the beginning—probably from 250,000,000 to 275,000,000 bushels to be sold for export.

Mr. KELLOGG. It was not my intention to go into the details of it. I hope, and Mr. Barnes hopes, that the balance of the wheat crop can be disposed of and taken by the public, and that he will be able to turn back the billion dollars and the capital of the company unimpaired into the Treasury. I hope so, as the Treasury sorely needs it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Does the Senator understand that the Department of Justice is making an investigation of this matter at the present time?

Mr. KELLOGG. I have been told that the Department of Justice is making an investigation, and after the report of the grand jury in Washington I think it should make an investigation.

Mr. HENDERSON. My information is that the grand jury report was referred to the Department of Justice for investigation and that the Department of Justice has taken it up. Is that correct?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I can shed a little light on that inquiry. I received word from Portland, Oreg., this morning, from the Federal district attorney there, stating that he is making a thorough investigation of the charges against Mr. Houser made by the grand jury some weeks ago.

Mr. REED. From whom did the Senator receive that information?

Mr. McNARY. From Mr. Humphreys, Federal district attorney in Oregon.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], I will say that the Department of Justice wrote a letter to the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate regarding this matter, and that committee after reading the letter determined that it was advisable to report this resolution. By reason of the communication of the Department of Justice I opposed a favorable report upon the resolution. I think it may be enlightening to have that letter presented to the Senate. I have a copy of it here. It is not very long, but it is very comprehensive and I may as well read it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], the chairman of the committee, is not in the Chamber at this time. He is attending a committee hearing. But I find on his desk the original of the letter, addressed to Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER, relative to this resolution, and I suppose the Senator intends to read from a copy of that letter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is what I intend to read from.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator did not read it, I had intended to do so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is dated March 3, 1920, and is addressed to Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER, chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

MARCH 3, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
Chairman Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CALDER: My attention has been called to the resolution offered by Senator REED (S. Res. 319) on yesterday relative to the charge of profiteering made by a grand jury at Spokane, Wash., and the remarks of Senator FERNALD on March 1 on the same subject. In view of the fact that one of the newspaper clippings submitted by Senator FERNALD contained a charge that I "pigeonholed" the report of the grand jury, I think it is proper for me to state to you the facts.

The report of the grand jury was filed in Spokane on the 7th day of February. It made charges against M. H. Houser, of Portland, Oreg., a vice president of the Grain Corporation. In a letter dated February 13 the clerk of the court, by direction of the judge, inclosed to me a copy of the report of the grand jury. This letter was received in my office on February 18. On February 17 I had a telegram from M. H. Houser, calling attention to the press reports and requesting a full and thorough investigation of the charges. On February 18 I telegraphed to the United States attorney at Portland to "investigate by grand jury or otherwise whether there is involved any violation of the food-control act or other act of Congress."

The United States district attorney at Portland has since been, and is now, investigating the charges which have been made against M. H. Houser. In this investigation he is receiving the cooperation of the United States attorney at Spokane, and is being supplied with every facility needed by him.

_____.

Mr. President, inasmuch as I have mentioned that I want to call the attention of the Senate again to what I conceive to be the inadvisability of adopting such resolutions as this without a thorough investigation of the necessity for the investigation. Ever since I have been a Member of this body it seems to have fallen to my lot to call attention to these matters. It has not been done in the past, but I hope the time is at hand when it will be done. These investigations, as has already been stated, in the vast majority of instances bring no result of value to the Senate or to the country. Here is a matter which, if it needs investigation at all, needs it by the Department of Justice. If there is anything in the report of the grand jury in the State of Washington regarding the matter, it indicates that somebody has violated the criminal laws of the country, and such proceedings as that should be investigated by a grand jury and not by a committee of the United States Senate. It seems to me that this is a waste of the public money, it is a waste of the time of the Senators who will be engaged in the investigation, and it ought to be left where the law leaves it, with the Department of Justice.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, now I would like to make my statement, and I will be through in a moment.

As far as Mr. Barnes is concerned, he does not object to any investigation. He asked the Attorney General to make one at once, and he understands it is now being made. I think, myself, if the Attorney General is investigating the subject of the violation of the law in the State of Washington, the Senate committee, when this is passed, should await the result of that investigation.

But as Mr. Barnes's name has been brought in, I simply wished to make that statement.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, just another question. Does the Senator know of any reason why this resolution should be adopted, in view of the fact that the Department of Justice is now investigating this matter?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not know of any.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Nevada if he took that same position when the question of investigating Senator NEWBERRY came on?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not here protecting anyone, or requesting that no investigation be made if there is any reason for making the investigation. My only objection is to a useless expenditure of money.

Mr. SMOOT. I intended to ask that question, Mr. President, of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. But I do not want to take the time of the Senate now on this matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, just one more word. I very much hope that if this committee goes into this question, they will go into the entire history of the Grain Corporation and all it has done; and I am sure that, so far as Mr. Barnes is concerned, they will find it a very able, honest, and efficient administration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the reference of this resolution to the Committee on Manufactures, nor am I disposed to object to the fullest and freest investigation of the subjects involved. I question a little bit the propriety of the Senate going into this question, just at this particular time, in view of the fact that an investigation is being had by the Department of Justice.

Mr. M. H. Houser, one of the vice presidents of the Grain Corporation, is a resident of my State, and, so far as I know, has up to this time sustained an excellent reputation. If it has been called in question, the fact has never been brought to my attention. I received a letter from him, under date of the 18th of February, in which he calls attention to this report of the grand jury; and he inclosed to me a two or three column article which he had had printed in the Daily Oregonian, at Portland, Oreg., in the way of defense and in the way of showing what he had attempted to do. I will not present it here now, because it can be presented to the committee at the proper time. He says in his letter:

I realize all fair-minded people have no patience with these inferences or insinuations. Either a man is guilty or he is not, but in the manner in which they have attempted to pillory me without making an indictment leaves me almost helpless, and I feel that I owe it to the Grain Corporation and to myself to turn the full light of investigation on the actions of these would-be assassins of human character.

This was written to me after he had appealed—and I assume, from what has been said here, that Mr. Barnes joined with him in the appeal—to the Department of Justice, asking for a full investigation. He had no way of reaching the public except through the public prints, or through an investigation before some judicial tribunal. The Attorney General of the United States, acting upon the appeal of the officers of the Grain Corporation, instructed the district attorney of Portland, Oreg., Mr. Lester W. Humphreys, who is not only an able man but a man of the highest character, to fully investigate this whole subject. He went up to Spokane, I note by the papers, though I do not know it of my own knowledge, and is cooperating with the district attorney up there; and the matter is still under investigation. The strange part about this whole situation to me, Mr. President, is that a grand jury, acting under the advice of a trained lawyer, should go to work and make a damning report against an individual without hearing him and without finding an indictment against him. It seems to me that if these men were justly criticized in the report of a grand jury, there must have been enough evidence to have warranted their indictment, prosecution, and conviction.

In view of the fact that the Government, through the Department of Justice, has started an investigation, I think it is rather unfortunate that another investigation should be had here, and yet I want it thoroughly understood that I do not oppose an investigation. If this constituent of mine, or if any of these officers of the Grain Corporation, are guilty, they ought to be punished. But it does seem hard to believe that men of the character and standing that these men have had would be guilty of undertaking to swindle the Government in the emergency of a great war.

We have had only one case since I have been here where a committee of Congress was investigating, and then the Department of Justice paralleled it with a similar investigation. I did not approve of that, but it was done. The Senate will remember that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs was investigating the expenditures by the aviation section of the War Department, and they were making some progress in the ascertainment of the facts involved, when for some reason it was thought best, after the Military Affairs Committee had gotten into the middle of things, that the Department of Justice should also hold an investigation. The Senate will remember that Mr. Justice Hughes was appointed to assist the Attorney General, and an investiagtion was had. We cooperated as fully as we could with the Department of Justice, furnishing them the facts we had, and when the report of the Committee on Military Affairs was in and the report of the Department of Justice was in, each of them having spent large sums of money, the result was practically the same. The Committee on Military Affairs undertook—and the distinguished Senator from Missouri was on the committee and knows all about it, to confine themselves to the expenditures of moneys, without going into the criminal end of it. But all of this could have been done by one tribunal, and I think the investigation of the officers of the Grain Corporation could be made by the Department of Justice, they having obtained first jurisdiction in the matter. It is my opinion now that when the resolution under consideration has been referred to the Committee on Manufactures that committee should, before expending large sums of money in an investigation, wait for a reasonable time to see the result of the investigation in progress by the Department of Justice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Missouri to proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 319.

Mr. REED. That has already been passed. I understood the Chair to rule that we were proceeding to consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the motion was to proceed with it.

Mr. KELLOGG. There was no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution as modified.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have no intention of opposing this resolution. I shall content myself by voting against it.

I feel it to be my duty, however, to make some reply to the position just announced by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I quite agree that the sooner we can vote upon this treaty the better. I have been prepared to vote upon it for a long time, and I think everybody knows what my vote will be. I do not think that any further discussion will change the vote of a single Senator.

The time which we are devoting to it might well be devoted to other matters, but I am not disposed to accept the inference of the Senator that if the treaty is out of the way we shall immediately proceed or shall proceed at all to the enactment of huge appropriations for any purpose whatsoever which are not absolutely necessary to the administration of public affairs. My people are as much interested in the development of irrigating schemes as are the people of any other Western State, but this is not the time—and I hope a majority of Senators will give assent to that assertion—for indulgence in huge appropriations for any purpose not thus necessary. Hence, if the treaty is disposed of, as I trust it will be very soon, the Senate will not devote its valuable time to the consideration of these special appropriation bills if I can help it.

I am not camouflaging or otherwise concealing my view upon that and other similar bills that are now pending in one House or the other; I am prepared to meet them at any time; and I think the sooner they are the subject of discussion the sooner the people understand how many applications are pending before us for huge sums of money from a Treasury that already confronts an enormous deficiency, the better it will be for them and the better it will be for us. So when the treaty is out of the way the time of the Senate will, I trust, be devoted to matters of really grave concern, but not involving raids upon the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

RURAL HOMES.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3477, being Calendar No. 299.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3477, being Calendar No. 299.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the bill, Mr. President?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Washington that it is what is known as the rural free-homes bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if it would not be possible to defer this matter until I can have Senate joint resolution 160, being Calendar No. 419, taken up? If the resolution is to be acted upon at all, it is important that it be acted upon to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that we had the rural free-homes bill under consideration for an hour and a half, I think, when it was previously before the Senate, and it may not take very long to dispose of it now. I should like at least to have this much legislation, affecting the lands of the United States, passed so that it may go to the other House and be acted upon before the close of this session of Congress.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The joint resolution to which I refer must likewise receive the approval of the other House, and if it is to become effective it should be passed not later than to-morrow. It is a resolution providing merely for the preservation and keeping current of the work of the Reclassification Commission, a work in which that commission have been now engaged for a year, and we expect by to-morrow—certainly not later than Saturday morning, to file the final report of the commission. If there is anyone in this Chamber, with the possible exception of the Senator from Utah, who objects to the passage of the resolution to which I refer, I have not been advised of that fact, and I hope the Senator from Utah will not object.

Mr. SMOOT. I can assure the Senator from New Mexico that there are more than the Senator from Utah who are opposed to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have been thus far unadvised as to any reason why anyone should object to the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. If we had the resolution under consideration, Mr. President, I would tell the Senator why; but I am very much concerned over proposed legislation that it will take time in the other House to pass and which ought to be passed. If we can use an hour or an hour and a half when the peace treaty is not under consideration, I think we ought to do so and pass this proposed legislation. The bill for which I ask consideration has been on the calendar since January 8, 1920, when a favorable report on it was submitted, and I should like very much to have it disposed of to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3477) to increase, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that this bill has heretofore been read twice and considered, and that certain committee amendments are pending to it. The Secretary will state the first amendment.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was, in section 1, page 1, line 5, after the word "ownership," to insert "within any State or Territory," so as to make the section read:

> That the Secretary of the Interior, through the Reclamation Service, is authorized to investigate and determine the feasibility of developing tracts of land in private ownership within any State or Territory, by reclamation and otherwise, for the purpose of subdividing the land and disposing of the same in farms and parcels at reasonable prices.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], whether he intends to submit any debate in support of this measure?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that when the bill was previously before the Senate I made a brief statement outlining its object. I am very sure that my colleague will remember my statement. At that time I referred to a report made by the Secretary of the Interior, which I thought I had on my desk. I will say to the Senator now that I intend to read an extract from that report, in order that it may be a part of the record here, if the amendments of the committee are agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to discuss the pending bill and another matter during the morning hour. I prefer, however, to postpone my discussion until the senior Senator from Utah shall have concluded, if it suits his pleasure, any observations he cares to submit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that I may have it in the RECORD, I desire now to read the brief statement in relation to the bill made by the Secretary of the Interior in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The Secretary of the Interior in referring to the land development, which includes the provisions of the pending bill, makes this statement:

> It was never more vital to the welfare of our people that a creative and outreaching plan of developing and utilizing our natural resources should go bravely forward than it is to-day. Ours is a growing country, and as its social and industrial superstructure expands its agricultural foundation must be broadened in proportion. The normal growth of the United States now requires an addition of 6,300,000 acres to its cultivable area each year, which means an average increase of 17,000 acres a day.

Fortunately, the opportunity for this essential expansion exists not only in the West, where much of the public domain is yet unoccupied, but in every part of the Republic. We have a great fund of natural resources in the very oldest States from Maine to Louisiana which invite and would richly reward the constructive genius of the Nation. It is claimed by those who have specialized for years on the subject of reclamation that the control and utilization of flood waters now wasted would produce within the next 10 years more wealth than the entire cost to the United States for the war with Germany.

After every other war in our history the work of internal development has gone forward by leaps and bounds and our people have thus quickly made good the economic wastes of the conflict. The needs of to-day are different from those of the past and require different treatment, but they are by no means beyond the reach of enlightened thought and action.

More than a year ago we began an earnest discussion of reconstruction policies, particularly with respect to the land. But nothing has been done. Not one line of legislation, not one dollar of money has been provided, except in the war of preliminary investigation. We stand voiceless in the presence of opportunity and idle in the face of urgent national need.

The great work of material development accomplished in the past has been done very largely by private capital and enterprise. Doubtless this must be the chief reliance for progress in the future. We should realize, however, that this method has involved losses as well as gains, for the Nation has sometimes been too prodigal in offering its natural resources as an inducement to private effort. Not only so, but with the exhaustion of the free public lands in our great central valleys—the most remarkable natural heritage that ever fell into the lap of a young nation—conditions of home making and settlement have radically changed.

There can be no doubt that there is an important sphere of action which the Government must occupy if we are to go steadily forward with the work of continental conquest and all it implies to the future of the Nation, but in suggesting practicable steps of progress at this time I do not forget the burden of taxation which confronts our people nor the delicate and difficult task which Congress is called upon to perform in trying to keep the national outgo within the national income. Hence, I am now suggesting such constructive things as the Government may be able to do through the exercise of its powers of supervision and direction and with the smallest possible outlay of money.

Under this head I put first the matter of suburban homes for wage earners; second, reclamation of desert, overflow, and cut-over areas, together with improvement of abandoned farms, under a system of district organization which may be made to finance itself; third, cooperation with various States in the work of internal development.

Mr. President, as a basis for this proposed legislation, I have just read from the report of the Secretary of the Interior. No citizen of the United States can read and study that report without being convinced beyond a question of doubt that America is facing a most serious situation. In years past, when immigrants were coming into this country at the rate of a million a year, with the fertile lands of the West unoccupied, the immigrants could move on through the cities of the East and find homes upon those unoccupied lands, and we had no difficulties to solve the question of feeding our ever-increasing population, but conditions are different to-day.

The day has arrived when such fertile lands susceptible of irrigation without the storage of water have been already cultivated. No person can live at present upon the public lands remaining without the conservation of water to irrigate them. But, Mr. President, we find in all parts of the country lands susceptible of successful cultivation, and particularly so in the Southern States—the lands known as swamp lands. All that is required to make those lands as fertile as the lands of those States which to-day are under cultivation is to drain them and then cultivate them; and when that cultivation takes place they will be among the richest lands in any part of this country, and crops of almost any kind can be raised upon them.

Mr. President, there are not merely a few acres of this kind of land; there are millions of acres; and what is needed to-day above all other things is concerted action and legislation, so that the Government of the United States will at least direct what should be done to reclaim these lands, and under the provisions of the bill now under discussion it will not cost the Government of the United States one penny to assist in bringing this about.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I am very much interested in the bill and very sympathetic with its purpose, but I should like to ask the Senator a question or two about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The bill does not apply merely to the Reclamation Service, but it applies to all kinds of lands, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. It applies to the cut-over lands in the Northwest, it applies to the arid and semiarid lands of the West, and it applies to the swamp lands of the South, or all privately owned lands that can be reclaimed.

Mr. KENYON. I think, under the terms of the bill, it would apply to any lands.

Mr. SMOOT. Any privately owned lands.

Mr. KENYON. I do not think that hurts the bill at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. KENYON. But I want to ask the Senator now just how it would operate, and what would be the Government's function? Take a piece of cut-over land, let us say, in Wisconsin, a couple of thousand acres in extent. It is thought that this land can be developed and sold in small tracts. Just how would that be done?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the bill the private owners of the lands would make an application to the Secretary of the Interior for an engineer from the Reclamation Service to make an examination of the lands which they desired reclaimed. Before the engineer is instructed to proceed to make the examination an estimate of the cost of the examination will be made, and the parties making the application for the engineer will deposit with the Secretary of the Interior the amount of expense that is thought necessary. Then the engineer is detailed to go upon the land and make an examination and make a report. After the examination is made, if the report is a favorable one, then the question of reclaiming the land is proceeded with, but the parties owning the land must at all times furnish the necessary money for all expenses, and during all of this time the Government of the United States is directing the work, with a view of following out the recommendations of the engineer.

Now, on the question as to how the owner will get the money, there is not a question of doubt in my mind—and I have consulted many of the financial men of this country who in the past have advanced money for irrigation purposes—that the money will be advanced and at a fair living rate of interest, based upon a favorable report of a Government engineer. The Senator knows that in the case of reclamation projects of the West that have been developed by private parties, when the project is completed as far as the engineer's report is concerned, and the party desiring to construct the reclamation project goes to New York or to Chicago, or to a money market anywhere in the United States, the first thing he finds out is that he must take 10, 15, 20, or 25 per cent reduction of the bonds that are to be issued. Then the next thing he finds out is that he must pay an exorbitant rate of interest; and the history of these projects is that 95 per cent of the irrigation projects of that character have failed, as far as the original promoters were concerned. They are sold out to the bondholders, perhaps, who held the bonds in the first instance, and then they continue the work, and all the time interest is being drawn upon the amount of money that is invested, and the Senator knows that in the case of all of those new projects it takes time to get people upon the lands under the project, and more than likely the second owners of the project will fail, and perhaps the third owner will make a success of it.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator now has gotten up to the point I want to ask him to explain. The work is all done now, we will say, on this large tract to which I have referred. The purpose of the bill is to sell this land to small owners.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Now, how is that done? Does the Government take charge of that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Government continues its direction.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose, after the work is all done, that the owners of the large tract conclude that the prospect is so good that they will not sell it?

Mr. SMOOT. No; a contract will be made beforehand with the original owners of the land, and it will be made under the provisions of the bill, and they will be compelled to comply with its terms.

Mr. KENYON. The Government would then conduct the negotiations in connection with the sales to small landowners?

Mr. SMOOT. They will have supervision of the sales to small owners.

Mr. KENYON. I was not quite clear how that would be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 4 of the bill provides—

That every contract for development of a project shall provide, among other things, that the developed farms and parcels, when sold—

That is the amendment that has already been agreed to—

shall be sold to persons who desire to occupy the same as homes, at the actual cost of the land and the development thereof plus a definite reasonable profit to the owner or owners stated in advance therein.

In other words, the Senator must know that in these irrigation projects that have been taken up in the past in the West, after the water has been developed, and the project becomes a demonstrated success, it is not a question of how much the cost; it is a question of how much they can get for the land and water; and therefore the home owner is not only penalized by the discount upon the bonds, he is not only penalized for the excessively high rate of interest, but he is also penalized for the excessive profits that can be made out of the project if it proves a success.

Mr. KENYON. The great purpose of this bill, then, is to help the man who desires to get a small tract of land, the Government acting in the way of an agent in that laudable purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. An agent and adviser.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is a splendid thing.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I am very curious to know what will be done where the State owns the swamp lands. The Senator said that in such cases, in cooperation with the States, certain drainage would be done. Can the Senator inform me what machinery would be called into operation then? Would the Government have any charge over the State lands which had been developed; and if so, what control would it have?

Mr. SMOOT. The Government could not do it, of course, unless the States were perfectly willing that they should do it, even if the bill provided for State-owned lands.

I want to call attention to a letter that I received just the other day from Mr. Clement S. Ucker, the vice president of the Southern Settlement and Development Organization, in relation to this bill. This letter is dated February 20, 1920, and addressed to myself as chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Public Lands, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SENATOR SMOOT: Your letter of February 13, in answer to correspondence from this office dated January 13. The Southern Settlement and Development Organization, of which the undersigned is executive vice president, and its allied development associations in the various Southern States, to wit:

North Carolina Land Owners' Association,
South Carolina Land Owners' Association,
Georgia Land Owners' Association,
Florida Development Board,
Mississippi Land Owners' Association,
Cut Over Land Utilization Department,
Southern Pine Association, are all interested in the provisions of your bill, Senate 3477.

I want to say in this connection that none of these organizations above referred to are in any sense of the word a commercial organization. They are very similar to the California Development Board. They are working for the development and utilization in a beneficial way in our day, as far as economically possible, of the unused and idle resources of the United States, particularly agriculture. I would wish that each of these organizations would be fully advised in the premises with reference to the legislation you have presented in Senate bill 3477. I believe the enactment of your bill, while not entailing one cent of expense upon the Treasury of the United States, nor, so far as I can see, will it ever entail any moral obligation upon the United States, will be of incalculable benefit to the southern country. It would put southern development forward from 50 to 100 years. It would do that thing to which Mr. H. T. Cory, consulting engineer of the United States Reclamation Service, after having carefully investigated the South, referred to as "adverse psychology against the South," and which must be broken and can be broken only by a historic pronouncement by some great agency such as the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I am not going to put the balance of the letter in the RECORD, but I wish to say that its praise of the legislation is such that I would like all Senators to hear, but few are present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I have read the bill, and it strikes me as a bill of very great merit, and I approve it as I understand it.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate once before, when this bill was up for discussion, to the fact that it does not impose a dollar of expense upon the Government of the United States, and perhaps for that reason it is not very popular. I know that there is very little legislation of that character; but if this bill becomes a law I have no doubt that it will be the means of developing millions of acres of land in the United States that to-day are as worthless as a dry bone.

Mr. George H. Maxwell, the executive director of the National Reclamation Association, in a letter addressed to me on March 1, 1920, calls particular attention to this character of legislation, and I am going now to call the Senate's attention to some statements made by Mr. Maxwell in a letter addressed to the members of the National Reclamation Association.

In that letter Mr. Maxwell makes the following statement:

This letter tells what should be done to prevent the commercial and industrial cataclysm that now threatens this country, which everyone who reads the daily papers must see is coming within a year or two, perhaps sooner, unless something is done, and done quickly, to prevent it.

Roger W. Babson, in his Detroit address, predicted it for 1921.

Every business concern that has ever at any time during the 20 years since it was organized been enrolled as a member of the National Reclamation Association will receive this letter. It should be read, every line and word of it, carefully, thoughtfully, slowly, and studiously from beginning to end the moment it is received.

Don't lay it aside to be read some other time. It is better to spend a little time that way right now and learn that there is a plan to safeguard against this impending danger, than to refuse to read, refuse to think, refuse to be warned, refuse to build safeguards, and just grope along blindly with the crowd, and finally be swept over the precipice and pitched headforemost into a seething crater.

COMING EVENTS CAST THEIR SHADOWS BEFORE.

No far-seeing and thoughtful man can fail to appreciate that in this country we are now standing on the brink of an abyss of commercial chaos, into which we are ultimately sure to fall, and then wade through the wreckage of a long period of industrial depression and hard times, with all the dangers that such conditions forecast of social disturbances, unless some plan is quickly adopted to create in our own country new wealth and new home markets to take the place of those that will be lost as the result of the war.

There undoubtedly is a way to build a safeguard against all these dangers, but to be effective it must be put in operation without delay and driven through with the same irresistible war energy and war speed that were aroused to defeat Germany.

That safeguard is to duplicate, as many times over as may be necessary, the miraculous enlargement of home markets and creation of new wealth that has followed the building of the Roosevelt Dam in the Salt River Valley in Arizona. That valley is now pouring $40,000,000 a year into the Nation's channels of trade from 300,000 acres, once an unproductive desert waste.

The doing of the infinite number of things necessary to control the floods and regulate the flow for all beneficial uses of the great rivers of the United States and their tributaries, as contemplated in the Newlands river regulation act, would utilize an asset now wholly wasted that would in a few years create wealth vastly larger than the cost to this country of the great war just ended.

The necessary preliminary legislation was enacted in August, 1917, more than two years ago, and it needs only that the members of the Newlands river regulation commission should be named and set to work to start this great movement to create a balance wheel for industry in the United States of America that will make it independent of foreign markets or foreign countries.

Among the very first things recommended by Mr. Maxwell in this letter is the enactment into law of Senate bill 3477, a bill to increase, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes. If the bill is enacted into law no section of the country can claim that in the development of land in this country it applies only to the Western States. The bill covers all sections of the country. If it were going to require an appropriation it would be fair, but under the provisions of the bill there is not one dollar to be paid by the Government of the United States; but with the organization that exists in the Interior Department to-day, the organization that has directed the projects of the West—bringing millions of acres of waste land in the West under that same organization—can be used with the same overhead expenses of to-day, not costing the Goverment of the United States an additional cent, and the waste lands in the South and the cut-over lands in the Northwest can be reclaimed and become the homes of happy people.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I asked the Senator a question a few moments ago in regard to lands owned by States, as to what machinery is provided in the bill for cooperating with the States in making this investigation? I see that the Senator's bill is confined to lands privately owned.

Mr. SMOOT. It is confined to private ownership. I do not think there is very much unreclaimed land now owned by the States.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is a good deal of swamp land.

Mr. SMOOT. Is there much swamp lands owned to-day by the States?

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, a great deal.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the figures, but I shall be glad to look them up, and I will tell the Senator what is the quantity.

If there had been a propaganda started for the passage of this bill, as is the case with almost every other class of legislation, there would be no question that the papers of the country would have taken up the subject, would have written articles in favor of it, and there would have been requests made from all parts of the United States upon Senators and Congressmen to support the measure. I wish to say that, with the little advertisement that came from its introduction into the Senate, there have been sent me letters from all parts of the United States, and so far I have not received a single letter objecting to the provisions of the bill, but every one is of a character of commendation and support.

If there is no objection, I should like to have the committee amendments agreed to.

Mr. KING. Let the amendments be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The READING CLERK. In section 1, line 6, page 1, before the words "by reclamation or otherwise," insert "within any State or Territory."

The amendment was agreed to.

The READING CLERK. In section 4, page 2, line 22, strike out—

All contracts for the purchase of lots and farms shall be made payable to the owner or owners of the land or their assigns.

And insert in lieu thereof:

All contracts for the purchase of farms and parcels shall be made for, and the moneys due thereunder shall be payable to, the owner or owners of the land or their assigns.

Mr. KING. Before considering that amendment I wish to ask my colleague whether the bill expressly excludes Hawaii, or whether, under the general law, it would be denied application to such a possession of the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the amendment which has just been agreed to, on page 1, line 6, inserting the words "within any State or Territory," would include Hawaii.

Mr. KING. I understood so, and I wondered whether the provisions of the measure were of such a character as that they would harmonize with the peculiar situation which exists in Hawaii.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not recall any part of Hawaii that it would conflict with, I will say to the Senator. I think that there is hardly a mile of land in all the islands of Hawaii that I have not either ridden over or walked over, and I do not remember any conditions that would arise in the Hawaiian Islands with which this bill would conflict in the least.

Mr. KING. The Senator has in mind the fact that the Governor of Hawaii and a commission from Hawaii have been here for some time with a view to securing Federal legislation dealing with various questions in the Territory of Hawaii? One of the important questions in that Territory is the land question. They have some archaic laws there which are wholly inadequate to meet the situation.

I take this opportunity, if my colleague will permit me, to make the observation that, in my opinion, there should be immediate legislation dealing with the land question in the Territory of Hawaii. Something ought to be done for the purpose of preserving and protecting the Hawaiian race from extermination. The vicissitudes to which they are subjected, the strong currents of so-called civilized life, are destroying the native Hawaiians. The Federal Government having assumed jurisdiction over the Hawaiian people and over the Hawaiian Territory, and having taken control of the land under laws which the Federal Government has superimposed upon the Territory, in my opinion it could with propriety do something to protect and preserve from extinction the Hawaiian race.

I sincerely hope that the measures which have been recommended by the governor of Hawaii and the commission who have visited the Capital to present the needs of that people to Congress may be enacted, and enacted quickly, to the end that relief may come and that the Hawaiian people may not suffer as other so-called inferior races have suffered from contact with the so-called superior races.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there is no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before this bill is reported to the Senate I desire to call attention to some of its provisions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	Nelson	Smoot
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Spencer
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Stanley
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sterling
Capper	Kellogg	Overman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Owen	Swanson
Colt	Kenyon	Page	Thomas
Curtis	Keyes	Phelan	Trammell
Dial	King	Phipps	Underwood
Edge	Kirby	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
France	Lenroot	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
Gay	McCormick	Sherman	Watson
Glass	McKellar	Simmons	Williams
Gronna	McLean	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Hale	McNary	Smith, S. C.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I am greatly delighted with the action of West Virginia in ratifying the Susan B. Anthony amendment, that at last the fulfillment is at hand of the prayer of Frances E. Willard and of the women of the world, whose inarticulate voice she expressed when she said:

Ah, it is women who have given the costliest hostages to fortune. Out into the battle of life they have sent their best beloved with fearful odds against them.

Oh, by the dangers they have dared; by the hours of patient watching over beds where helpless children lay; by the incense of 10,000 prayers wafted from their gentle lips to heaven, I charge you, give them power to protect along life's treacherous highways those whom they have so loved.

The world can never pay its debt to women. The world of mankind is created by women, is tenderly nurtured by women, is taught by women the great lessons of life, and without women there could be no home and no happiness on earth. I am profoundly gratified to see that the opinions of women have received new respect and have new power, and I am entirely convinced that the influence of women will always be found for the betterment of society, for the conservation and protection of human life, and for the happiness and welfare of the world.

Men need not fear the influence of women. In the great tragedy on which the Christian religion was founded, no woman promoted the crime committed by men.

Pilate's wife advised him to mercy and justice. No woman had a dishonorable part in the crucifixion of our Lord.

Not she with traitorous kiss her Savior stung,
Not she denied Him with unholy tongue;
She, when apostles shrunk, could dangers brave,
Last at the cross and earliest at the grave.

In a few days the two remaining States with Republican legislatures—Washington and Delaware—will act, I assume favorably, both because of the justice of the cause and out of respect to the women of America and to the wishes of the voters of 34 States who have already ratified. Seventeen million women already have the right to vote, and under their fixed policy to hold parties directly responsible these two Republican States will realize that justice and party expediency advise favorable action.

I ask to have printed in connection with my remarks the action taken by the different States relative to the ratification of the suffrage amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Ratification of suffrage amendment (amendment passed Congress June 4, 1919).

42 STATES WHICH HAVE ACTED.

Ratified:
1. Wisconsin, June 10.
2. Michigan, June 10.
3. Kansas, June 16.
4. Ohio, June 16.
5. New York, June 16.
6. Illinois, June 17.
7. Pennsylvania, June 24.
8. Massachusetts, June 25.
9. Texas, June 29.
10. Iowa, July 2.
11. Missouri, July 3.
12. Arkansas, July 20.
13. Montana, July 30.
14. Nebraska, August 2.
15. Minnesota, September 8.
16. New Hampshire, September 10.
17. Utah, September 30.
18. California, November 1.
19. Maine, November 5.
20. North Dakota, December 1.
21. South Dakota, December 4.
22. Colorado, December 12.
23. Rhode Island, January 6.
24. Kentucky, January 6.
25. Oregon, January 12.
26. Indiana, January 16.
27. Wyoming, January 27.
28. Nevada, February 7.
29. New Jersey, February 10.
30. Idaho, February 11.
31. Arizona, February 12.
32. New Mexico, February 19.
33. Oklahoma, February 27.
34. West Virginia, March 10.

Special sessions:
1. Washington, March 22.
2. Delaware, March 22.

Defeated:
1. Alabama, September 2.
2. Georgia, July 24.
3. Mississippi, January 21.
4. South Carolina, January 24.
5. Virginia, February 12.
6. Maryland, February 17.

6 STATES WHICH HAVE NOT ACTED.

States in which legislatures would ratify if called into session; no regular sessions until 1921:
1. Connecticut; governor, Republican; antisuffragist.
2. Vermont; governor, Republican; antisuffragist.

States which can not vote this year because of constitutional provision requiring election to intervene between submission of and action on an amendment; both would ratify:
1. Florida; majority of legislature called on Senators to vote for amendment.
2. Tennessee; presidential suffrage.

States in which legislatures do not show majority that warrants demanding special session:
1. Louisiana; meets in May.
2. North Carolina.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am sure the country is viewing with much interest the plot which is rapidly unfolding itself in Europe. It all has a close relation to our action in connection with the treaty of peace with Germany. Not only Europe, but the whole Near East, and I might say the whole Orient, seem to be in a condition of flux. The great Russian Empire is in the throes of chaos.

I desire to read a short petition which I have received in relation to the apprehended recognition by this Government of the soviet government of Russia. It is as follows:

NEW HAVEN, CONN., February 25, 1920.

To the honorable Senate of the United States in Congress assembled:

The petitioner respectfully represents, on behalf of millions of American citizens, members of all religious organizations, and of none—but all believing that a basic principle of civilized government must be toleration and protection of perfect freedom for the exercise of all religions—that no recognition of an official sort should be given by the United States to the so-called soviet government of Russia until it disavows and reverses its policy and practice toward religion and all its institutions and professors—in that it has proscribed all religion and persecuted, tortured, and murdered religionists in great numbers.

With humble obedience,
Your servant, ERVING WINSLOW.

Mr. President, it can not be otherwise than that the American people, living here in the land of the free, where religious belief and the right to worship the Supreme Being according to one's own conscience is guaranteed to every citizen in the country, must view with some alarm the statement so frequently made now in the press that there is some intention on the part of the executive branch of this Government to recognize the soviet government of Russia. We are not permitted to know what the intentions of the executive branch of the Government are in this matter. The Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate has no information upon the subject. I do not suppose that any Senator has the slightest idea of what may lie in the mind of the President on this question.

When the framers of our Constitution formulated that immortal document they assumed that the Senate would have something to do with the foreign relations of this country and with the policies of the country toward other nations.

At the time the Constitution was formed, or was in process of formation, there was no Federal Government in this country. There were 13 States, which had recently achieved their independence from Great Britain. They sent delegates to a convention to form a more perfect Union. They formed the Constitution, and provided in the Constitution that each one of those then sovereign States should be represented in the Senate of the United States by two of its citizens, who should be United States Senators.

In their opinion the States represented in the Senate would have something to say in behalf of the great Nation which they hoped would be formed and which has now come to be the greatest, richest, and most powerful in the world, with 110,000,000 of the best-educated people in the world. They thought their Senators, in other words, the States themselves acting in this body, would have something to say about what should be the foreign policy of this country. The only clauses in the entire Constitution which give the President of the United States anything to do about foreign relations are those which provide that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls," and that "he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers."

Out of those two statements has grown the entire theory which we see now put into practice, that the Executive, and the Executive almost alone, shall recognize Governments as they appear and shall be practically in control of our foreign relations without any consultation whatever with anybody, except as he desires to be advised.

Mr. President, whether or not that theory of the Executive control of our foreign relations can be justified is a very serious question; whether it is wise that the Senate should coincide with the view of the Executive, as I have described it, as to his power to control foreign relations is certainly a pertinent question before the Senate in connection with the treaty. To me it seems a very dangerous proposal; and I do not think it ought to be acquiesced in in toto.

The President himself, in his writings upon the subject of Government, has stated—I do not quote him verbatim, but substantially—that under this theory it is within the power of the President, in his appointment of ambassadors and his instructions to them, in his capacity of the voice which speaks to foreign nations on behalf of this Nation, so to institute and carry on the negotiations, arrange matters, and make diplomatic representations, entirely unbeknown to the people of the country and in the secrecy which is accorded to the proceedings of the State Department, as to place the country before the powers of the world in a situation where it is impossible for the Congress to extricate itself when the knowledge of what has been done is at last fully revealed to the country. That may be a democratic form of government; that may be a system under which every American citizen is the equal of every other American citizen; it may be wise; but, Mr. President, it seems to me to be entirely inconsistent with the fundamental ideas of a great democracy.

The President is the most powerful executive in the world. In the great British Empire, whose possessions circle the earth, whose island fortresses dot every sea, and whose dominions extend from the icy mountains to the coral strands of India, their executive is simply an heredity descendant of the kings of England who used to be practically despots. He has almost no power, either as a legislator or as a jurist or as an executive. It has been said that he is merely a figurehead; he is referred to as "the Crown." The legal proceedings of the British Empire are conducted in the name of "the Crown"; the counsel for the Government is "the Crown counsel." The King and the royal house, tenderly loved and venerated by their subjects, confine themselves to social functions.

The real Government consists of the House of Commons and the premier who has formed the cabinet. When that Government falls, as it always does when it ceases to command a majority in the House of Commons, an appeal is made to the country; a new election is immediately held. If that election be adverse to the party in power, the King's function is confined to calling upon the leader of the party of the "outs" who has just come into power and asking him to form the Government.

The King appears before the House of Commons and reads his speech from the throne, which is written for him by the new prime minister. Of course, he can discuss with his subjects questions affecting the empire; but his part in the Government is purely advisory. He must maintain himself in a position where he will have the confidence of all of his subjects, no matter what party is in power. He is representative of the whole country; he is not a party leader; he holds himself so that whichever party is in power his relations with them are amicable. He names as noblemen of his empire whomever, according to the exigencies of politics and the judgment of his prime minister, it is deemed wise to name.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator let me instance the recent elevation of Mr. Sinha, an erudite Hindu, to a place in the House of Lords, under the title of Lord Sinha, in order that he might there act as undersecretary for the India office. A little before that Mr. Max Aiken, who made a sudden fortune in Canada and who now controls two active and very anti-American newspapers in London, became a peer under the poetic title of Lord Beaverbrook.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Illinois for calling attention to that. I had not kept track of the good things that were coming to the faithful on the other side, and I do not know what the significance of it is.

Mr. McCORMICK. I do not know, but there may be some coming to us on this side; I had forgotten to mention Lord Astor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They will not come to us on this side, without the consent of Congress, unless the Constitution is to be ignored.

Mr. McCORMICK. There is another Senator resurrecting the Constitution; that is twice it has been done within a week.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not resurrecting it in the sense of doing any damage to its remains, I assure the Senator.

The President of the great Republic of France has almost no power. The power of France is exercised by the Chamber of Deputies, by their bureaucracy, and by their departments. I mention this for the purpose of showing that in other countries the power of the executive is a mere fraction of what it is in this country; and I mention it for the purpose of showing that more and more America, the freest democracy there is in the world, is coming to familiarize itself with if not consent to the theory that the President has all the power there is in the country except where Congress may intervene to check it. That is not a good thing to get abroad; it would not have been tolerated 50 years ago; but in the language of the old poet:

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Now, the people of the country hardly think it is their business to ask what should be the position of this country in relation to any foreign country or with whom we should make an alliance. Anybody who is familiar with the history of the country shortly after the formation of the Constitution, with the policies of Jefferson and Washington and Adams, knows that the controversy which then shook this country to its foundation stones raged around whether or not we should make a French alliance. Nobody knows what is on the program. When, at the pleasure of the Executive, the correspondence is given out to the public, upon such occasions and in such quantities as the executive branch of the Government may see fit to publish, we hear that the policy of America as between Italy and Jugo-Slavia is this, that, or the other thing; that America's position is this or that; that the Government of the United States of America will not consent to this, that, or the other thing.

It is stated in the press that the French Ambassador to this country called upon the State Department yesterday, commissioned by the supreme council or the three allied premiers abroad, to ascertain the view of this country as to backing up and approving of the alleged scheme of Great Britain and France to take possession of the Ottoman Empire. Our 110,000,000 people have not the slightest idea, except as they may judge of the future by the past, what benevolent intentions those powers have toward an empire in the Near East, extending into Asia. It is reported in the press that a huge British squadron has sailed for the Sublime Porte; that the intention of the British Government is to execute a great coup, to arrest peremptorily high officials of the Turkish Government, to take possession of Constantinople and the Dardanelles, to prevent Russia from ever realizing her dream of controlling the waterways between the Mediterranean and the Black Sea, and we are told in the press that those Governments desire to know what the American policy on that great question will be.

It is not alleged that any of those Governments are at all interested as to what the American people think about it, or which side they want to fight on, if they want to fight at all. No intimation is made that it may be of the slightest interest to the Congress of the United States, or the Senate of the United States, and the people do not appear to take any interest or care about it; but I assume that if a voice is heard thundering from Mount Sinai some day, saying that the ideals of America are that the British policy, which is not yet known to us, must be sustained, everybody will say: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" and we will be "quitters," and "pygmies," and men who do not "have visions," or see things, unless we immediately fall down and say: "That was what we entered the war for! That was our noblest and most dearly cherished ideal. That is what our gallant boys fought for. They were conscious of it all the time they were fighting, at Chateau-Thierry and elsewhere. They were fighting in order that the British squadron might capture Constantinople and hold it as trustee, of course, for the benefit of humanity, which is our sole and exclusive mission now."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. I should like to ask the Senator if, in the pantheon of the league, Diana has been elevated to Mount Sinai? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; that was a different occasion. My dim recollection is that there was but one occupant of Mount Sinai, and there were no Dianas in the neighborhood. [Laughter.]

We are daily confronted with new and portentous world fulminations. I read from a prophet who signs himself "David Lawrence" in the Star last night. We have had some discussion about the Monroe doctrine here. To some it has seemed to be an antiquated affair that we ought to get rid of in the interest of humanity.

Indeed, one of the great virtues of this treaty of peace, which seems to have promoted so much discord in the world, is that the Monroe doctrine was such a good thing that it ought to be passed along and extended to the whole world; so, if it was going to be, and if it was going to cover the world like a soothing poultice, a warm lambskin blanket, it was of pertinency to ascertain what it was. Whereupon one of our Central American neighbors and friends, Salvador, perked up and wrote a letter to the State Department, before they guaranteed this thing and agreed to preserve it and extend it, to find out what it was, as at present interpreted; and the Prophet Lawrence, who knows all things, esoteric and recondite, rushes into print here, in the Washington Star—for the benefit of humanity only, of course—and says that—

The Government of Salvador, through its alert minister here, was careful not to try to define the Monroe doctrine, respecting the same as purely a national policy of the United States. But at the same time it was deemed not improper to ask the United States for an interpretation. Acting Secretary Polk, in his formal note to Salvador, said:

"The views of this Government with reference to the Monroe doctrine were set forth in the address of the President of the United States to the second pan-American scientific congress, copy of the pertinent portions of which I beg to attach herewith."

And that is such a novel and vital and important thing that I hasten to put into the RECORD the new Monroe doctrine.

EXTRACT FROM 1915 SPEECH.

Then follows this extract from the speech of President Wilson January 9, 1915:

"The Monroe doctrine was proclaimed by the United States on her own authority. It always has been maintained and always will be maintained upon her own responsibility. But the Monroe doctrine demanded merely that European Governments should not attempt to extend their political systems to this side of the Atlantic. It did not disclose the use which the United States intended to make of her power on this side of the Atlantic.

"It was a hand held up in warning, but there was no promise in it of what America was going to do with the implied and partial protectorate which she apparently was trying to set up on this side of the water; and I believe you will sustain me in the statement that it has been fears and suspicions on this score which have hitherto prevented the greater intimacy and confidence and trust between the Americas. The States of America have not been certain what the United States would do with her power. That doubt must be removed. And latterly there has been a very frank interchange of views between the authorities in Washington and those who represented the other States of this hemisphere—an interchange of views charming and hopeful because based upon an increasingly sure appreciation of the spirit in which they were undertaken. These gentlemen have seen that if America is to come into her own, into her legitimate own, in a world of peace and order, she must establish the foundations of amity so that no one will hereafter doubt them. I hope and I believe this can be accomplished.

"These conferences have enabled me to foresee how it will be accomplished. It will be accomplished in the first place by the States of America uniting in guaranteeing to each other absolutely political independence and territorial integrity. In the second place, and as a necessary corrollary to that, guaranteeing the agreement to settle all pending boundary disputes as soon as possible and by amicable process; by agreeing that all disputes among themselves, should they unhappily arise, will be handled by patient, impartial investigation and settled by arbitration, and the agreement necessary to the peace of the Americas that no State of either continent will permit revolutionary expeditions against another State to be fitted out on its territory, and that they will prohibit the exportation of the munitions of war for the purpose of supplying revolutionists against neighboring Governments."

PROPOSALS UNAVAILING.

It will be noted that President Wilson virtually proposed to the Latin American Governments at that time what he has suggested in article 10 of the covenant. Indeed, nothing came of the three proposals because of the outbreak of the war, which upset international relations everywhere, but the most vital principles set forth by Mr. Wilson in January, 1915, have now been embodied in the covenant, and the new members of the league from Central and South America would be able to invoke article 10 if the United States did not respect their political independence or territorial integrity. That is why the insistence of certain Senators that the United States assumes no obligation under article 10 has been misunderstood in other parts of this hemisphere. It has been feared that the Senate did not want to pledge itself not to take territory from neighboring countries. That is why Mr. Wilson's definition of the Monroe doctrine as a principle of nonaggrandizement by the United States, as well as European countries, assumes new importance in Central and South America and is regarded as about the most important announcement on inter-American policy that has been made since the end of the European war.

Mr. President, if that is the President's idea of what the Monroe doctrine is, I, for one, can not agree with him.

I do not think the Monroe doctrine had anything to do with any intention upon the part of the United States to guarantee the political independence or territorial integrity of any State in Central or South America or elsewhere. The Monroe doctrine was simply a warning by this country issued to the world that we would regard as an unfriendly act the attempt of any foreign power to establish its political institutions on this continent—just that and no more. The application which various administrations may make of that to the facts as they arise no one can tell. Mr. Cleveland made one application of it in the Venezuela crisis. The Senate made an application of it or of a very closely analogous case when it passed a resolution here a year or two ago in relation to the contemplated cession by Mexico of Magdalena Bay in Lower California as a Japanese naval base or coaling station.

The Monroe doctrine is simply a sign set up by us for other nations to "keep off the grass"; that if they attempt to put their political systems on this continent it will be regarded as an unfriendly act, and we will then decide what we want to do about it, whether we want to repel that unfriendly act by force or not. But how anyone can claim that what was practically a warning, a defiance of the world, has anything to do with guaranteeing the territorial integrity or political independence is beyond my power to understand.

Mr. President, it appears that the President had tried to get the South American and Central American powers to agree to enter into this covenant, so far as American affairs were concerned, before the breaking out of the war. He had article 10 all drawn to apply to America. Does anyone believe the Senate would have ratified a treaty providing that the United States would guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of all the Central and South American powers? Why on earth should we undertake to preserve the territorial integrity of Patagonia, Ecuador, Chile, or Peru? Why should we want them mutually to guarantee or to undertake to preserve our political independence or territorial integrity? Does anyone here in America think that they could do it if they did undertake it? Does anyone believe that if any of the great military powers of the Old World were in a position to dispute our political independence or to violate our territorial integrity, that the Republics of South and Central America could stop them? What sort of a notion is this anyway?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS. I presume that the Senator noticed that the announcement to which he is referring is mutual; that the United States under the Monroe doctrine has the same guaranty of its territorial integrity and political independence that it furnishes to the other Western Hemisphere governments?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator means under the Monroe doctrine, which I just read, as announced on yesterday?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; as outlined in the announcement of yesterday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. That is, I think, an elaboration of the Monroe doctrine which would indicate that it was not a regional understanding at all, but a policy that involved mutual covenants and mutual obligations among a great many nations, and in that respect certainly a development of the Monroe doctrine, to say the least of it, that is unique.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, whatever the words "regional understanding" as used in the amendment which was put in the treaty of peace with Germany may mean in the language of diplomacy, I would hardly think that they applied to an arrangement of two or three continents—North, Central, and South America. Of course, I utterly repudiate the idea that the Monroe doctrine was any kind of an understanding, regional or otherwise. It was merely our declaration of policy. I do not know of a single government on the face of the earth that has said that they understood it or agreed to it, either. "Understanding" means an agreement in that sense—"regional understanding." If there is any government that ever assented and said that they would be bound by our assertion concerning the Monroe doctrine, I would like to know which one it is.

Article 10 of the treaty of peace with Germany provides:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

The Senate at the last session adopted what is known as the Lodge reservation to that article of the treaty, which read as follows:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Now, the treaty provided that we undertook to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. The Lodge reservation which I have just read repudiates that obligation point blank. There can be no question about that. In fact, that is the criticism which the President in his letter to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] the other day met upon the Senate reservation. He says it nullifies it. That was the intention so far as this Government is concerned, to absolutely nullify any undertaking on our part to preserve either the political independence or the territorial integrity of any nation, whether a member of the league or not.

In the newspapers last night there was published what purports to be a proposed modification of the Lodge reservation, which was adopted and stands as the sense of the Senate, and which Lord Grey wrote the London Times was acceptable to them. The proposed modification is as follows:

> The United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, in the exercise of full liberty of action, shall, by act or joint resolution, so declare.

It will be observed that in the proposed modification which I have just read the United States does not say that it will not assume any obligation to preserve the political independence and territorial integrity—not at all. It simply says that the United States assumes no obligation to employ its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country. Does that assume the obligation or repudiate it? If that proposed modification should be adopted, the treaty stands there as written. Article 10, which I have heretofore read, is still in the treaty, ratified by all the other signatory nations and in operation, and the obligation is there in article 10, in that treaty. It is also upon us, if we ratify the treaty and become a member of the league, unless we adopt such a reservaton as will exclude us from it and take the obligation off of us.

Does this proposed modification take the obligation off of us? No. It leaves article 10 in the treaty, we entering the league under it, stating that the members of the league undertake to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and political independence. Does this proposed modification that I have just read deny that obligation? No; it simply says that we will not use the Army or Navy or economic forces, and so forth, of the country in preserving the territorial integrity.

Mr. President, I maintain that if there is any one thing in which we ought to be perfectly clear and plain spoken, it is in trying to use language which will create a meeting of the minds, especially when we are dealing with a great multi-party treaty which is going to involve our relations with all the nations of Europe eventually. I think the American people are entitled to know exactly what obligations we are assuming, if any. I think the Senate, in justice to itself, ought to be agreed, when they make this great international contract, which they say is going to be the salvation of civilization, whether this country is bound to do certain things, and, if so, what it is bound to do. If we do not understand the agreement that we make, how can we expect anyone else to understand it?

See what a situation this country and the Senate would be in if we adopted and the President should file the instrument of ratification containing any such reservation as I have just read as the proposed modification. Those Senators who favor the modification of the reservation, that group of Senators who are designated as the mild reservationists——

Mr. THOMAS. Mild nullifiers.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not termed nullifiers by me, but the President calls them that. But the mild reservationists, especially the Republican mild reservationists, voted for the Lodge reservation repudiating all obligation under article 10, and they have repeatedly announced upon the floor of the Senate that they would never consent to any change in principle of the Lodge reservation which repudiated all obligation under article 10. Therefore, if they advocate the adoption of this proposed modification they must, if they are in good faith, and they are, do it upon the ground that it does not make any change in principle, that it is a mere change in phraseology. Very well! Then if it does not make a change in principle, it repudiates all obligation in the opinion of the mild reservationists.

The President, however, in his letter to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] stated that article 10 and its obligations should not be weakened at all, and the clear implication is that he would decline to file the instrument of ratification if any reservation were put on by the Senate which does weaken it.

Therefore, if the President should file the instrument of ratification he, as our spokesman on foreign relations—he, the man who negotiated this treaty and the man who assumes to interpret it, not only to us but to the world—of course will have to say: "Why, just as I wrote Senator HITCHCOCK, this modification of the Lodge reservation upon article 10 leaves the obligation just where it was. All that this modification does is to say that we will not use the Army and Navy and the economic resources of the United States to enforce the obligation. Therefore I file the ratification with pleasure, because the Senate has yielded to my view about it, and has brought itself clearly within the conditions of the letter which I wrote Senator HITCHCOCK."

What is our country to believe about it? What are 110,000,000 of American people, including the gallant boys who fought the war and won it, or helped to win it, to think? Whom are they to believe? The President will be proclaiming to the world, "We have assumed the obligation which I say is the bulwark of the whole covenant, and which we could not repudiate with honor," and the Senate, which drafted the modification, and the Senators who voted for it, on record here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, our official publication, will be of record as saying that we have not assumed the obligation.

Mr. President, this is no trifling matter. There is a serious condition in the world. Not only this country but every member of the league, if we are to enter it, being our partners in the league, are entitled to know what obligation we have assumed, whether we have assumed the same obligation that they assumed when they signed the treaty; and every other nation is entitled to know whether they are a member of the league or not. How are they going to find out?

This would be a purely Delphic utterance. I remember reading in one of the classics, when I was engaged in a better occupation than I now am, that there was a Delphic utterance once to the effect that the Greeks the Romans shall conquer, and both sides proceeded upon the theory they had the right from the gods that they were sure winners, and each one was justified in interpreting it his way; but it was very expensive to one of them.

Are we bound or are we not? And if so or if not, who is to decide it?

Is this country of 110,000,000 people going to be dragged into this league with an interpretation upon our duty which in one view of it involves the expenditure of every dollar that may be wrung from the American people and the deaths of all its men of fighting age, and in the other view of it involves an expression of our good wishes and hearty moral felicitations and that they shall fight it out to suit themselves? Are we to send our battalions over there to help the men who claim we are bound by this obligation; or are we to send them, as the mascot did, a basket of eggs and a letter of good advice?

Do we want to buy ourselves into that kind of a lawsuit? What is the intention of the Senate, anyway? We ought to have an intention ourselves. What do we intend to do?

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator place an improper construction upon article 10? If I apprehend his position correctly, it is this, that article 10 imposes a separate, singular, or independent obligation upon the United States to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of every member of the league, and not a joint obligation, or, at least, if there is a joint obligation, there is also a separate or sole obligation. Is not the proper interpretation of article 10 this, that there is a joint obligation upon the part of the signatories of the league to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the other members of the league, but that that obligation does not become effective until and unless the council, after they shall have considered the matter, shall unanimously make recommendations, and even then each signatory to the league must determine for itself, in the light of the circumstances of the case, its duty and how it will discharge that obligation?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I put it to the country right on the Senator's statement, Is that the proposition that the country is to decide after we enter the league? Is the thesis which the Senator from Utah has presented to be the subject of discussion in Congress when a great war breaks out in Europe, and they need us to come across, under our sacred undertaking, expressed in these words: "The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence"?

When they call upon us to fulfill our obligation, whatever it is, and the crisis is on, and civilization is trembling in the balance, is then the Senator from Utah to suggest to the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States to take up for discussion the question which he has asked me?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, is the Senator propounding that as a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; not to the Senator, but to the world.

Mr. KING. Then, of course, it would be improper for me to trespass on the time of the Senator to answer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator say anything he wants to. It is not a trespass on me.

Mr. KING. It is very courteous of the Senator. As I understood the question of the Senator it was this, whether or not, in the event of war in Europe or somewhere else, we would be compelled to act and not spend our time in debating in Congress what we should do in the premises. I think that the practical application of article 10, as well as the other obligations of the treaty, would not require the United States, but, indeed, would prevent the United States from going to the war-stricken district with money or with soldiers until Congress had acted, and that until then the obligation would not be actually effective or operative as against the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask a question there?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If the Senator's construction is correct just as he has given it, what would be the difference between the Lodge reservation, which says we assume no obligations unless Congress shall hereafter make them, and the substitute for the Lodge reservation, which says nothing about not assuming the obligation, but allows us to sign the treaty with an obligation in it? That is to say, does not the Senator come out of exactly the same hole that the Lodge reservation is in? Does not the construction he gives now place him squarely where the Lodge reservation clearly places us?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I again apologize to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has my consent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not assume that I would be in any hole, or come out of any hole.

Mr. REED. I do not mean in the sense the Senator is implying.

Mr. KING. I do not know that the Lodge reservation would place those who accept it in a hole. But, Mr. President, the way that I interpret article 10, in brief, is this: That if there is any obligation it does not become effective as to the United States until—and using the language of the Senator from Idaho—unless the council shall consider the matter and make recommendations, and submit those recommendations not only to the United States, but to all signatories of the league; and Congress, itself, exercising its discretionary power under the Constitution, shall determine what it may do or shall do in the circumstances of each case. If that interpretation is the equivalent of the Lodge reservation, then so much the more fortunate for Senator LODGE to agree with my interpretation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator in his last statement varied a little in his language from his first statement, of course, unintentionally. But I would like to get, if I may have the permission of the Senator who has the floor, the exact understanding of the Senator from Utah. Let me now state it. There are two views. The one is that when we enter this treaty, without any reservation at all, we thereby agree, either jointly or severally, that we will preserve against attack the various members of the league, and that that is an absolute obligation; and clearly that is the obligation of the league, unless subsequent language modifies it. The Lodge reservation states that we do not assume that obligation at all unless hereafter and in a particular case Congress sees fit to assume it.

The substitute for the Lodge reservation, which we are now discussing, omits the language by which we state that we do not assume any obligation, and does contain substantially the language of the Lodge reservation, that we do not agree to raise any armies or navies hereafter, and to use them in a war, without the action of Congress.

If I understand the Senator, he takes the position that if this treaty is passed without any reservation at all, nevertheless this Government is not bound to furnish a single soldier and is under no obligation to furnish a single soldier, unless two things happen as conditions precedent: One, that the council shall call for the soldiers; and, secondly, that that action of the council shall be concurred in by the Congress, and that it is only after both of those things have happened that the obligation arises. Is that the view of the Senator?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I shall not take the time of the Senator from Connecticut fully to analyze article 10 as I interpret it in connection with article 11 and article 16. The statement which I made a moment ago, perhaps, was a little too broad, taking into account whatever obligations arise under article 11 and under article 16, but my interpretation of article 10 can be no better expressed than by a reservation which I have tendered, and, with the permission of the Senate, I shall read it. It is as follows:

The United States understands that by article 10 the United States undertakes separately to respect the territorial integrity and existing political independence of each other member of the league; but that article 10 does not impose upon the United States the separate, sole, and singular duty to preserve the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every member of the league as against the external aggression of the other powers; but only that in case of such aggression or threat of the same the council will advise upon the means for preserving the territorial integrity and existing political independence of the member against which such aggression is exerted, and will recommend to members of the league the measures which it may deem proper and necessary to protect the covenants of the league, and that the United States may consider such recommendations and take such action as Congress may in its discretion deem appropriate in such case.

Mr. REED. That is a very good statement in form, but still, if we have no reservation, does the Senator think that we have assumed either jointly or severally an obligation to preserve the territorial integrity of other countries; that the obligation exists? I am not speaking about the means of carrying it out.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say this: I am not able to place upon article 10 the same broad or technical—I do not know which would be the appropriate term to express the idea—interpretation placed upon it by its author—the President of the United States.

In my opinion, the League of Nations as a whole, properly interpreted—the way I should interpret it; the way I think it should be interpreted—imposes no sole or separate or singular obligation upon the United States to preserve the territorial integrity or the political independence of any nation, but that in any event when there is aggression, when there is a broken covenant, it imposes upon the council the duty of making recommendations. Then it is left to the United States, under the circumstances in each particular case, to take those steps which Congress, under the circumstances, deems to be proper and appropriate.

Mr. REED. Are we perfectly free to take no steps at all? That is to say, if the Senator will let me state it in propositions——

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. REED. Proposition 1: We sign a treaty by which we say, "We hereby agree to protect against external attack the territory of all members of the league." Proposition 2: The council shall advise upon the methods of enforcing this obligation. We will take those two propositions. Now, we do sign the league. As I understand the Senator, there is no obligation of the United States, in his opinion, to move at all until the council has advised the method. Very well. Now, we will assume the council has advised the method. Is the United States, then, under any obligation whatsoever to have Congress take the action necessary to send its Army or is it free, as free as though the treaty had never been signed, either to send its Army or to withhold its Army?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, answering that question categorically, I think I should be compelled to admit that it was the purpose, doubtless, of the drafter of the league to impose some sort of an obligation upon the members of the league jointly after the council had acted and had made their recommendations; and probably, under a technical interpretation of article 10, there would be some sort of obligation or duty, from a moral rather than legal standpoint, upon the United States and every other signatory of the league to do something to punish the covenant-breaking State. To that extent it would not leave the United States or other signatories to the league absolutely free to do just the same as they might do in the event of there being no treaty whatever.

Mr. REED. The Senator says "to do something."

Mr. KING. But it is in the discretion of each member of the league.

Mr. REED. But if you are going to do anything in a great international conflict involving war—for that is what this means—is it not necessary to do the effective thing and all that is necessary to make the enterprise a success?

Mr. KING. Oh, of course, that must become apparent.

Mr. REED. Very well; then we have got to this: We are under a moral obligation, as soon as the council acts, to carry out its recommendation in an effective manner, which means that we are obligated morally to furnish our share of the men and our share of the ships and our share of the money to make the enterprise successful, to wit, to lick the other fellow.

Now, let us see about the moral obligation. Is there, in the opinion of the Senator, any distinction whatever between a moral treaty obligation and a legal treaty obligation? Are they not both treaty obligations and do they not both bind the honor and integrity and honesty of our country?

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, I do not think——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHIPPS in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not think that you could distinguish in that regard between contracts or undertakings between nations. International law, perhaps, does not recognize the power to enforce the decrees or provisions of international law except by force, or recognizes them as moral obligations; and to say that a treaty is a binding legal obligation or a moral obligation, whichever term you employ, does not give it any more sanctity or any more force.

Mr. REED. They mean the same thing. Then, at the end of this long colloquy we get to this—and I thought, because the Senator from Utah is a good lawyer and a good Senator, that we would get a categorical answer, and we got it—that when we sign this treaty we assume a treaty obligation; it is moral, it is legal, it is everything that a nation can assume, and, according to his construction, we are not bound to act on our own initiative, but we have the right to wait until the council of the league recognizes what action shall be taken, and after that has been recommended it becomes our duty in honor to do our part to make effective the recommendation of the council. That, translated into action means—at least in some cases—that our armies shall be levied and that we shall proceed to pour out our blood and treasure in the enterprise.

That brings us, then, to a very clear statement of another proposition, and that is that the council of the League of Nations, according to the doctrine now announced, is the determining body; so that our troops are, in fact, sent to foreign service by the command of a foreign tribunal. From that there is no escape, except that Congress may repudiate the obligations; and, if the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me long enough, I desire to say that Congress can do that as to every treaty we ever wrote. There has never been a treaty made by the United States that Congress could not refuse to carry out. If it requires any positive action in the way of money or men or the enactment of law, Congress can refuse to carry it out, but in doing so it dishonors the Nation. Or, if it requires no action, Congress can repudiate it by law and again dishonor the Nation. So, after all the discussion we have indulged in, we get to this: That the treaty imposes an obligation, and that obligation is to be interpreted and the directions under it are to be given by a council composed of one American and eight foreigners, and then it is our duty, and we are in honor bound, effectively to carry that command of a foreign tribunal into effect.

The Lodge reservation exculpates us from that obligation absolutely and leaves us free when the time comes to take such action as we see fit. The substitute which is offered allows us to assume the obligation, but then says that, having assumed it, we say that we will carry it out or not when the time comes. That is the distinction between the two.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut permit just one other interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. KING. A moment ago I made the observation, in substance, that I did not know that I was quite in accord with the broad or technical interpretation placed upon article 10 and other articles of the treaty by the President of the United States. I had more particularly in mind in that expression that part of article 10 which provides an undertaking upon the part of the signatories to the treaty to respect the territorial integrity of every member of the league as well as the political independence of members of the league.

In the practical application of article 10, if we take into account the negative obligation of article 10, namely, to respect the territorial integrity, and so forth, and then take into account the obligations of article 11 and article 16, I believe that there is the same obligation resting upon the members of the league in the event that a covenant is broken as there is if the word "preserve," which is found in article 10, is retained. So for all practical purposes if the words "preserve the territorial integrity and political independence" were eliminated from article 10 and there should be left in the words "respect the territorial integrity and political independence" and the subsequent words, and then those words were considered in connection with article 11 and article 16, there would be the same obligation; at any rate, there would be the same result attained in preventing war or punishing covenant breakers of the league as if the word "preserve" were retained in article 10.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will be patient enough for me to make this observation, I am greatly interested in what the Senator is saying. It is, I think, a better statement than I could make of my own position. My position from the first has been, and at the proper time I intend to argue, that after you have adopted all of the Lodge reservations and all of these miserable makeshift "mild nullifying" propositions, you have left an instrumentality of which we are a part and to the covenants for the creation of which we are bound which is practically as bad and as vicious as it was before the so-called Lodge reservations were added. That is to say, while you may cut out article 10, still the things that are in article 10 are in other parts of the instrument and are not changed by the Lodge reservations—article 16, article 3, article 4, article 11, and article 12 also. So at the proper time, when we come to discuss the Lodge reservations after they have been again adopted, if they are, I think it would be well worthy the time of the Senate to see what is left; to see whether this thousand-legged animal has really lost any power of locomotion because you have pulled off two or three of the legs.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am very grateful to the pair of Senators for helping me to make what I consider to be a very good speech, what is left of it. I shall endeavor to resume where I had left off. I just wanted to see how long we could keep it up. I was surprised that there was any limit.

Mr. President, all this tweedledee and tweedledum about the moral obligation as distinguished from the legal obligation is mere chaff. It is, in my opinion, mere casuistry. It is just juggling with words. It is not that about which our fellow members of the league, if we get into it, are concerned. Their concern arises when their territorial integrity or political independence is threatened by external aggression. I think I know what that means. When one nation is proposing to march an army across the border of its neighbor, that is an external aggression. Then it is that they call for help. Then it is when they say under article 10 that our obligation ought to be fulfilled. What is the use of talking about whether it is a joint or several or a joint and several obligation? They all sign this paper, and the paper they sign says:

The members of the league—

Of whom we are one—

undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

That means something. When you agree to preserve a man's political independence and the integrity of his territory, what is the use of talking about what kind of an obligation it is? You are bound to preserve it. If the danger to it comes from the marching of a hostile army, you can not preserve it by issuing a proclamation about humanity. You have got to go there and meet force with force, and there is where the battalions and the heavy artillery and the troops come in, which are carefully screened behind the words of this innocent contractual obligation. You do not now see the battleships and the destroyers and the legions in the training camps and the munition factories taking possession of every peaceful vocation of the country, and bringing the whole productive and brain capacity of the country to concentrate upon the one point of raising an invincible armada and directing it against the nation that is committing the external aggression upon our partner. That does not all appear here in the letters, but it is between the lines and it is the object of what does appear here.

What does the President, who drew this, say? This is his language in which he tried to apply it to this country as a part of his Monroe doctrine. What does he say about it?

In his letter to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], he says:

There is no escaping the moral obligations which are expressed in positive terms in this article of the covenant. We won a moral victory over Germany far greater even than the military victory won on the field of battle, because the opinion of the whole world swung to our support and the support of the nations associated with us in the great struggle.

It did so because of our common profession and promise that we meant to establish "an organization of peace which should make it certain that the combined power of free nations would check every invasion of right and serve to make peace and justice the more secure—by affording a definite tribunal of opinion to which all must submit and by which every international readjustment that can not be amicably agreed upon by the peoples directly concerned shall be sanctioned.

That word "sanctioned" means something in diplomacy.

Any reservation—

He says—

which seeks to deprive the League of Nations of the force of article 10 cuts at the very heart and life of the covenant itself. Any League of Nations which does not guarantee as a matter of incontestable right the political independence and integrity of each of its members might be hardly more than a futile scrap of paper, as ineffective in operation as the agreement between Belgium and Germany which the Germans violated in 1914.

He knows what he wants. He drew it. The other powers did not ask for it, but he forced it upon them—article 10, the backbone and heart, the bulwark of the covenant.

If we were to reject article 10, or so to weaken it as to take its full force out of it, it would mark us as desiring to return to the old world of jealous rivalry and misunderstandings—

And so forth.

After talking about having awakened again to "the vision of a new day," and so forth, he proceeds, down here:

I hold the doctrine of article 10 to be the essence of Americanism.

George Washington told us to keep out of entangling foreign alliances. The President holds getting us into them and guaranteeing all their territories and governments as the essence of Americanism.

We can not repudiate it or weaken it without at the same time repudiating our own principles.

* * * * * * *

The reservations proposed would perpetuate the old order.

* * * * * * *

I believe that when the full significance of this great question has been generally apprehended, obstacles will seem insignificant before the opportunity, a great and glorious opportunity, to contribute our overwhelming moral and material force to the establishment of an international régime in which our own ideals of justice and right may be made to prevail and the nations of the world be allowed a peaceful development under conditions of order and safety hitherto impossible.

"Our own ideals * * * made to prevail"!—by every atom of moral and physical force.

Practically every so-called reservation was, in effect, a rather sweeping nullification of the terms of the treaty itself.

I can understand that language, Mr. President. Can not the Senate understand it? Can there be any doubt about it, in view of the language of article 10, which the President is talking about? What difference does it make whether it is joint or several, or joint and several, or moral or legal? Here it is, written into a great international treaty, to be filed in Paris, to be the foundation of the new world order of things:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

"The members of the league" means all of the members of the league. It means us, anyway, if we sign it, and, of course, it means them all.

When does our duty begin? When does the obligation attach? When we pass this resolution of ratification and the President files the instrument of ratification. That is when it attaches. It is an obligation. We undertake to preserve these things. There is your obligation. It is in the treaty. We can only get out of that, in whole or in part, by our reservations.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] wants to know when we will be called upon to carry out our obligation. I am not interested in that. I am interested in not assuming the obligations. We shall be called upon all too quickly to call it out.

In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression—the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Meaning external—

The obligation rests continuously upon each and every member of the league who signs the treaty. It is always there, to be called into effect whenever the external aggression is perpetrated. The council, of course, when the trouble comes, advises upon the means by which the obligation will be fulfilled, but the obligation is there. Merely the means by which it shall be fulfilled is what the council is interested in. We create the obligation and place it upon our own necks. Do we want to make it definite?

Dragged into this league, as I said, with the Senate claiming one interpretation of our obligations, or denying that we are obligated at all, and the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, the man who appoints all our ambassadors and ministers abroad, claiming that we have assumed the obligation, who is to decide it? The compromise modification of the Lodge reservation provides that the Congress then "under full liberty of action" shall decide in each specific instance. In what does the "liberty of action" consist?

We are called upon to furnish a million men to join with our fellow members of the league to repulse an assault of external aggression.

We have signed the treaty admitting that we have the obligation to preserve what the armed force is attacking. Congress with "full liberty of action" is to decide. Why men of honor and good faith only have such liberty of action under those circumstances as would consist in repudiating every practicable means by which the obligation, which we have secretly assumed, could possibly be carried out. Is that the sort of camouflage that this mighty Nation of 110,000,000 of Christian people want to take refuge behind in this hour of the world's civilization, when the violation of the sanctity of an international treaty was the cause of all the death and destruction from which we are just now emerging?

Is that the Janus-faced deceptive quibbling that this Nation wants to make as a guaranty of its good faith under the higher morality of the dawn of a new day? Such a course as that, it seems to me, would be a blot upon that Starry Banner back of you, Mr. President, which could never be eradicated from the flag or the history of this country. Call it moral or legal, it would be a plain case of dishonor, of leaving your accomplice in the lurch in the time of trouble.

All I say is, fix this thing definitely. The Senate has once decided that it declined to assume the obligation. If we will stand by that decision our course is perfectly plain. We know what we thought, and we expressed it. There can be no quibbling of doubt about that. If the American people want to assume the obligation I have no quarrel about that either. If any Senator who voted to repudiate the obligation on the ground that it was not safe or was not the business of this country to embroil itself with the set of special interests which Europe has, and has changed his mind and now wants to assume the obligation, it does not lie in my mouth to criticize him. Every Senator should act according to his own best judgment.

But to those who do not want to assume the obligation, after nearly a year's thought and careful consideration, I say there is one plain set of words by which they can state their clear intent and purpose and that is in the Lodge reservation for which we all voted. If the desire is to make it murky and muddy so that neither we nor the President nor the other nations of the world will know whether, or if so to what extent, we have assumed any obligation, then plant pretty phrases around, put in parentheses, and leave it to the future consideration of the Congress, and all sorts of things of that kind. That is not characteristic of men looking each other in the eye in a great crisis and seeking to make a sacred compact which would be relied upon. Let us assume the obligation or let us repudiate it.

Mr. President, if we assume the obligation or any part of it, it is inevitable that we shall be drawn into a complete fulfillment. Nations in common danger can not quibble with each other about the exact proportion of the forces that they shall render for the common cause. With the rest of the world financially embarrassed as they are, some of the countries bled white, and we—the richest and most powerful of all—we can never deny to the call of anguish, if we are obligated at all, that we are obligated to the extent necessary to accomplish the purposes of article 10. We are their reliance, as they say. You do not hear one of them over there but what says they must have us.

Oh, they are not interested so much in our moral support. That does not help them against the Bolsheviki or the international vandals on a scalping expedition. They want our guns and our Cavalry, our submarines and our battleships, our boys and our treasure. They want us when we take this obligation to assume an obligation to tax the American people to guarantee all the possessions of every member of this league, whether it is a democracy or empire or what.

"The existing political independence"—speaking from when? When we signed the treaty? We are in. Every one of the troubles and international questions which is submitted to the council and decided by it must be participated in by our delegate. In many cases he may have the deciding voice and may be called upon to cast the deciding vote, although the question in dispute be of no earthly concern to this country whatever. But every vote that our delegate casts, whether right or wrong, is charged up to this country meddling with matters that are of no concern to us, and every time he decides against one of the nations of Europe this Nation as a whole incurs the hostility of that nation over in Europe whose case was lost by the vote of our delegate under the instructions of our President. You can not touch any one of the complicated quarrels of Europe without transferring it right to the polls of this country.

The nations of Europe are more homogeneous than we are. This Nation is composed of people whose ancestors, every one of them, came from abroad, except a few descendants of the American Indians. Many of them have friends abroad now and relatives. Not a single question concerning one of those nations can come up but what all the people of that blood and descent in this country will take their view of it. That can not be avoided. The Germans in this country could not help sympathizing with Germany in the Great War. The Italians in this country can not help sympathizing with the Italians in the contested Fiume question. The Slavs in this country can not help sympathizing with Jugo-Slavia as against the Italians. The Greeks in this country can not help sympathizing with Greece as against the Turks. The Armenians in this country can not help sympathizing with the Armenians and the Kurds in that question as against the Turks.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Against the Kurds?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Kurds and Armenians have been hostile; but they have just made an alliance, as I understand, against the Turks. It may be that their friends in this country can shift fast enough to keep up with the kaleidoscope.

Those questions will be vital to large delegations of our population in this country and will be the cause of endless internecine trouble here at the polls which control our political conventions and nominations and our elections.

Now, the President has said in many of his speeches on his western tour that there is no use of America entering this league unless it did so heartily and freely and with enthusiasm. If that is so, imagine of what use or aid we will be to this international combination if, instead of going into it freely, we are dragged in against the vehement protest of nearly half or possibly a great majority in the United States.

It is so now that the President is asking for a solemn referendum of the American Nation as to whether we will join this combination or not. Suppose we are dragged in by a mere majority, with what enthusiasm is the other half of the country going to cooperate with these foreign powers? How is the President to direct our delegate to vote on things with half of our own Nation repudiating those decisions and views and demanding the immediate retirement of this country from the league? Does anybody claim that a league based upon that sort of cooperation and enthusiasm will stabilize the world? In my view it would add additional elements of instability, which would make confusion worse confounded to drag this country in against its will or with only half of the people in favor of it.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator not believe that it would make a perpetual issue in American politics until the obligation was definitely and finally assumed or definitely and finally repudiated?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Most certainly it would, Mr. President; not only would it make it, but it has made it. The issue is now in American politics. Everyone in the Senate, and everyone through the country, every reader of a newspaper, knows that the issue is now in politics, that the great national conventions which assemble within three months are going to have a plank in their platforms which may be the preponderating, leading, dominating issue of the campaign, as to whether they want to join this League of Nations or not, and if they do, upon what conditions. The question now is about how to state the issue.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, does the Senator believe that it will be the issue as submitted to the people in the platforms of the two great parties, whether we want to join the league or not? Will it not rather be whether there shall be a joinder of the league by unconditional ratification, or an acceptance of it with reservations? As far as I am able to judge the trend of what may be called partisan political sentiment, if there is such a thing, it tends in that direction, leaving the question of the rejection of the league to be determined in some other manner.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator asks me what I believe about it, and how I believe the issue will be made and stated. I say I am not wise enough to tell now, before any delegate is chosen for either convention, or even to the State conventions which are to choose them for the national conventions, how they will state it or frame it up, after they spar for political position long enough.

Whether the Democratic Party, if the President can shape its policies, will want a plank in the Democratic national platform appealing to the country to put us into the league on the naked unamended treaty as he brought it from Europe and make that the issue, I do not know. Whether the Republican Party will be content with stating in its platform that it is opposed to joining any League of Nations, unless the rights of America are properly protected and preserved, I can not yet tell. Whether the issue as finally framed, by the two great parties at least, will be joining the league with the Lodge reservations or with the reservations proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], I can not tell.

But whatever the political conventions may formulate as their planks about the treaty, whatever they may say about mild, strong, or medium reservations, the issue in the minds of the people as the campaign progresses, and the result of the election, is sure to be determined by this test, Shall we put this country into the league or keep it out? They can frame their planks and apply them with different interpretations to different parts of the country, but the American people will determine this question upon the fundamental, broad issue, which they can understand, as to whether they really want to put them and their descendants into this international combination, to be controlled by foreigners, or whether they want to keep us out of it. That will be the issue.

When we went into the war with Germany we went in under our own free will. We should preserve this Nation, in my opinion, free and untrammeled, to take such part in any international crisis as the Government—and by Government I mean the whole of it, the President and Congress both—may, when the emergency arises, think best for the country. It should keep itself in such a position that if it must go to war, it may go to war in behalf of such peoples and principles as it itself may decide on at the time, and not permit itself, in advance, to be dragged into a foreign war upon the side or upon the conditions determined by an international foreign council, sitting in secret, upon which we have only one vote.

Mr. President, I know the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] desires to proceed with his bill, the unfinished business, so I withhold any further remarks that I may have to make.

CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1699) for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS].

[Mr. MYERS addressed the Senate, and before concluding yielded the floor for the day.]

RATIFICATION OF SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT BY WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, it gives me pleasure to announce, although the Members of the Senate are probably already aware of the fact from reports in the public prints, that the State of West Virginia has ratified the suffrage amendment to the Constitution, making 34 States that have thus adopted it, of which 29 are Republican States.

The contest in West Virginia has been long and hard fought, and the scene at Charleston has been an exceedingly busy one while the contending forces there were fighting. It seems to be inseparable from such hard-fought battles that there should be charges and countercharges made as to the means adopted to bring about certain results. I hold in my hand a telegram which I have received, signed by 14 members of the State Senate who voted against the suffrage amendment, stating that certain charges had been made in the public prints to the effect that their votes had been, perhaps, improperly influenced by the liquor interests or others who might be concerned in defeating the amendment. The 14 State senators who signed the telegram are Wallace B. Gribble, A. E. Scheer, Gohen C. Arnold, C. C. Coalter, Floyd S. Chapman, John W. Luther, W. M. York, Elmer Hough, Carl Hunter, W. F. Burgess, Joseph S. Lewis, and G. B. Harmon.

I wish to say that no one in the State of West Virginia who knows the high character of the 14 men will give any credence whatsoever to the charges which have been made. Although I differed with them on this question and urged them to vote for the suffrage amendment, yet they are men of the very highest standing and integrity, and I do not believe that anyone who knows them in their homes would think for a moment that any one of them could be improperly influenced. They voted as they did because they thought their position was the correct one, and because they believed their constituents at a recent election had voted against the suffrage proposal, and they thought that expression of opinion should hold as against the adoption of the Federal suffrage amendment.

I merely desire to make this brief statement in order to assure those who may have seen the newspaper reports that they are, in my judgment, absolutely without foundation so far as they affect the 14 able senators whose names I have given and any other officials of the State of West Virginia.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STERLING. I understand that a brief executive session is desired. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, March 12, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 11, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Come, Thou Almighty Spirit, with all Thy quickening power, and kindle within these hearts of ours a flame of sacred fire; that our thoughts and acts may be in consonance with our highest conceptions of right and truth, justice and mercy, love and good will; that at the close of this day we may lie down with a pure conscience, sleep soundly, and awake refreshed for the duties of the morrow. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DESIGNATION OF MR. WALSH AS SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio withhold that for a moment?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk notify the Senate and the President of the United States that the Speaker has designated Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, as Speaker pro tempore for a period not exceeding 10 legislative days, and that the said designation is approved by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair having been designated as Speaker pro tempore, he will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to administer the oath of office.

The oath of office as Speaker pro tempore was administered to Mr. WALSH by Mr. CANNON.

REFERENCE OF H. R. 10835—COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry concerning a bill that has gotten into the wrong place by reference. The bill H. R. 10835, to fix compensation of officers of the National Army who incurred disability while in the service, was introduced on the 3d of December and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. That committee held it until the 28th of February, when by action of this House, by unanimous consent, it was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the Speaker stating that was the proper place for it, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the leader, saying that this bill clearly belonged to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I had always thought it did, and therefore made no objection. On the 3d of March, it appears by the RECORD, without having been brought back in here or any question made of it in the House, it was referred again to the Committee on Ways and Means, as I ascertained a day or two ago. I asked the Speaker about it, and he said it was done on the theory that it involved large expenditures, and that it was his recollection that it had been rereferred. On looking at the RECORD, I found that it was so. Now, the officers who are interested in the matter asked for a hearing, and the Committee on Ways and Means writes:

The committee at this time is holding hearings with respect to soldiers' adjusted compensation, and the belief has been expressed that the bill to which you refer concerns a military policy which properly belongs to the Military Affairs Committee, and should not have been rereferred to this committee in connection with the bonus matter.

Now, in order that the Speaker may understand what it is, I will read just a few lines of the bill:

That any officer who has served in the military forces of the United States during the war with Germany, and who does not belong to the Regular Army, and who incurred disabilities while in the service during the said war, shall be entitled to the same compensation as like officers of the Regular Army receive on being retired for an equal disability.

That is the bill. The resolution whereby these bonus matters were referred to the Committee on Ways and Means is as follows:

Resolved, That for the remainder of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress all proposed legislation relating to those who served in the World War (other than those of the Regular Establishment), excepting, however, legislation based on and relating to disability incurred in the service, shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

And so on. Now, that absolutely excluded this bill, and it was so held on the 28th, the day after that resolution was passed.

I want to know, in the first place, whether they can refer a bill again without bringing it back into the House. I understand that Rule XXII, section 3, provides:

All bills, resolutions, and documents referred under the rules shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD of the next day, and correction in case of error of reference may be made by the House without debate, in accordance with Rule XI, on any day immediately after the reading of the Journal, by unanimous consent, or on motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred.

Now, this bill evidently does not belong to the Ways and Means Committee, but that is not a question which I can take up under the parliamentary inquiry, I take it. It can not, as I understand it, be rereferred without coming back into the House and having action taken here, and it has been so. We have been hung up since the 3d of December on questions of jurisdiction; now we are hung up again on questions of jurisdiction, and I desire a ruling of the Chair as to whether that bill is now, accepting the statement I have made—and he can verify that by looking at the RECORD—before the Ways and Means Committee or before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when the reference of that bill was changed to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in the House, the Speaker then stated to the House that if the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was not the proper committee, and that under the resolution it should have gone to the Ways and Means Committee, he would still have the power to retransfer it to the Ways and Means Committee under the special order of the House. I do not know where it belongs. Very likely it belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. If so, it can be transferred there, but I think under the rule that was adopted and the construction that was placed upon it by the Speaker when this transfer was made to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—a proper construction, it seems to me—he did have the power to rerefer it to the Committee on Ways and Means if he thought it belonged there under the resolution of the House. He may have been mistaken as to where the proper reference should be made, because I apprehend he himself did not examine very carefully all of these bills that he transferred to the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I think if anyone will examine the bill to which the gentleman from South Carolina alludes now, he will find it is simply to establish a new rate of compensation for a special class under the terms of the war-risk insurance act. Its substance is an amendment to the war-risk insurance act in the sense that for a certain class of people already covered by the war-risk insurance act it now provides a higher rate of compensation.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I agree with that contention entirely. I took that position when the bill was introduced, and I called the attention of the parliamentarian and the Speaker both to that, but they thought it belonged to the Committee on Military Affairs and sent it there. After three months that view was concurred in.

I desire to direct the attention of the Chair to what occurred when rereference was made. In the first place, I want to call attention again to the fact that it is expressly excluded from the terms of the resolution conferring jurisdiction on the Committee on Ways and Means excepting legislation based on and relating to disability incurred in the service. This is a bill which provides for nothing else except a certain rate of compensation for disability incurred absolutely in the service.

Now, what occurred? Mr. CLARK of Missouri asked, "What was the request?" The Speaker said:

It is to rerefer the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the bill would more properly go to the Committee on Ways and Means under the resolution adopted the other day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. ESCH. It is a bill that involves very large expenditures.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will have authority to so refer it, if the gentleman's suggestion is correct; but at first blush the Chair thinks that that is not so.

Now, as to that statement, I do not understand that the Chair, by saying that it will have the authority to do something, can proceed to destroy a rule of the House and do that thing in a way not provided for by the rules of the House, and thus sweep away the safeguards that the Members have here, and I do not think the Chair intended that. But, anyway, it has been done. Then it goes on:

Mr. GARNER. This refers to officers and men who were in the service?

Mr. KAHN. It gives them increased compensation.

Mr. GARNER. Under the war-risk insurance act, and applies only to those who were wounded in the service?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. GARNER. If I understood the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], he stated that the purpose of his resolution was to take from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee only such matters that were general in their nature and which did not refer specifically to those who were wounded or who suffered injury in the service.

Mr. MONDELL. This bill belongs clearly to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does this increase war-risk compensation or increase the salaries of men on the retired list?

Mr. KAHN. It does not affect anyone on the retired list. These men were in the service and go out of the service as soon as they are honorably discharged. They are no longer connected with the service.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does it increase the pay while they are in the service?

Mr. KAHN. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Now, under that state of facts, without going back to the House or anybody hearing about it, it is rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and I submit that it is not competent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman, as I understand it, takes the position that this bill should be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. STEVENSON. I take the position that it belongs there, and that it is there, and that there is no power to take it away from there, unless it comes under this resolution, and this resolution expressly excludes that bill. That is my position about it, and I desire the ruling of the Chair, so that we will know where to find the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The bill has been referred.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the bill has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and from the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] it is clear to the Chair that that rereference was made under the resolution adopted by the House, and if the reference is erroneous it can only be corrected by action of the House.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be rereferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where it plainly belongs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman state the number of the measure?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is H. R. No. 10835.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that House bill No. 10835 be rereferred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I hope there will be no objection, because this bill clearly belongs to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and if it was rereferred to the Committee on Ways and Means it must have been through inadvertence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the bill is so rereferred.

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I renew the point of order that I made, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and eighty-six Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

CORRECTION OF A ROLL CALL.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, on roll call No. 26, on January 9, I was present and answered to my name. I ask that the RECORD and Journal be corrected accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks to correct the RECORD and Journal of January 9. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I doubt whether it is possible to correct the RECORD of January 9 without reprinting the RECORD of that date. The permanent RECORD is usually printed before the expiration of two months.

Mr. RAKER. I was present and answered to my name on that roll call, and did not notice that I was recorded as not answering until I looked over the RECORD on another matter. I think the RECORD should be corrected, showing that I was present.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, the gentleman has his statement in the RECORD, and I have no objection to the order being made to correct the RECORD if it does not mean that it has to be reprinted.

Mr. RAKER. Not at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman does not know whether it will require reprinting or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the correction of the RECORD indicated by the gentleman, provided it does not involve reprinting?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD the address of Gen. Pershing, delivered before the Southern Commercial Congress at Savannah. I may add that while Gen. Pershing delivered many strong addresses on his late tour through the Nation, this, his first utterance, was a prepared address, and perhaps his most notable message during his whole tour that was a succession of deserved ovations. Delivered to 5,000 people in beautiful Savannah, the greatest seaport south of New York, and speaking under the auspices of the great patriotic organization that has done so much in building "a greater Nation through a greater South," this masterful address by the beloved commander in chief of our victorious armies reveals the genius of a great general and the wisdom of a great statesman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by Gen. Pershing at Savannah, Ga. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks made by me at a gathering of my college class at the Yale Club in New York on Friday evening of last week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks made by him at a meeting of his class at the Yale Club in New York last week. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. TILSON. On some of the issues of the day, with incidental reference to Congress collectively and Members of Congress individually.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June, 1916, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that all committee amendments to this section were acted upon yesterday, and, of course, the section is now open to any other amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT moves to strike out all the language beginning with line 1, page 10, down to and including the word "procurement" in line 2, page 15, and insert the following:

"SEC. 5. General Staff. The General Staff shall consist of the War Department General Staff and the general staff with troops. The War Department General Staff shall consist of 1 Chief of Staff, detailed in time of peace from major generals of the line, and 2 assistants to the Chief of Staff selected by the President, one of whom shall be president of the General Staff College; 3 colonels; 4 lieutenant colonels; 11 majors; and 22 captains, all to be detailed from corresponding grades in the Army. The general staff with troops shall consist of 7 colonels, 8 lieutenant colonels, 27 majors, and 54 captains, all to be detailed from corresponding grades in the Army. In time of peace the detail of an officer as a member of the General Staff shall be for a period of four years, unless sooner relieved.

"The duties of the War Department General Staff shall be to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the military forces, to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Army and its state of preparation for military operations, and to render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War.

"The duties of the General Staff with troops shall be to render professional aid and assistance to the general officers under whom they serve in preparing detailed instructions for the execution of the plans of the commanding generals and in supervising the execution of such instructions.

"The Chief of the War Department General Staff, under the direction of the President or the Secretary of War, shall cause the preparation by such staff of the necessary plans for recruiting, organizing, supplying, equipping, mobilizing, and demobilizing of the Army for its use in the national defense. He shall keep the Secretary of War informed of all plans prepared by the War Department General Staff. In case any recommendations for legislation for the national defense or for the reorganization of the Army or for any other requirements of the Military Establishment are presented by the Secretary of War to Congress or to one of the committees of Congress such recommendations shall be accompanied by a statement from the appropriate division of the War Department General Staff, together with such pertinent comments for and against the plan as may be made by the Secretary of War, the Chief of the War Department General Staff, or individual officers of the division of the War Department General Staff in which the plan was prepared.

"Hereafter members of the General Staff shall be confined strictly to the discharge of duties of the general nature specified for them in this section and in the act of Congress approved February 14, 1903, and they shall not be permitted to assume or engage in work of an administrative nature that pertains to established bureaus or offices of the War Department or that being assumed are engaged in by members of the General Staff would involve impairment of the responsibility or initiative of such bureaus or offices or would cause injurious or unnecessary duplication of or delay in the work hereof.

"When plans prepared by the War Department General Staff shall have been approved by the President, acting through the Secretary of War, the general of the armies of the United States shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment during such execution. Should there be no general of the armies of the United States, a major general of the line on active duty selected by the President shall be designated the commanding general of the Army and shall be the executive head through which Army plans are executed. General Staff officers serving with the executive head of the Army shall be considered as serving with troops.

"SEC. 5. That said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after section 5 a new section, to be numbered 5a:

"'SEC. 5a. Military supplies and munitions of all kinds furnished by the War Department shall be supplied as follows:

"'The War Department General Staff, acting under direction of the Secretary of War, shall prescribe the types and quantities required and the dates by which the various articles should be available. The Assistant Secretary of War, acting under the direction of the Secretary of War, shall receive and revise this program and shall have general supervision and control of the work of the several staff services and bureaus of the War Department in the procurement and delivery to storage of the required supplies and munitions. The chief of each staff service shall report directly to the Assistant Secretary of War on all questions relating to the procurement and delivery to storage of the military supplies and munitions for which such chief is by law or regulation responsible. In all other military matters the chief of each staff service shall report to the commanding general of the Army. Subject to the general supervision and control of the Assistant Secretary of War in the procurement, delivery to storage of supplies and munitions, and of the commanding general of the Army in other matters, each staff service shall perform all functions and direct all activities connected with the design, purchase, production, inspection, and delivery to storage of the supplies or munitions assigned to it by law or regulations, and shall operate those facilities pertaining to the War Department which are required for such activities.'"

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I consider this a very important feature of this bill, relating as it does to the General Staff, its duties and functions, and the number of General Staff officers to be resident within the District of Columbia.

I have undertaken by this amendment to reproduce practically the language of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, and the act of February 3, 1903, creating the General Staff and defining its functions, powers, and duties. Under this amendment, and, I think, perhaps under the original bill, the idea is intended to be carried into effect that the General Staff will absolutely be deprived of any administrative functions whatsoever. It will be limited solely and exclusively to planning and devising for the Army, without intrenching upon the jurisdiction of the different bureaus and departments of the War Department.

Under the national defense act it was provided that the General Staff should be composed of 57 officers, not exceeding one-half of whom should at any one time reside within the District of Columbia. That gave to the General Staff about 27 officers resident within the District of Columbia. As I stated, I believe, on day before yesterday, it was testified to by Gen. March before the House Military Affairs Committee that never at any time did the General Staff have in Washington exceeding 19 members, so that the General Staff never really exercised the right to utilize the total number of officers who were authorized by the national defense act of June 3, 1916.

Under this amendment I have increased the allowance of the General Staff here in Washington up to 40 officers. I believe that 40 officers are entirely sufficient for the purposes that the General Staff is limited to by this amendment and by the general principles of the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. The General Staff is divided, so we have been told, into different committees for the purpose of studying plans for the Army. One is an administrative division, one is an intelligence division, one is for war plans and operations, and another the supplies and training division. It is divided, in other words, into four committees, and with 40 officers, that would give 10 officers for each division to study the subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a good deal of criticism has been heard that the War Department was not prepared; that when war was declared we fell down because our preparations were lacking in supplies, in equipment, in training, and the organization of the Army. If we were wrong in these particulars, whose fault was it? It was the fault of that branch of the Army charged with the duty of making these plans and preparations and having them ready.

Now, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Lusitania was sunk in May, 1915; that we never declared war until April, 1917, nearly two years after the Lusitania had been torpedoed.

The President carried on diplomatic negotiations with Germany on account of the torpedoed ship, and yet the German Government continued to carry on the submarine warfare. Everybody in this country knew that with the continued submarine warfare carried on by Germany, sooner or later, out of self-respect, the Government would have to declare war.

For two years the General Staff was put on notice that there was a likelihood of a war with Germany. They had two years to plan and advise, and yet when we declared war we were told that there were no preparations and no plans. So I say that if anybody is to be criticized because of a lack of preparation, it is due to the fact that the General Staff did not exercise the functions for which it was created.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. My colleague, of course, remembers that the national defense act, which created the new organization of the General Staff, was only passed about seven months before our difficulty with Germany began.

Mr. DENT. The national defense act was passed June 3, 1916. The national defense act simply carried, as the gentleman from California well knows, substantially the provisions of the act of February 3, 1903, creating the General Staff; so the General Staff has been in operation ever since it was created in 1903.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment to this section substantially like the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, limiting the General Staff here at Washington and also the General Staff in the field. I think this is the most important item in this bill. Paraphrasing an old statement, familiar to all of us, this bill is of the General Staff, for the General Staff, and it is by the General Staff. It was prepared by the General Staff.

The bill that came from the Senate was prepared by the General Staff, and while it is true they attempt to curtail the active operations of the General Staff in one provision of this section, they absolutely have given it all the power they now have in another clause in the section.

It was attempted yesterday by amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois to relieve this bill of that situation, and it did in some little measure, but it has not corrected the defect entirely.

The General Staff is so jealous of its jurisdiction that you can depend upon it that every time you permit a General Staff officer to write an Army bill he is going to take care of the interests of the General Staff. Under one section of this bill, page 14, there is a provision that they shall not interfere with the administrative affairs of the different bureaus in the War Department; while on page 12 in this same section they provide, in describing the duties of the General Staff and the functions they can render, that—

To render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, and to act as their agents in harmonizing the duties, plans, and operations of the branches and bureaus of the War Department and of the Army, and to perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may from time to time be prescribed.

Under that provision, notwithstanding the fact that in another clause they have said that they shall not have anything to do with the administrative functions of the different bureaus, they can enter into any one of the bureaus and assert themselves, as they have been doing, to the detriment of the Army ever since we got into the war and long before.

They have not entered into a single bureau of the War Department and meddled with the administrative affairs but what they have done is to the detriment of the bureau. They are not content with discharging the duties for which they were created—to advise the Department of War with reference to war matters—but they have insistently and persistently, in season and out of season, intruded with reference to the administration of ordinary operations to the detriment of every bureau.

It is the purpose of this measure to take this power away from them, and I think that the committee was honest in endeavoring to do that thing, but if there is a man here that will read the section from beginning to end, discover the jokers in it, of which I have pointed out one, he will find that they have not relieved them of a single bit of power.

Either this amendment or some other amendment that will make this so plain that anybody who reads it may know that the purpose of this Congress has been carried out by this bill must be adopted or we will be derelict of duty not only to the Army but to the Government of the United States.

These gentlemen have not only during the war persisted in domineering and controlling the heads of the department by reason of the fact that they are the General Staff in the city of Washington, but likewise they have done it all over this country and all over Europe wherever we had an Army. Members of the General Staff have gone into different places in France during the war and since the war, and by reason alone of their being members of the General Staff have insisted on taking over the management, the domination of the administrative functions of different activities. They are doing it now, and they propose to continue to do it. It is perfectly patent that that is their purpose, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] defines in language that is very plain that they shall not do this thing. You can not find a clause in it whereby they can arrogate to themselves the administrative authority which I think a great majority of this body wishes to take away from them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the matter of the General Staff is probably as important a proposition as can come up in any military reorganization bill. At the time the Congress passed the national defense act it attempted to fix the number and define the status of the General Staff officers. Under the terms of that act only one-half of the number of General Staff officers could be stationed here in Washington. We have not had heretofore a General Staff with troops of our Army except during the war. Many of the officers of the General Staff before we got into the war were away from Washington with troops and were, in fact, performing General Staff duties with the troops. The war demonstrated the fact that we were woefully weak in the General Staff. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] calls attention to the fact that a General Staff had been created as far back as 1903. That was a great innovation in our military policy, but the real definition of the work that the General Staff was supposed to carry out was placed in the legislation of June 3, 1916, known as the national defense act, which legislation went into effect but a few months before we entered the war. The gentleman complains that the General Staff made no preparations for war, although every man who read the news of the day and followed the trend of events would naturally realize that we would ultimately get into the war. Yet the President of the United States kept telling to the people of this country month after month, week after week, that he was opposed to war. He was elected for a second term on his platform of keeping us out of war. So I suppose if any of the General Staff officers had even attempted to make plans, he, as Commander in Chief, could have made it mighty unpleasant for that General Staff officer. Therefore I assume the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is correct when he asserts we had no plans whatever in anticipation of getting into the World War. When Gen. Pershing went to Europe in June, 1917, the first thing that he was compelled to do was to find out what the American forces would have to do in order to secure a good General Staff. Accordingly he studied the staff systems of England and France. The number of General Staff officers was multiplied enormously in order to get a working staff in Europe alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. The General Staff, under Gen. Pershing's command in Europe, numbered several hundred officers, and in this country there was a great increase of officers doing General Staff duty.

At the time of the outbreak of the war we had in the General Staff an Intelligence Division. I think the total number of men in that division was something like three. We had to increase it enormously because of the espionage system established by the enemy in this country. In fact, the presence of numerous spies of the enemy in the United States compelled the War Department to increase materially the number of staff officers in that one bureau alone. The work done by the General Staff is all important. The committee believed that the General Staff should not interfere in the work of the procurement of supplies for the Army. That work under this bill is left entirely in certain departments or bureaus. The intention of the language, in my opinion, fixes that absolutely. The coordination of the various industries that will furnish supplies to the Army rests with the General Staff under the bill. They try to harmonize or coordinate the various industries of the country with the Army of the country, so that if we again get into war we will know just what we have in this country in the way of industries that can begin almost immediately the manufacture of all those numerous accessories for the Army of the United States that we will have to have to win the war. The General Staff will have to keep in touch with the food producers, so that the efforts of the latter can be enormously expanded in case of war. I believe personally in a large General Staff. I have here a table which shows the number of General Staff officers which the allied nations have as compared to the number in our Army under the proposed legislation. The table is very illuminating. I shall print it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

In the United States under this bill we have in the War Department 5 general officers in the General Staff and 88 additional officers. The General Staff with the troops under this bill is 100, so that we will have a total of 193 staff officers. In England they have 18 general officers in the war department general staff and 50 other officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the general staff with troops in England numbers 164 officers, so that the total number of officers in the War Department and the General Staff with the troops in both countries is practically the same. In France the general officers of the war department general staff number 5, with 100 additional officers and 540 staff officers with the troops. The Italian Army is being reorganized at the present time, so that I have no figures from Italy. In Japan the general officers of the war department general staff are 9 and the other officers 213, the general staff with the troops 160, so that in the countries with which we were thrown into contact during the war we find that they all had a large general staff. Their staff corps are made up like ours. Men are detailed from the line of the army into the staff corps. They have to pass examinations after attending staff schools, just as this bill contemplates.

The Germans had a different system. They detailed men permanently in the general staff. The planning for the German Army became the life work of the men who were found adaptable for general staff duties. In this country, we have had practically no law which enabled men to be prepared for general staff work. One of the important features of this legislation now under consideration is a general staff school, so that men may be trained for general staff work.

That is an entirely new feature of our military law, and in my opinion it is an excellent feature. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will not pass.

The following statements show how officers are appointed to or detailed with the general staff of some of the allied armies:

BRITISH ARMY.

The "staff" of the British Army consists of the following: The "G" branch (general staff officers), the "A" branch (officers of the adjutant general's branch), and the "Q" branch (officers of the quartermaster general's branch).

Except for a few appointments which are granted due to experience gained from previous staff work in the field, officers are detailed to the "staff" of the British Army as follows: (Note.—Same for "G," "A," and "Q" branches.)

Regimental officers, usually (not below the rank of) captains, after having been specially recommended by the commanding officer and commanding general, are permitted to sit in a competitive staff-college examination. The scope of this examination is very broad and requires lengthy preparation. In addition there are admitted "by nomination" 10 students. These are selected from officers who have performed their duty in a conspicuous manner, and have the instinct for soldiering, and who have obtained a certain per cent of marks in the competitive examination.

Successful applicants are sent to the staff college, the course being for two years. Upon termination of the course, officers are confidentially reported upon—as to the suitability for the detail with the "G," "A," or "Q" branch of the staff. Having graduated, an officer may receive a staff appointment which is for four years, then being returned to his regiment for duty with troops pending another staff appointment. An officer might be appointed to the "G" branch after graduation from the staff college and then to the "Q" branch during another detail, but seldom in the reverse of this. The usual course is for an officer to be detailed with that branch for which he is confidentially reported upon at graduation.

FRENCH ARMY.

Officers are selected for the general staff as follows—captains and lieutenants usually being selected, but none are eligible who have had less than five years' service, two years of which has been in the line:

Officers volunteer and an examination is held yearly for entrance to the Ecole Superieure de Guerre (War College). The examination consists of one written and two oral examinations covering military history, general tactics, geography, topography, legislation, administration, German language, and equitation.

The course lasts two years. At the end of that time the students are given a final examination for what is known as the brevete d'etat major. (Rating of general staff officers being shown in the army list with a "B" after their names.) Those obtaining the distinction of brevete are then placed on probation for two years, doing duty with a staff (army, army corps, military government, place government—such as forts at Nancy, Toul, etc.)—division. During this probationary period they are detached for periods of instruction in a regiment of an arm other than their own for from one to three months at the time of the fall maneuvers or target practice.

After this two years' probationary period, if an officer's service has been satisfactory, he may be detailed to a staff (army, corps, division, etc.). However, an officer serving with the general staff must have served before he can be promoted (if promotion comes at the time he is on the staff) two years as a captain commanding a company, if he is captain; two years as a major commanding a battalion, if he is a major; and so on for lieutenant colonel and colonel.

JAPANESE ARMY.

To be eligible for selection for the general staff training course, officers must have had at least two years' duty with troops. Captains and lieutenants are the ones usually selected. While second lieutenants are eligible, they have never been known to be selected.

Candidates are first selected by their regimental commander. The division of which the regiment is a part holds, during April, a preliminary examination of all officers within the division. Those candidates who successfully pass the division examination in April are then again examined in November by a board of officers from the war college, those who are successful being admitted. They are, however, scrutinized by the chief of staff before final acceptance. About 100 prospective general staff officers are admitted each year, but only about 20 receive assignments at the end of the course. The course is for a period of three years. During the first two years of the three the officers serve part time with branches other than their own.

At the end of the third year they are finally examined and take part in a very extensive and comprehensive staff ride. The ability shown during this staff ride goes largely toward determining the final selection of those officers desired for the general staff. In their subsequent career newly appointed staff officers must serve numerous tours of duty with line troops, returning to duty with their former arm. Before every promotion they must have completed at least a year of troop duty.

ITALIAN ARMY.

Officers of the Italian Army to be eligible for the war college, which is the stepping stone to the general staff, must have had four years' service with troops as an officer of a combat arm.

Examination for entrance to the war college is competitive. Out of 250 to 300 applicants 60 students are selected. Of the 60, 48 must be from the cavalry and infantry, and the remainder, 12, from the artillery and engineers. Should there not be 60 students chosen, the chief of staff adjusts the proportion.

The school course is for three years. Between the first and second years and second and third years the student officers serve with troops of arms other than their own. At the same time examinations, which are very difficult, are given.

At the end of the third year only about 45 students out of the original 60 are graduated. These officers are then gazetted and are given certain privileges from captain to major.

Out of the 45 graduates of the war college, about 20 are chosen to follow a course to determine their further fitness for becoming general staff officers. They are sent to Rome for a course at the chief of staff command. They remain there six months, serving in the different branches of the general staff command, going through maneuvers on the ground with the troops of the Rome garrisons and performing certain map maneuvers. At the end of this six months they are sent to serve with the staff of an army corps or division (territorial commands in peace time) for another six months. At the end of that time the chief of staff of the unit under whom they served the last six months, and the other officers under whom they received their special general staff instruction during this last year, report on them to the chief of the general staff.

At a plenary session of the superior officers of the general staff command in Rome, presided over by the chief of the general staff, each student is discussed and a final selection made. The number selected is that which will meet the requirements of the service at the time. About 12 to 15 are finally selected. Thus only about 4 or 5 per cent of the original 300 candidates who applied for admission to the war college reach the desired position of general staff officers.

Graduates of the war college who are not selected for the final general staff course are given a special right to promotion from captain to major.

General staff officers who usually leave the final general staff course as captains must serve two years with troops before being promoted to major, two years as a major with troops before promotion to lieutenant colonel, and so on to colonel.

Just before the war a very difficult examination was held by which the officers who passed it could become general staff officers without going through the above-outlined procedure. The number passing was very small.

The belief is that officers trained as above for general staff work, while perhaps no more brilliant mentally than officers who do not go through such a course, receive technical training by going through the course which particularly fits them for such work.

NOTE.—Explanations referred to in small letters above will be found under each individual country in "Specific notes."

GENERAL NOTES.

The percentages given in the above table are based on the enlisted strength of the army concerned.

A comparison has been made between the United States Army as proposed in H. R. 12775 and the British Army. This comparison in reality should not be made, as the British staff organization, especially that of its general staff, is entirely different from the general staff organization of any other army. As a matter of fact, they have three branches, viz, the general staff branch, adjutant general's branch, and quartermaster general's branch, all of which perform actual general staff duties as viewed from the viewpoint of other armies.

However, as nearly as possible, comparison has been made with the hope that it may be of some assistance to the Military Committee.

SPECIFIC NOTES.

UNITED STATES.

(a) One major general, Chief of Staff; 1 major and 3 brigadier generals, assistants Chief of Staff.

(b) General officers not included in General Staff Corps are from generals of the line.

(c) Includes 24 General Staff officers for military attachés.

(d) Includes doctors, dentists, and medical administrative officers. Veterinary Corps not included, as a Veterinary Corps is not included in the medical corps of other armies.

ENGLAND.

Figures are of last known peace establishment. Post-war reorganization has not yet been effected in the British Army, but will be on about the scale of the figures shown.

(a) Figures given include field marshals, generals, lieutenant generals, and major generals. There are no permanent brigadiers in the British Army. They are obtained by detail as such from colonels and lieutenant colonels and are paid according to detail. Figures given include staff generals—practically impossible to separate from line generals.

(b) Figures include 5 generals above the grade of brigadier and 13 brigadier generals, general staff, the latter being a staff rating, officers filling same rank as brigadier generals, general staff, while holding detail.

(c) Includes 5 British officers serving at headquarters, Indian Army.

(d) Includes general staff officers with troops, at military and staff colleges, with Dominion commands as instructors, and other diverse duties.

(e) Figures shown include 8 general officers and 37 officers who combine the duties of adjutant general with those of quartermaster general in that they are performing administrative staff duties at different headquarters.

(f) Figures include 8 general officers and 37 officers who, as administrative staff officers, perform adjutant general duties at different headquarters as well as quartermaster duties.

The veterinary service of the British Army is under the quartermaster general, but as it is not so included in other armies, its personnel has not been included here.

(g) Forty-two of the officers shown are quartermaster officers, who perform administrative duties in the Medical Corps. They are actually part of the Royal Army Medical Corps.

FRANCE.

(a) The total allowance of general staff officers in the French Army is 640. The 5 general officers shown are not part of the staff, but are taken from the line for duty as chief of staff and his assistants.

(b) There are, in addition to the officers shown in (a), 203 administrative officers who perform administrative duties with the general staff. They are not general staff officers.

(c) There are no officers in the Judge Advocate's Department at the war ministry. The personnel is entirely civilian. There are throughout France 27 permanent military tribunals, to which are attached 54 officers, about one-half of whom are retired officers, the remainder being detailed temporarily from the line for such duty. There are included in the figures given 46 administrative officers, who hold assimilated rank.

(d) Figures given include 1,030 administrative officers who hold assimilated rank.

(e) Includes 1 general officer who is a pharmacist.

(f) Includes 118 pharmacists and 350 medical administrative officers.

ITALY.

The Italian Army is undergoing reorganization at the present time.

(a) Due to the conditions existing, the number of general staff officers at present is not known under the reorganization scheme.

(b) There were 155 general staff officers in the last peace lists, which give the percentage shown based on a strength of about 225,000.

(c) There are no officers in a permanent judge advocate general's department. Those shown are detailed for duty with fixed territorial tribunals.

(d) Figures shown include 964 administrative officers.

(e) Figures shown include 112 pharmacists.

JAPAN.

(a) Figures shown include 1 general and 133 officers who are pharmacists.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] I undertake to state to this House that when he endeavors to make you believe that there was no General Staff up until the time of this war he contradicts the statement of his own figures. The General Staff was first created in 1903. He insists that it is necessary to have 93 officers as provided in this bill to constitute that General Staff. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] provides for 40, and according to my judgment 40 officers in the General Staff are sufficient, and I believe 4 more than this country ought to have. According to the argument of the gentleman from California you can not have an efficient organization for any line of business or enterprise unless it is top heavy with office men, desk men, if you please. The truth of it is that the business sagacity of the United States of America has demonstrated for the past 30 years that for efficiency and for effective real accomplishment enterprises must get along with as few officers as possible. So it is with the Army of the United States so far as the General Staff is concerned. If we are going to have a great lot of 93 staff officers, we are going to have a top-heavy concern with some lines going in one direction and some going in another and disorder running everywhere. According to my deliberate judgment this amendment ought to be adopted and Gen. Pershing, ranking general of the United States Army, should be made the head of the General Staff.

My idea is that instead of going out over the United States and dragging officers to the city of Washington and making a great General Staff, that if you have a small number, competent and efficient under the law, with the right of all remaining in the city of Washington whenever the head sees proper to bring them here——

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Would my friend support an amendment to abolish the General Staff?

Mr. QUIN. I do not think that we ought to abolish the General Staff any more than I think that we ought to abolish the head of any private enterprise. For instance, take the great industry known as the Steel Corporation of the United States. It is an efficient organization and the reason that it is efficient and able to get there is because they have a strong, great business head, and around that head they have a limited efficient number to advise him. For that reason a General Staff to plan and advise for the Army of the United States in peace times, or for that matter in war, should be a small number of men, strong and efficient. If you are going to have a great General Staff in numbers, gathered around indiscriminately, for planning and advising, you will have the same trouble you have always had.

You can not conceive of this country, if there had been only three men in the General Staff when the war came, being in a worse condition. These gentlemen did not have a great store arms. They did not have all the machine guns and the artillery that this country needed. They had a large number of officers in the General Staff, but the headwork was not properly done and will not be properly done in the future if you have 93 or 1,000. It will be more inefficient than if you have 40, the number suggested by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. We are not preparing, as I understand it, to get into any war, but we are simply preparing to have the United States Army with a proper General Staff in order to safeguard and plan for the Army and for the future in case we do get into war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I appreciate the prejudice in the mind of the average man against what is known as the General Staff of the Army. It is a regrettable fact, and perhaps much of that prejudice is due to mistakes made by officers heretofore appointed to the General Staff. I say, and I speak to you in all sincerity, do not make a mistake. A general staff, and a general staff with troops, is the very foundation and bulwark of our Military Establishment. [Applause.] Do not fall into the error of believing that the functions of a general staff are not necessary. It was due to the fact that we did not have a large, able, efficient general staff when we got into this war that many mistakes were made, and another reason was due to the fact that civilians, dollar-a-day men, came into the city of Washington and pushed the General Staff of the Army off the map to a great extent. A general staff, gentlemen, simply means a general's staff. Old Frederick the Great, of Germany, realized that and was the first man to lay the foundation for a general staff. No man will say that Germany did not have a powerful military machine, but Germany laid the foundation first for a real general staff; and a general staff does not simply mean that they shall plan a few things here in the city of Washington, but it means that they shall plan the tactics and the plan of battle and all the things that go with it, so that if we get into war the general out yonder on the battle field will have men surrounding him who will hold up his hands and enable him to lead his men to victory.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. MILLER. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that within 30 days after this Great War came on the French general staff functioned completely and won the Battle of the Marne.

Mr. McKENZIE. Absolutely. That accounts to a great extent for the success of the French Army. Now, gentlemen, lay aside your prejudices for a moment. Are 90 men composing the General Staff of this great country too large a number, men taken from the line of the Army and detailed into the General Staff for four years, there to learn the lessons which are necessary in time of war? We have written into this bill a provision that no bonehead hereafter shall occupy a position on the General Staff. We provide that candidates for a position on the General Staff shall go through the school at Leavenworth, that they shall go through the staff college and then be appointed to positions on the General Staff. While I respect my friend from Alabama, while I love him as a man, I appeal to the men of this House to vote down his proposition; but if you feel that there is any danger left in this section that will enable the General Staff to step beyond the boundaries which we intend they shall keep within, then adopt some amendments further to safeguard that and remember that in providing for a General Staff we carry a provision for an Assistant Secretary of War, clothe him with the power of handling the business end of the Army, free from interference on the part of the General Staff. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. DENT. If my amendment carries, that same thing will be true.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to disagree with the ranking Democrat on the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. But the experiences of this war have demonstrated, as has been indicated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE], that it is absolutely necessary for us to have a real General Staff if our Army is to perform the functions for which it is organized.

When our people got over on the other side and began their operations, I am told, and I was told by many of the men who had to do with the Services of Supply, and particularly with the head of the Regulation Service, the American Army found that it did not have any staff organization upon which it could rely to supply it with the necessary information in order that the supplies of the Army and its men and material might be carried up to the front, and that in every instance when they found themselves confronted with this almost insurmountable obstacle, so far as their own organization was concerned, they turned to the French general staff, and on the asking of the question the immediate answer was supplied, and in following the direction of that great staff that had been organized for the purposes for which this General Staff will be organized they had no failures in any particular.

Under those circumstances, how can we refuse to benefit by the experience of our Army in the field? The same situation is here confronted that we confronted when we started to organize this Government. It is a truism that in many minds there are many ideas, and it is also true that where many minds are thinking upon the same subject there is a larger possibility of arriving at the truth. America is great because we have a system by which we register the opinion of all the people and arrive at the truth and adopt the policy that is good for all our country. Then why should we limit the number of men who are to study military science in this country and to prepare plans for our Army when it gets into the field? Why should we not take as many as possible of the men who are devoting their life to the study of the defense of our country, put them together, and order them to think upon this subject, and from the many minds coordinated get the truth and get the efficient and reasonable way to prepare ourselves for the defense of our country? Under those circumstances, gentlemen, as I said when I started, I am constrained to disagree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], and I hope that his substitute will be defeated.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] says that he proposes, and that the plan of his amendment is, to limit the General Staff to planning and to debar them from administrative work. Now, his purpose is not as plainly expressed in his amendment as is the same purpose of the committee in the bill which they have prepared. By turning to page 14 you will find the following:

That they shall not—

That is, the General Staff—

be permitted to assume or engage in work of an administrative nature that pertains to established bureaus or offices of the War Department.

Moreover, if you turn to page 12 you see there outlined exactly what the General Staff has the power to do, and no power is granted to it to do any work of an administrative nature.

Now, let me come to the plan and purpose of the gentleman's amendment. He says that the General Staff did not function at the outbreak of this war, and he purposes, undoubtedly, by his amendment, although he did not say so, to make the General Staff more effective, to so legislate that the General Staff will function at the beginning of the next war. How does he purpose to do it? Does he purpose to increase the number or broaden the scope of the powers of the General Staff, and in that way make it more efficient? Why, no. The gentleman from Alabama proposes just exactly the opposite. He proposes to narrow the scope of the powers of the General Staff and to reduce their number, to make them impotent in power, and so small in number that they can not function, and in that way he proposes to have them ready to meet the emergencies that will confront us on the outbreak of hostilities another time.

We maintain the Navy and the Army as insurance in time of peace against the difficulties that will confront us at the outbreak of war. If we are to pay for insurance, why not buy insurance of a kind that will protect us? Why not buy protection of the best kind? Let us not invest in a company that is sure to go bankrupt in the face of an emergency. Let us increase the power of the General Staff if it is necessary, or give them, rather, just the powers to which they are entitled under this bill. And those powers are purely of an advisory and planning nature, and do not include any administrative functions whatever. And let us not so reduce them that they will not have—as Admiral Sims did not have—a sufficient number in their branch of the service with which to do their work. In other words, if we are planning for an emergency let us plan on broad lines. Let us have our groundwork broad enough to meet the emergency for which we are preparing. Let us give the powers that are necessary, and let us furnish enough numbers to carry out those powers. [Applause.]

The part of the bill under discussion and the amendment both recognize the necessity of and provide for a General Staff. The sole points in difference between the bill and the amendment are as to its number and the powers of the General Staff.

Mr. HULINGS and Mr. HARRISON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, the difference between the two propositions—the one that is in the bill and the one that is included in the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]—is twofold. The first is as to the qualifications of the members of the General Staff and the second is as to the number that shall be on the General Staff. Now, the bill seems to propose that only those who have graduated at Leavenworth can be qualified to serve on the General Staff. I can see how the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] realizes that the breath of Leavenworth air is essential to and a qualification for very high position in the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair. The qualification provides for a number of different classes from which the General Staff can be drawn, and the service schools are only one of them.

Mr. HARRISON. The Leavenworth qualification seems to be the important one. Under the provisions of the bill the very ablest generals of the Army and the very best officers in the service would be excluded from serving on the General Staff.

A Chief of Staff who was considered one of the ablest officers that ever filled that position under the provisions of this bill would not be qualified to serve on the General Staff because he did not happen to breathe some of the Leavenworth air. Now, the gentlemen say that they are all in favor of the limitation of the powers of the General Staff. Yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] says here that we ought to have something like the Prussian system, and he seems to advocate that we must Prussianize our Army in order to secure efficiency. I have always understood that is what we wanted to avoid. However, you may write in this bill what you please as to the powers and the functions of the General Staff, but if you give the General Staff the officers you will find that no matter how much the limiting language of the bill may be you will find the staff assuming administrative duties. Why have all this large number of officers in this staff if it is to be merely a supervisory duty that the staff is to perform? Why, the object is that the staff can go ahead and discharge administrative duties, no matter what you put in this bill.

Why have the officers that are not necessary for supervisory duties? Why have officers who are not needed for that purpose, if it is not to enable this General Staff to go ahead and do administrative duties?

Now, as I understood, the committee was absolutely unanimous on the idea that we would not have any Prussian system; that we would not have a General Staff that would dominate all the different departments and bureaus. But if the proposition here is that we are to give this staff administrative duties—and that idea is included in the number of officers furnished—then I think we ought to know it, and the bill ought not to be camouflaged by language that seems to limit the powers of the staff. What is the use of having your Quartermaster General? What is the use of having your Chief of Ordnance, and so on, in all these different bureaus who are charged with the duties of discharging the functions assigned to those bureaus, if some little General Staff officer can dictate the policies and the duties of the Quartermaster General or tell the different departments how they shall discharge their duties?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia to recur to the language on page 12 of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. What is it?

Mr. MILLER. It defines the duties of the General Staff.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and it says that they shall do a little harmonizing.

Mr. MILLER. Is the gentleman of the opinion—lawyer as he is, and a good one—that it is possible under the language of the bill for the General Staff to indulge in administrative matters?

Mr. HARRISON. I know that in certain language of the bill the General Staff powers are limited, but in other features of this bill they are given the power to harmonize the different bureaus.

Mr. MILLER. Is not that the foundation of a General Staff, what it is for, to harmonize and coordinate?

Mr. HARRISON. The General Staff should be simply and solely an advisory board to the Secretary of War, and should not assume to discharge administrative duties. Now, I know of nothing so brutal and so cruel as one of these secret bureaus. Here is a General Staff operating in secret, behind closed doors, functioning in the Quartermaster Corps, and functioning in the Ordnance Corps, and functioning in all these different departments, and not charged with the responsibilities thereof.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DENT. Just in that connection, if it will not interrupt the gentleman from Virginia, I would like to call his attention to the language to which he refers. This is in the bill reported by the committee:

To render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, and to act as their agents in harmonizing the duties, plans, and operations of the branches and bureaus of the War Department and of the Army, and to perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may be from time to time prescribed.

Mr. HARRISON. The power is there.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has just been going through a catechism to qualify him for his well-recognized distinction at the bar. One more question before I grant to the gentleman his diploma: You know that under the Constitution of the United States the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the military forces, and that you and I, acting here in Congress, can not diminish his power of command over the individual soldier one little bit when we are acting in the proper constitutional relation between the soldier and Commander in Chief. Now, supposing you wrote in this bill that the General Staff was to act in an advisory capacity to the Secretary of War, which means to the Commander in Chief, and then have the Commander in Chief, having heard that advice, having approved it, accepted it, turn around to the individual members of that General Staff as soldiers, and command them to put it into execution. Where would you and I step in to prevent it, and under what law?

Mr. HARRISON. I admit that possibly the President could assign the duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I would like just to answer the statement of the gentleman from Vermont. I ask for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman from Vermont has said—and, of course, I admit it—that the President can direct these various officers to perform what duties he sees proper. But what we want to do is to say that those officers shall not function without the order of the President. We are conferring power here now by legislation, and it is to limit that power that I think the law ought to be framed, so that these men can not operate without the order from the President.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is a general question. As I understand, it is admitted that the General Staff was inadequate prior to the outbreak of the war; that it functioned ineffectively, so far as it functioned at all. Now, does the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] tend to make a more adequate General Staff?

Mr. HARRISON. It tends, of course, to make the General Staff efficient. There is no distinction, except as I have told you, between the two propositions pending before this House. One is the qualification of the members of the General Staff, that they should have some Leavenworth experience or some other scholastic qualifications, and, second, as to the number of them; and the point that I have made as to the number is that the reason why a large staff is asked for is simply and solely to give them the officers necessary to operate these different bureaus. If you limit the number of officers down to the number that is actually required for advisory purposes, then you know they are not going to usurp functions, because they have not the officers to do it with. What are all these officers going to do if they are not here to operate these different bureaus in the War Department? That is the object of all this number of officers. It is to furnish the necessary personnel for operations. And, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] has pointed out, there is ample authority for them in this bill to discharge administrative duties if they determine to do it.

Now, I think what is up to this committee is whether we are going to have a General Staff that will be limited in its functions or not. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] was the very gentleman who converted me to the idea that we ought to have a General Staff that should not have any administrative duties. In the committee room, when I was talking with him there one day and advising with him as to why the staff should not be permitted to go ahead and discharge administrative duties, he went into a very learned and philosophical exposition of the reasons why the General Staff should not have any administrative powers, and I am surprised that he is now standing on this floor and catechizing me, because I have "sat at his feet and learned" wisdom from him. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I was going to see if the gentleman would stay hitched. In the committee room I thought that the gentleman's mind was "a mind that was going along with mine." [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I did go along with the gentleman. That is the trouble. When I got up here on the floor I thought I was hitched, but now I can not find the hitching post. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think the General Staff is one of the most important features in any great army, but I can not help the conviction that this bill is overloaded not only with officers but enlisted men. I do not believe that there is any present or prospective necessity for a Regular Army in this country of over 125,000 men. [Applause.]

An Army of 300,000 men, with 17,820 officers, is in my opinion too large an army in time of peace.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am very much interested in that statement. I should like to know how the gentleman arrives at the conviction that 125,000 men will be adequate. I am asking for information.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, before the war, when war was imminent and threatening on every hand, Congress believed that 175,000 men were all that were necessary. Up until we got into the war we really had only about 120,000 enlisted men in the Army. We had been going along very well for years with 75,000 or 80,000 men. I believe 125,000 or 150,000 men are all that will be necessary, and if that is true then a great number of these high officials could be dispensed with.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HULINGS. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have only a little time.

I have been amused at the argument that has been propounded here that this General Staff, according to the bill, have nothing to do with the administration of the plans that they devise; but when I read on page 12 of the bill I learn that the Chief of Staff has all the plans made for recruiting, organizing, supplying, equipping, mobilizing, training, and demobilizing the Army.

Now, it is true that the Chief of Staff keeps the Secretary of War advised of these plans, but I think the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff will be a kind of Damon and Pythias society. It is undoubtedly that kind of an affair at the present time, and upon the approval of such plans the Chief of Staff shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment. Now, I should like to know what the functions of the general of the Army are and where he comes in under this bill.

Mr. CARAWAY. To march at the head of the parades. [Laughter].

Mr. HULINGS. It looks a good deal that way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It makes the general of the Army a supernumerary.

Mr. HULINGS. It makes the general of the Army a supernumerary, and everyone who has gone out to guard mount in the morning and watched the performance of supernumeraries will understand what that means.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Is it not a fact that the greatest war we ever fought was fought without a General Staff?

Mr. HULINGS. I do not think so. There have been great changes, and in the last war the dimensions of it were very much greater.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Recently I talked with the greatest living soldier in this country, and he said the General Staff was largely ornamental. He did not use the expression, but it is a good deal like the curl in a pig's tail, more for ornament than use. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, however that may be, much as I should like to go along with this committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] made a suggestion that I think should be seriously considered, and that is that there are some things, especially in this section, that ought to be amended. My objection to the bill is that it makes the Chief of Staff the great big it. There is nothing in the Army except the Chief of Staff. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, it is true that, when we speak with strict regard for the technicalities and the meaning of specific law terms, the Civil War was fought without a General Staff at the head of the Union Army. But happily as we read history we find that that oversight or omission was very ingeniously supplied by this very floor right here undertaking to usurp the functions of a General Staff, mix politics with military ignorance, and direct battle fields 300 miles away. [Laughter.] That is what happened. That is what happens when men who are by nature wise in statecraft undertake to mix up with military technique in the national defense and battle fields.

It seems to me that we can all consider this thing more or less in the same plane, as I dare say we intend to do, at least in our mutual forbearance and good will, and in that we do not intend to erect in the United States Army any military caste, or hierarchy, or inner court that shall be inaccessible to the common man in the Army or to the civilian who keeps the Army going. I do not think anybody in the committee or anybody on the floor wants to erect any kind of a Prussianized autocracy in the Army. I do not think anybody here would for a moment find himself consciously supporting that sort of a proposition.

But we must regard this as a strictly practical matter. We know that an army is an organization composed of so many varied and diversified functions that in the inherent nature of its make-up it must function by specialization, and that it needs some kind of a presiding mind or council of group of minds to coordinate and harmonize those functions, because their only legitimate employment is not individualistic, each for himself, but in such a combination acting together, knowing and understandng one another's purposes, that they will attain a common object and defeat the common foe. [Applause.]

The history of all the wars of the past is strewn with melancholy reminders that corps jealousies, individual ambitions, and the pride of individual commanders sometimes made them just prejudiced enough against the man in another arm or against that other arm itself, so that they failed to coordinate properly in the presence of the enemy, and just at the wrong time.

The General Staff, when we get right down to the meaning of the term, is simply the mind of the Army, and the various arms and branches and services represent just exactly what our limbs do to our minds, and must be functioned and coordinated by one governing intelligence or else their purposes are well-nigh useless.

There is a great distinction between what is intended in the planning and direction of the General Staff to that extent and the actual performance of the strictly departmental and technical duties of the officers who are to be so coordinated. I think that if we keep that distinction in our minds, and if we intend our language to meet that thing, we shall find that instead of there being a real serious difference among us we are actually heartily agreed. Somebody must advise the Secretary of War about these things and must do it out of abundance of military experience and learning. No one man, however gifted, can do it all alone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know that we can write into the bill such terms as may indicate our own intent and purpose in this law, such terms as we hope will in a prudent and intelligent way put some sense of limitation upon the employment of these officers, so that, with proper reservation as to the expense they may entail on us, we may feel that we have some security in our first intention to have a well-organized Military Establishment.

And yet, as lawmakers, testing things by this same proposition, we know that when we go up to a certain point with directions against the Chief Executive and his constitutional functions, we must there stop. He has authority as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States to direct any soldier or man sworn into the service of the Army and to compel his instant obedience to any lawful order.

Mr. WISE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman has made that statement two or three times, and I want to ask the gentleman a question. Is it not a fact that, although he is Commander in Chief of the Army, he must be governed by the law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He is Commander in Chief of the Army created and organized by law.

Mr. WISE. If we organize the General Staff, prescribe their number and their duty, the Commander in Chief would order them in accordance with the law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman fails to see my point. We may prescribe in the bill that the General Staff, as such, shall only counsel and advise the Commander in Chief. The Commander in Chief may accept that counsel and advice and propose to put it into execution. I dare say my learned friend from Georgia will not attempt to argue that, having decided to put such a military plan into execution, the President of the United States is not empowered under the Constitution to direct any and every soldier that it may be necessary to require to see that that plan is put into execution, and he is not inhibited by anything that we write in the law from so doing.

Mr. WISE. I understood by the gentleman's argument that it did not make any difference what we said the General Staff could or could not do, still the President as Commander in Chief could order them to do something else.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman puts another interpretation upon what I said. The General Staff, as such, are only required by law to do these things; but with reference to the individual soldier, whether in the staff or not, his duty is to obey all lawful orders of the Commander in Chief of a military character. If the Commander in Chief should turn around to an officer of the General Staff and send him to San Francisco to carry out a part of that counsel and advice, I doubt if there is any law to prevent it.

Mr. WISE. The gentleman is getting away from the point.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; I made the point first and I am trying to keep at it.

Mr. WISE. I understood the gentleman to say that, although we might say that the General Staff should not exercise administrative duties, the President as Commander in Chief could order otherwise.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I say it will be found that a proper and lawful plan and policy sanctioned by Congress having been agreed upon and put into promulgation by the Commander in Chief, he can direct any soldier in the Army to be an agent in its execution.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Do not the provisions of this bill and the amendment equally recognize and provide for a General Staff, and is not the sole question whether the General Staff shall be of a certain number and have certain powers?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is all there is to it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 10 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I neglected in the original explanation of my substitute for this section to explain that I undertake to carry out the idea which I suggested yesterday of giving the General of the Armies some duties and functions to perform which he has not now. I call the attention of the committee to the following language in my substitute, which does not appear in any language of the bill as reported by the committee:

> When plans prepared by the War Department General Staff shall have been approved by the President, acting through the Secretary of War, the General of the Armies of the United States shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment during such execution. Should there be no General of the Armies of the United States, a major general of the line on active duty, selected by the President, shall be designated the commanding general of the armies and shall be the executive head through which Army plans are executed. General Staff officers serving with the executive head of the Army shall be considered as serving with troops.

If you vote down this substitute of mine, then there will be absolutely no provision to take care of Gen. Pershing. My substitute limits the work of the General Staff, as I said in the beginning, purely to planning and devising for the Army, whereas the administration of the military affairs of the country and of the War Department will under this section be given to the man who by act of Congress has been made the commanding general of the Army of the United States. If you do not adopt some provision of this kind, then you leave Gen. Pershing—as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said—simply a supernumerary officer of the Army.

I repeat, in conclusion, that you can not find any reason on earth why you should have ninety-odd officers sitting around the War College here in the District of Columbia devising schemes and plans for the Army. I submit that 40 officers, 10 to each committee serving the purpose that that branch of the service is supposed to serve, is entirely sufficient for every legitimate Army plan, and I trust that simply because this amendment comes from this side of the House, when I am undertaking to perfect this bill, it will not be voted down.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words in conclusion. The War Department, represented by the present Secretary of War, recommended to the Committee on Military Affairs 210 officers for the General Staff and the War Department staff.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman know why he did it? He did it upon the recommendation of the General Staff itself.

Mr. KAHN. I do not know why he did it. I know that he is the military administrative officer of this administration, and he has come to the Committee on Military Affairs of this House and asked for 210 officers in the War Department General Staff and in the staff with the troops.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. In a moment. The Committee on Military Affairs reduced the estimates of the Secretary of War to 188 officers so that we are not giving as many officers in the General Staff as this administration asked for. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. That is what I wanted to ask. If you were following expert advice, why did you cut it down from 210?

Mr. KAHN. Because upon investigation by the committee, after hearings with officers in the War Department, finally concluded that we could get along with 188, and, acting upon that expert advice, we fixed the number at 188.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I am frank to say to the gentleman from California that so far as the number of officers in the General Staff is concerned, in my judgment the burden is upon the proponents of the bill. I would be glad to be advised during the progress of this discussion as to how the different officers are to be used in the General Staff and what functions they are to perform that makes that number necessary.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, in the few minutes remaining to me I can not go into those details, but I will be very glad to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement which shows the exact distribution of these men, and I think the gentleman from Texas will be satisfied that they are absolutely needed.

Mr. BEE. Of course, the gentleman from California understands that it is not my purpose in any way to curtail or cripple the efficiency of either the General Staff or any other branch, but the burden, as I say, is upon the committee.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Texas has had a great deal of experience in military matters. He comes from a part of the country that has a wonderful military post. I know that he has given this subject a great deal of thought and attention, and I always value the suggestions of the gentleman from Texas. I shall insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement of the distribution that the gentleman now asks for.

Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and, on a division (demanded by Mr. DENT), there were—ayes 35, noes 50.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DENT and Mr. KAHN to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, strike out all of page 10, all of page 11, all of page 12, all of page 13, and all of page 14 down to and including line 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That section 5 be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"'SEC. 5. General Staff: The General Staff shall consist of the War Department General Staff and the General Staff with troops. The War Department General Staff shall consist of 1 Chief of Staff and 4 assistants to the Chief of Staff selected by the President from the general officers of the line and 50 other officers of grades not below that of major. The General Staff with troops shall consist of not more than 100 officers, not below the grade of major, as may be necessary to perform the General Staff duties of the headquarters of territorial departments, armies, Army corps, divisions, and brigades, and as military attachés abroad. In time of peace the detail of an officer as a member of the General Staff shall be for a period of four years, unless sooner relieved.

"'The duties of the War Department General Staff shall be to prepare plans for the national defense and for the mobilization of the military forces and national resources in time of war; to investigate and report upon all questions affecting the efficiency of the Army and its state of preparation for military operations; to render professional aid and assistance to the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff.

"'The duties of the General Staff with troops shall be to render professional aid and assistance to the general officers over them, to prepare detailed instructions for the execution of the plans of the commanding generals, and the supervision of the execution of such instructions.

"'The Chief of Staff, under the direction of the President or of the Secretary of War, shall cause the preparation by the War Department General Staff of the necessary plans for recruiting, organizing, supplying, equipping, mobilizing, training, and demobilizing the Army for its use in the national defense. He shall keep the Secretary of War informed of all plans prepared by the War Department General Staff and advise him as to the practicability and desirability of such plans. Upon the approval of such plans by the Secretary of War he shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment in such a way as to insure their effective development and execution. In case any recommendations for legislation for the national defense or for the reorganization of the Army or for any other requirements of the Military Establishment are presented by the Secretary of War to Congress or to one of the committees of Congress, such recommendations shall be accompanied by a statement from the appropriate division of the War Department General Staff setting forth the reasons for such recommendations and including the names of the officers of the War Department General Staff who prepared it, together with such pertinent comments for and against the plan as may be made by the Secretary of War, the Chief of Staff, or individual officers of the division of the War Department General Staff in which the plan was prepared.

"'Hereafter members of the General Staff shall be confined strictly to the discharge of duties of the general nature of these specified for them in this section and in the act of Congress approved February 14, 1903, and they shall not be permitted to assume or engage in work of an administrative nature that pertains to established bureaus or offices of the War Department, or that, being assumed or engaged in by members of the General Staff, would involve impairment of the responsibility or initiative of such bureaus or offices, or would cause injurious or unnecessary duplication of or delay in the work thereof.'"

Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Was not a motion agreed to closing debate upon this section and all amendments thereto?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the motion to apply to the amendment offiered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and all amendments thereto. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to explain briefly what this amendment would do if adopted. It reduces the War Department General Staff from 88 to 50, and it would reduce the General Staff with troops to 100. Those are the only reductions made in the present bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The bill provides for only 100 with the troops.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is one of the troubles about this bill. It is possible under the construction of the language of the bill to have a general staff of over 300. The trouble with this whole bill is that you can not put your finger anywhere on this bill and safely rely upon its stating the intention of the framer. It has been constructed for that very reason; it is full of jokers from beginning to end. The great mistake about the bill is that it was prepared by men who are not in sympathy with its general policy. They were instructed by this committee, so I understand, to put certain things in the bill, and they put them in and then counteracted them by putting in different language in other places, and I want to point out some of those things.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will in a moment or two. I want now to call attention to two items here, where they have absolutely circumvented the intention of Congress or what I believe to be the intention of a majority of Congress, and what was the desire of the Military Affairs Committee. Attention has been called to the language on page 12, wherein it is provided:

The duties of the General Staff with troops shall be to render professional aid and assistance to the general officers over them; to act as their agents in harmonizing the plans, duties, and operations of the various organizations and services under their jurisdiction, in preparing detailed instructions for the execution of the plans of the commanding generals, and in supervising the execution of such instructions.

I contend that under that language they absolutely can take charge of every bureau in the War Department and administer it just as they have been administering them during the present war, and if that is not enough I desire to call attention to some language on page 13, commencing in the fourth line—

Upon the approval of such plans by the Secretary of War, he shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment in such a way as to insure their effective development and execution.

Under that language I maintain that they can go into every bureau and take charge of it just as they have been doing. I would like to call attention to some of the things they have been doing to show you how absolutely injurious their conduct has been in interfering with the administration affairs of these different bureaus.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. After the war was over a new man was put at the head of the Quartermaster Corps. He had large experience on the border, he went abroad, and he was to the Quartermaster Corps what Pershing was to the Army. He came back here from Europe with his experience from abroad and the practical ideas he got over there by reason of his contact and operations in a business way with the Quartermaster Corps. He instituted an order whereby 72 commissioned officers would be relieved from the pay roll of that department and 551 privates or civilian employees. What happened? The very minute that the General Staff found out what the quartermaster had done they countermanded it. Why? Because it interfered with their administrative functions that they had arrogated to themselves. That is only one instance; there are hundreds of others. When this war broke out I went to the Quartermaster Corps, which I thought was the place to go, and tendered the services of a gentleman who had an organization for buying and selling horses all over this country, one of the greatest importers and exporters of horses the United States ever had. He tendered his entire organization to the Government, and I finally found I had to go and consult a member of the General Staff who had these things under him, an administrative duty pure and simple. What did he say? He said, "Thank the gentleman for his patriotism and his kindness, but we have a committee of Army officers to buy our horses." They might know a horse when they saw him, but they would not know where to get him or know how to get him, and would not know how to get them in quantities, and would have been skinned to death by the horse dealers throughout the country. That plan remained for a little while, until they found out how absolutely impossible it was, and they then took and divided the country into zones, and if Indiana had a horse to sell it went to Kansas City. Wherever these gentlemen have intruded themselves into the administrative affairs of this Government and its war bureaus they have done it to the everlasting detriment of the department, and it has led to indescribable waste. That is the fault with this bill I am insisting on, and I say that it reeks with provisions just like this to which I call attention whereby they are surreptitiously taking authority to themselves that they will assert it is made plain by the admission made by the chairman of this committee that the Secretary of War was asking for 210 or 250, I do not know which, as the number of this General Staff. But that request did not emanate from the Secretary of War. It emanated, if you please, from the General Staff, and is further concrete evidence of their desire to militarize and Prussianize every one of the bureaus of the War Department.

They were not content, if you please, to act in their advisory capacity during the war, but they went to our supply depots and took charge of them, and they went wherever they could, wherever they had men to send, and if they did not take charge of all of these bureaus it was because their number was not sufficient. Therefore they want a largely increased number—210 or 250—that they may spread their tentacles into every branch and every bureau where they can, and I do not believe that the people of this country want a continuation of this character of service. An administrative authority, arrogated by this staff to themselves, has done more to unpopularize the Army than all other things combined, and you can do much to popularize it by saying to the people of this country that thus far shall this staff go and no farther, and that they shall have nothing to do with the administrative affairs of the bureaus of the War Department. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were—ayes 33, noes 36.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. WOOD of Indiana and Mr. KAHN) reported that there were—ayes 50, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, in order to correct the language of the bill in this section, which is perhaps open to some of the criticisms which have been voiced on both sides of the aisle, and for which I think there is some ground, it is my intention to offer amendments which I believe will go far toward correcting the interpretations which have been made upon the section to the effect that the language still permits the General Staff to operate and to administer. I want to assure the committee that it was the desire of the Committee on Military Affairs to write this language so as to prevent the General Staff from operating and administering. I believe that if we make one amendment, page 12, line 7, after the word "staff," if you strike out the words "and to act as their agent," that means of the Secretary of War in carrying out such plans, and so forth, will cure one of those criticisms. Then, again, on page 13, line 4, after the word "plans," if we strike out this sentence, "upon the approval of such plans by the Secretary of War, he [meaning the Chief of Staff] shall supervise their execution, and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment in such a way as to insure their effective development and execution," it will also cure what is obviously authority to operate.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows, of course, that the language he refers to on page 12 is in the original staff provision of the act of 1903, with the exception of one or two words?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman that the language is almost exactly so, with the exception of two words, but the change of those words vitally affects the meaning of the language.

Mr. KAHN. It is not the gentleman's opinion that the committee has materially changed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me quote the language of the original law creating the General Staff. It does use the words, "To act as their agents," meaning of the Secretary of War, "in informing and coordinating the action." The word "informing" certainly does not confer the power to operate. We have in our bill the words "to harmonize," which might confer the power to act, and I think we ought to strike out the words authorizing the General Staff to act.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman think he can obtain his purpose by striking out the word "harmonizing" and inserting the words "informing and cooperating," which would leave the language as it was originally in the bill which created the General Staff?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 12, line 7, after the word "Staff," strike out the words, "and to act as their agents."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall support this amendment, but I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question. His amendment is in line with some of the criticisms I had to make against this section of the bill, and I would like to ask him if he does not think the last sentence in lines 10 and 11, page 12, should also be stricken out on account of its generality:

And to perform such other military duties not otherwise assigned by law as may from time to time be prescribed.

Does not that leave the gap still open?

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not strike them out, because those words are the exact language of the original law.

Mr. DENT. I understand they are.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to strike out the words that might put the power upon the General Staff.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas by striking out, in lines 10 and 11, page 12——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that those lines have already been stricken from the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They were stricken from the bill by the amendment of Mr. MCKENZIE on yesterday.

Mr. DENT. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 13, line 4, after the word "plans," strike out this sentence: "Upon the approval of such plans by the Secretary of War, he shall supervise their execution and shall coordinate the work of the Military Establishment in such a way as to insure their effective development and execution."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HULINGS: Page 13, line 5, after the word "War," strike out the word "he" and insert in lieu thereof the words "commanding officer of the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to call attention to the fact that this would provide some function for the General of the Army. It would require that the Chief of Staff should perform his duties in formulating plans, and all that sort of thing; but after the plans were provided for and approved by the Secretary of War the General of the Army would supervise their execution and coordinate the work of the Military Establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the substitute. I want to suggest to the committee that we can not very consistently through law direct a military officer, who is responsible to the Commander in Chief, to perform a certain specified function here, when that officer may at the very same time have been detailed to a foreign post. If we once begin to say that an officer of the Army shall perform certain functions that are clearly under the direction of the Commander in Chief, we can not stop at the general of the Army, but we have got to go right down through the captains and lieutenants. The office of the general of the Army is limited to a certain man now, and that office will expire probably years before this act is ever again amended.

Mr. HULINGS. If the gentleman will permit, the language of the substitute is "the commanding officer of the Army."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Even at that, who is the commanding officer of the Army when the commanding general is not?

Mr. HULINGS. If nobody knows who the commanding officer is, it is a "de'il" of an army.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Who is he?

Mr. HULINGS. It is shown in this bill who he is. It is the Chief of Staff. He is the whole thing under the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is an opinion and not a judgment. Whom would you hold as a matter of law was the commanding officer of the Army under the terms of your proposed substitute? Until you can tell us that, we ought not to adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, may we have it reported again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT], a member of the committee. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DENT: Page 10, line 6, after the word "and," strike out "eighty-eight" and insert "forty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 37.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] is recognized. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STRONG of Kansas: Page 10, line 7, after the word "captain," insert "Provided, That during the incumbency of the General of the Army on the active list that officer shall exercise the powers and perform the functions assigned by law to the Chief of Staff. In the event of the assignment of the General of the Army to the command of troops in war, the powers and functions assigned to the Chief of Staff shall be exercised by an acting Chief of Staff selected by the President from the Army of the United States."

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, this amendment that I have offered is taken from the Senate bill for the reorganization of the Army, and I think it ought to go into this bill. Without it we will lose Gen. Pershing's experience and ability from the management of the Army. With a General Staff underranking Gen. Pershing he will be practically detached from the management or control of the Army, and it does seem to me that we ought to have that experience that he has secured in France and that ability that he has displayed as general in command of our armies at the head of the General Staff. We are paying him the highest salary in the Army, and we are doing it because we believe in his unquestioned ability, knowledge, and experience. It seems to me we should have at the head of the General Staff that ability that we have so highly appreciated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I only want to suggest to the committee that if any one of us were charged with the highly important functions of the Secretary of War and were held responsible for what we did in that position, we would like at least the privilege of choosing our own first military adviser and not have Congress select him for us, inasmuch as we, in that position as Secretary of War, and not Congress, were going to be responsible for what happened out of the council.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I also would like to suggest to the committee that by adopting this amendment we would very probably and very seriously embarrass both Gen. Pershing and the Secretary of War, to say nothing of the embarrassment that falls upon the Chief of Staff. While we all love and admire and honor and respect the great General of the great American Army, and have demonstrated our pride in him and our willingness to confer upon him all the power and honor that his great service to the country warrants, I do not think that the country would ever for a moment think that we had neglected him in this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. In a moment. Gen. Pershing is unique at this time. He occupies a position that no one else can occupy in the armed forces of America, and to place upon him the detail now, after his heroic service in the Nation's cause, of the work of the Chief of Staff would be a step down, and not a step up, to the man who has performed this service. He is now the adviser of the whole Army, the adviser of the President and the Secretary of War, of the Chief of Staff, of Congress, and of the Nation on its military affairs. Under these circumstances I think that we would be doing a discrediting thing to say that the man who has done these things shall now step into an inferior position and perform this detail duty of Chief of Staff.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if we do not provide in this bill a duty to be performed by Gen. Pershing, which is, perhaps, the most important duty connected with the whole Military Establishment, and that is to act as the president of the board to pass upon the qualifications of men to be put on the promotion list?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not true that the law permits a captain to select his first sergeant, who stands in the same relation to him, in a certain degree, at least being his first and chief subordinate of his class, that the Chief of Staff would be to the Secretary of War?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas rose.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; and the gentleman has very clearly brought that out before, as he usually does in his illustrations.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If Gen. Pershing is not Chief of Staff, he would practically be inferior in rank to them? Would he not be practically their errand boy?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The law creating the position of General of the Armies of the United States, to which Gen. Pershing is supposed to be appointed, provides that no officer of the Army shall be above him.

Mr. CALDWELL. Of course; and it says further that this place shall die with him.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. He would practically be detached from its operations, would he not?

Mr. CALDWELL. If the General of the Army can be detached from it, yes; but how can he and still be General of the Army?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. You do not think the General of the Army should take orders from the Chief of Staff, do you?

Mr. CALDWELL. He would take orders from the President of the United States, and that is the only one he ever took orders from, although the Republican Chief of Staff undertook to send orders to him in Europe.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] referred to the provision of the law which prohibited the General of the Army from taking orders from any other officer of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; the gentleman from California did not say that.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman from South Carolina is mistaken as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 10, line 21, after the words "Staff Corps," strike out all of the line and the balance of page and all on page 11 down to and including line 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "This board shall select and report the names of all officers of the Regular Army, National Guard, and officers of the Reserve Corps who by reason of their service or military experience may be deemed to be suitable for General Staff duty or qualified therefor."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have heard a great deal about the flexibility of this bill, and in those parts in which the bill has flexibility it has some merit. But I want to point out to the committee where the Committee on Military Affairs evidently forgot their principle of flexibility. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that section 5 provides a certain board for the selection of officers who may be detailed for General Staff duty. In the first place, it gives two members of that board to the General Staff Corps, one of whom is commandant of the General Staff College and the other commandant of the General Service School. The third member of the board shall be detailed from officers of the line. If a candidate is to be considered for General Staff duty, what else is required? This board has absolutely no discretion whatever within the restrictions which I propose to point out. Read on page 11, section (a):

This board shall select—

shall select and report the names of all officers of the Regular Army, National Guard, and Officers' Reserve Corps of the following classes:

(a) Those officers graduated from the Army Staff College or the Army War College—

prior to July 1, 1917.

In order to be eligible in class (a) the officers before they can even be considered for selection by this board must have graduated from the Army Staff College or the Army War College on or before July 1, 1917, and—

Who, upon graduation, were specifically recommended for duty—

For what? For what kind of duty?

as commander or chief of staff of a division or higher tactical unit.

Gentlemen of the committee, how many officers in the Army prior to July 1, 1917, had graduated at the Army Staff College and had been recommended for the command of a division of the Army in the field, or for chief of staff of a division or higher tactical unit? How many of them?

Let us see what other restrictions this bill places around the eligibility of these officers for General Staff duty.

(b) Those officers who, since April 6, 1917, have commanded a division or higher tactical unit—

In other words an officer who commanded a division or a corps or an army—or have demonstrated by actual service in the World War that they are qualified for General Staff duty.

I submit to the members of this committee that under these two subdivisions no man would be eligible to be selected by this board for General Staff duty unless he had either come within sections (a) and (b) and been recommended for the command of a division or chief of staff of a division, or had actually served as commanding general of a division, or had actually served in a staff position, because how could he by actual service have demonstrated that he was fitted for General Staff duty unless by actual service as an officer of the General Staff he "demonstrated" that he was suitable? I want to say to the gentlemen of this committee that every officer in the Army ought to be eligible for selection by this board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. The fact that he is placed upon the eligible list does not ipso facto detail him for General Staff duty. You still have the board to make the selections. He must still pass the scrutiny of their examination. But, gentlemen of this House, by these two provisions of this bill you build up not a military aristocracy but a military oligarchy. You leave it in the hands of a few men, who are now in the staff corps, if you please, to say who else shall be eligible to enter into this charmed circle in which they are now the dominating spirits. I want to say, gentlemen, that just as surely as you are sitting here the officers who went into the war as civilians and who have since become officers ought to be eligible for this service. If you adopt the provisions in the bill, the great mass of reserve officers who are to be appointed to fill vacancies under this bill will not be eligible for detail as General Staff officers.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman from Texas, of course, will admit that an officer ought to be qualified?

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure.

Mr. McKENZIE. Before he is placed on the staff?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman will further admit that they are detailed for a period of four years only?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. And he will further admit that this bill provides the manner in which other officers shall prepare themselves for appointments to the General Staff?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, if there is to be an oligarchy created, that can exist for only four years. Is not that true?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that it can exist for all time, as he will see if he will read a little further:

After the completion of the initial General Staff Corps eligible list the name of no officer shall be added thereto unless upon graduation from the General Staff School he is specifically recommended as qualified for General Staff duty, and after July 1, 1924, no officer of the General Staff Corps except the Chief of Staff and the Assistants to the Chief of Staff shall be assigned as a member of the War Department General Staff unless he is a graduate of the General Staff College.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's train of thought, but——

Mr. CONNALLY. Gentlemen of the committee, I submit that the Committee on Military Affairs ought to introduce into this section of the bill some of the vaunted flexibility which they have been discussing, and I submit that a reserve officer who is now in the Army and who may be appointed to fill a vacancy under this bill can not become eligible for detail to service on the General Staff unless he goes to the General Staff College before July 1, 1924, and is specifically recommended. Why insert the word "specifically"? Because you want to throw one more stumbling block in the path of the officer who has not heretofore been detailed for staff duty. Under the terms of the bill a man to gain entrance into the General Staff must, in order to pass the outer door, give a password, and after getting into the anteroom he must approach another door and give a certain number of knocks and then give another password, and he is taken into another anteroom and must give a certain number of knocks and whisper some talismanic words into the ear of some faithful servitor of the staff.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to another thing. He stated a moment ago that at present a man could not serve in the Staff Corps except four years, and then is detailed back to the line or relieved from detail. That is ordinarily so, and yet, gentlemen of the committee, yesterday, on page 9, line 12, you placed in the bill a provision that would make it possible for an officer now in the Staff Corps who has served four years to serve four years more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to call attention to this language, page 9, line 12. You will note in the previous part of this particular section it is provided that officers of the line can only be detailed for service on the Staff Corps, provided they have served two years in the preceding six years with troops. That is correct, but when it comes to staff officers they may be detailed for four years provided they have served only one year with troops.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit a statement? That is existing law. That is not written in here for the first time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly not. If the national defense law is not in any particular satisfactory, has not Congress the right to change it? It is not sacred.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. KAHN. The first part that the gentleman read refers to the line officers. That is what is known as the "Manchu" law. It has been in existence since 1912. The second part refers to the staff officers. The committee realized that the condition in the staff bureaus before we got into the war brought about a very unfortunate situation. The bill provides that officers in the supply staff corps shall be permanently detailed in those corps or bureaus, because they are specialists; but they must go back to the line, so as to become familiar with the line organization one year in five.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is very wise, and I am in favor of the proposition as provided in the bill, that members of the Staff Corps ought to be detailed from the line and ought to go back to the line after a stated period. Gen. Upton, in his great book on The Military Policy of the United States, lays down that principle, and I believe it ought to be maintained. But what I am talking about is that you require a line officer to serve two years while a staff officer is only required to serve one year with troops.

But I have not got to the point that I actually wanted to call attention to. On line 12, page 9, I want to show you how the committee sidesteps when it gets to the point. What does it say?

In the administration of this provision, all duty performed between April 6, 1917, and July 1, 1920, inclusive, shall be regarded as satisfying the requirements of service with combatant arms.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. This particular law is now in existence and we are simply repeating existing law.

Mr. CRAGO. We passed the law three or four months ago.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not give a continental whether it is existing law or not. Our business is to pass the right kind of a law whether it is existing law or not. You do not respect existing law in other parts of the bill; you repeal or amend a dozen sections of the national defense act, but when it comes to this particular provision the committee wants to save the General Staff, and then "existing law" becomes the holy of holies, and we are told "you shall not lay hands on the ark of the covenant." Under the terms of this bill you provide that a staff officer shall serve four years on the General Staff Corps. He does not have to go back to the line and serve one year, as you pretend to provide in the bill, because under the provision I have quoted service during the war shall be considered as service with troops, and although he has been detailed for four years and his term is about to expire, under this saving clause in the bill he may be detailed for another four years and thus complete eight years' successive service in the Staff Corps.

Gentlemen, I am speaking for officers scattered around on the arid plains of Arizona, guarding the Mexican border, officers out in the little Army posts that have for a long period of time performed irksome and arduous duty. I do not believe it is fair to hedge about the General Staff with all of these restrictions and make it impossible for such officers ever to serve as a member of the General Staff. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, if it had been the intention of the committee to do what my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] seems to think we had in our minds, it certainly would be reprehensible. It would be a very conspicuous instance of an attempt to write special and personal favoritism into the general law. If my friend will take occasion to look back of the record he will see that more than half a year ago, as I recollect it, when the War Department tried to readjust the details of officers of the line as well as the staff under the terms of the Manchu law, which applies to both the staff and the line, the committee found it would have necessitated a search of the War Department records for three years or more, because not all these line officers had been by any means on duty with troops, literally, but had been assigned here and there—not on staff positions—on all manner of necessary military details brought into existence in the emergency of war, and they would not come literally under the provisions of the language which requires that every officer should serve this period with troops.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. And, of course, that provision of law was enacted upon the recommendation of the present Secretary of War.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that the lines which I pointed out would permit a new detail for another four years of an officer who had already been so serving?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It would; and there is no attempt made to disguise it. The reason for it, as I have tried to indicate, is that it does not apply simply to the limited number of men in the Regular Establishment who have been on duty in the staff departments and who may under the terms of this be redetailed, if they are personally selected for redetails. It applies equally to correct the record of all the line officers in the service anywhere and everywhere, so far as their own personal eligibility to detail to the staff for the first or any time is concerned. That is the point. These men may not have satisfied the requirement of the Manchu law within the last few years, because while still line officers they were out on some special errand that did not attach them to the troops, and those very same line officers would be thereby deprived of an opportunity to have a staff assignment. That is a reason for it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing if some of the line officers who went overseas and who actually participated in military operations were placed on the General Staff, so as to give the value of their experience to that functioning body?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the gentleman from Vermont recognize that if you continue all of the people who are now on the General Staff for the next four years, that object can not be accomplished?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman will find that there is no intention to continue everybody on the General Staff. The only purpose of that special legislation which went through the House, when the matter was all carefully explained on the floor, was, by statute, to clear up a great complicated mass of records that otherwise would have necessitated comparisons by calendar dates on the records of all kinds of men in the service, both line and staff, occasioning an infinite mass of detailed work, in an effort to determine whether out of the six years they had actually had the requisite two years' duty with troops. That task seemed to be so ridiculous and so unnecessary in the press of present conditions that it was thought wiser to wipe it out and start fresh with a clean slate. It also protects the chance of your line officers, in whom the gentleman seems to be interested, to get onto the staff.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has pointed out that there seems to be a delimitation on the qualifications for eligibility to this initial list for the General Staff that practically resolves it into a snobbish or perhaps a military caste—an exclusve society, rather facetiously indicated to us as being organized on the lines of fraternal or secret societies. We all realize that when you want to start a new enterprise you have to take what you have in order to make a beginning. If you are going to establish a certain thing on an original foundation, it has been the policy, through public experience, not to wipe out utterly the existing personnel of that institution, but to try and start from that, to make your modification and establish your new line of policy. Trivial as it may seem to be, I will refresh your memory, if you will permit me, by just such an instance as this.

Years ago some of the States began for the first time to require a license for the practice of pharmacy and to lay down certain qualifications that the licensed pharmacist must have. What did they do? Everyone realized that you could not start right off and have a hiatus in which there would be nobody prepared to qualify for a license, for you could not carry on the drug business in the interim if that were so. So they specifically enacted into law that the men now following the profession of pharmacy should continue without a license—that is, without all the new special qualifications for a license—and have a license turned over to them, and from then on certain qualifications should be required to establish eligibility to practice pharmacy.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows what percentage of officers now in the Army graduated at the Staff College prior to July 1, 1917?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not know.

Mr. CONNALLY. Compared with the whole number, is it not a mere handful?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Even at that, it is all you have.

We are trying to establish a foundation upon which shall rest an educational test. Here is the peculiar thing about it—and I can see that my friend is very earnestly contending for a democratic spirit in the Army, and I am with him on that part of it. But let us see if we do not confuse our understanding of what real democracy in a service like the military service may be. We are trying to establish and have already begun in the Army what we hope to be a splendidly articulated system of military education in the service schools, which will begin with the base school in each arm, and through which men may go as they are fitted by their course of study and the qualifications they display, until they have gone up the ladder and have completed this practical service-schools education. In every other function in life we recognize that men are qualified for certain pursuits, not merely by educational advantage, but that temperament, natural ability, and fitness constitute, after all, the determining factors.

Therefore, in organizing an army merely taking into consideration the qualification by learning from textbooks does not determine where a man ought to go. Some men make splendid line officers; some men have the particular faculty and capacity for handling troops and command, for solving tactical problems on the battle field; while other men, who are equally as competent, equally as intelligent, splendidly inspired men, seem not to have that particular temperamental qualification; but, on the other hand, can take hold of staff duties and by their wonderful resources and adaptability for that kind of administrative work make it possible for their good, brave friend on the fighting line to be successful in his battle. Now, we hope by the process of education, through the carefully articulated schools that are to be established in the Army, to take all men at the outset and work them up to a point where we find out where they will differentiate one from another in these functions, and those men who are specifically recommended by their temperamental suitability and fitness for staff duties will be sent off to that branch, and each one who indicates a special fitness and adaptability for training in the line will go to complete his education and perform his service in the sphere where he can serve the best. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the answer to this proposition is contained in this, that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas not only strikes from the bill all of the provisions that have been proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, by which we hope to select good men for this service, but it does not supply any machinery by which any system of selection shall be had except the system of favoritism. The question presented here is, "Do you want good men or do you want favored men?" If you want good men you must establish some kind of a list from which they are to be taken, which list is made up by some kind of competition and elimination; and this bill does that. It eliminates from possible appointment every man who does not demonstrate his ability and fitness for the position; and if you strike out this provision there will be no set qualification that any man must have to become an officer of the General Staff, except he has some friendship with the appointing power that will put him there.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. What is the idea, then, of limiting these officers who may be appointed to the General Staff to those who have passed through the Army War College prior to July 1? Why not allow men who might have graduated from this college since July 1 to be appointed?

Mr. CALDWELL. Well, for the very good reason the Army War College is not performing the function it did before July 1, 1917.

Mr. HULINGS. Nobody can get on the staff except those who graduated from the War College while it did function?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; the gentleman is jumping at a conclusion without knowing the facts. Prior to 1917 the only system we had for training men to qualify for staff duties was in the Army War College, but since that time we have established the Leavenworth school, where a better system of training, we hope, has been instituted for the purpose of making these men qualified for staff duty. Now, there were a good many men—quite a number of them—during the war who occupied positions in which they were able to demonstrate their fitness for this kind of duty over and above that demonstrated by their coworkers, and those men we propose to put on the list and to make a basis of this list they are now on. It is only those who have in the course of their service come up from the bottom and risen above their fellows in fitness for these positions who shall go upon this list, and we should not let any man go on who is not qualified.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, lest there should be any confusion in the mind of anyone on the question of whether the committee had purposely limited this class of officers and their eligibility for these assignments, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas and those who are considering this matter to the paragraph marked "(b)" in which we find this language:

Those officers who, since April 6, 1917, have commanded divisions or higher tactical units, or have demonstrated by actual service in the World War that they are qualified for General Staff duty.

I want to say that this opens the door for these assignments to every officer who performed the right kind of service during the past war.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. In a moment. He did not necessarily perform staff duty during that war, and I take it for granted that this board in considering a man's eligibility for appointment to these duties will take into consideration the service of the officer, in whatever capacity he served. In other words, if they decide to assign some one from the Infantry arm of the service they would naturally take some officer who had been at the front with Infantry troops and had faced actual conditions as they existed at the front. If they wanted some officer to represent the Air Service they would take some man who had actual service at the front with the Air Service. But if they wanted somebody to represent the Artillery arm of the service, naturally they would select some man who had actual charge of Artillery operations at the front.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows of a single reserve officer, a National Guardsman, who is now in the Army, who graduated from the War College prior to July 1, 1917?

Mr. CRAGO. I know of some National Guard officers.

Mr. CONNALLY. There are none.

Mr. CRAGO. They are in the National Guard, as far as that part is concerned. But that is not the point I am trying to make. The provision in section (b) is throwing wide open to the men who have seen service the assignment to the General Staff, and I can not understand how anybody can offer a criticism against it. It follows naturally that the men who have shown their ability in any line or in any arm of the service during the war would be on this eligible list, and that is the only explanation that I care to make at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY) there were—ayes 15, noes 27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 6 of said act be, and the same is thereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 6. Adjutant General's Department: The Adjutant General's Department shall consist of The Adjutant General with the rank of major general, one assistant with the rank of brigadier general, who shall be chief of the Personnel Bureau, and 100 officers in grades from colonel to captain, inclusive. In addition to such other duties as may be assigned by law or prescribed by the Secretary of War, The Adjutant General's Department shall be charged, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, with the operating functions of procurement, assignment, promotion, transfer, retirement, and discharge of all officers and enlisted men of the Army: Provided, That the chief of a branch of the Army shall recommend the assignment of officers to duty in that branch."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 15, line 4, by striking out "thereby" and inserting the word "hereby."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KAHN: Page 15, line 4, strike out the word "thereby" and insert in lieu thereof the word "hereby."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT moves to strike out, on page 15, lines 6 to 11, down to and including the word "inclusive," and insert the following:

"SEC. 6. The Adjutant General's Department: The Adjutant General's Department shall consist of The Adjutant General with the rank of major general, 9 adjutants with the rank of colonel, 17 adjutants general with the rank of lieutenant colonel, 40 adjutants general with the rank of major."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is in line with the suggestions that I have had in mind relative to this bill from the beginning. Under the bill as proposed by the committee there is provided 100 officers in grades from colonel to captain, inclusive, in The Adjutant General's Department. I am opposed to this principle of legislation, because it gives to the War Department the right to make certain bureaus and certain branches of the service top-heavy with higher officers. I believe in following the principles that have heretofore been adopted in all previous military legislation, by which the number in each grade and rank is provided for in the law itself.

Another difference between the provision in the committee bill and this amendment is that my amendment provides for only 66 officers in The Adjutant General's Department. The committee bill provides for 100, and under the national-defense act this department had only 50 officers.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. MADDEN. I assume the gentleman's amendment reducing the number in The Adjutant General's office is based on an army of 185,000 men, which he proposed, as against an army of 280,000 men proposed in the bill?

Mr. DENT. Well, that does not necessarily follow so far as The Adjutant General's Department is concerned, but it may have some influence on the bill. I did not have this particularly in view with reference to The Adjutant General's Department. But it is a fact that under the increase in the Army I see no reason why, when the Army itself is not doubled in size, you should double the officers in The Adjutant General's office. Certainly, the bill reported by the Military Committee of the House does not double the size of the Army. It simply adds 75,000 to the enlisted line strength of the Army and some 30,000, I believe, to the staff of the Army, which is not doubling the size of the Army; but under this bill you are doubling the strength of the officers in The Adjutant General's Department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say furthermore in this connection that I have prepared here amendments to each section of the bill, meeting the views that I have as to the composition of a bill of this kind, but I wanted to present to the committee my views on this particular section in order to get the views of the committee upon that proposition, and I desire to state that if the committee rejects this idea I shall not unnecessarily consume the time of the committee by offering an amendment to each section along this line, in view of the fact that I have gotten my ideas before the committee.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the War Department sent to the committee an estimate for 142 officers in The Adjutant General's office. The Secretary of War, representing the present administration, sent that to our committee. The committee finally agreed upon 100 officers for this department. Those officers are to be divided as follows: There is to be 1 major general, The Adjutant General of the Army; 1 brigadier general, chief of the personnel bureau; 27 officers here in the War Department; 31 officers for the department headquarters throughout the country, and 40 officers for the various division headquarters. And I believe sincerely that that many officers are really needed for The Adjutant General's Department.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if the estimate for 142 officers presented to the committee by the War Department was not based on the War Department bill providing for an Army of 576,000?

Mr. KAHN. No. I will say to the gentleman that while I was not present at all of the meetings of the Committee on Military Affairs, because during the month of December I was in California, the estimate, I am informed, was made upon this particular bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice this section permits the appointment of 100 officers in The Adjutant General's Department, from The Adjutant General down to captains. Now, what is to prevent The Adjutant General from making them all high rank officers?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, in the distribution of the Army as prepared by the War Department under this bill, if it should become the law, the various grades will be distributed in every one of the departments, and, naturally, each department will get its proper proportion of officers of all the various grades.

Mr. HARRISON. Now, that is merely what is represented to the committee as to what The Adjutant General intends to do. But you write in your bill that The Adjutant General shall have 100 officers in grades from colonel to captain, and what is to prevent him from making them all colonels?

Mr. KAHN. Because the distribution of officers throughout the various organizations of the Army would not permit anything of that kind, and so he could not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 8 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 8. Judge Advocate General's Department: The Judge Advocate General's Department shall consist of one Judge Advocate General with the rank of brigadier general, and 100 officers in grades from colonel to captain, inclusive: Provided, That during the tenure of office of the present Judge Advocate General he shall have the rank of major general."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota rose.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], a member of the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEARNS: Page 16, line 7, strike out the entire section and substitute the following:

"SEC. 7. That section 8, except the last three provisos thereof, which relate to the examination for promotion, retirement, and discharge of officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department, which provisos shall remain in full force and effect, be, and the same is hereby, stricken out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

"'SEC. 8. Judge Advocate General's Department: The Judge Advocate General's Department shall consist of 1 Judge Advocate General with the rank of major general, 2 Assistant Judge Advocates General with the rank of brigadier general, 20 judge advocates with the rank of colonel, 40 judge advocates with the rank of lieutenant colonel, 80 judge advocates with the rank of major, and 80 judge advocates with the rank of captain.

"'The Judge Advocate General and the Assistant Judge Advocates General shall be appointed for four-year periods, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department not below the grade of lieutenant colonel: Provided, That any such appointment shall create a vacancy in the grade from which the officer shall be appointed and said vacancy shall be filled as hereinafter prescribed, but the officer so appointed shall retain the same relative position in said department that he would have held if he had not been so appointed and shall return to said relative position upon the expiration of his appointment to said office unless reappointed thereto, and if under the operation of this proviso the number of officers of any particular grade shall at any time exceed the number authorized hereinbefore for that grade, no vacancy occurring in said grade shall be filled until after the total number of officers therein shall have been reduced below the number herein authorized for said grade.

"'Vacancies in the Judge Advocate General's Department, in each grade below that of brigadier general, created or caused by this act, shall be filled, subject to such examination as the President may prescribe, by the promotion according to present seniority of officers now holding permanent commissions in said department and by the appointment by selection of persons learned in the law who served in the United States Army at any time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, and all such promotions and appointments shall date from July 1, 1920, and shall be distributed in each grade, as the interest of the service may require, between those who now hold and those who do not now hold permanent commissions in the Army. Officers appointed by selection under the foregoing provision may be arranged in order of rank among themselves, and with reference to officers promoted as of the same date, without regard to length of prior commissioned service.

"'Except as in this section otherwise provided for, all officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department shall be permanently commissioned therein.

"'After the initial reorganization of the department as herein prescribed, vacancies in grades below that of brigadier general and above that of captain shall be filled by promotion by seniority in the next lower grade of said department, and vacancies in the grade of captain shall be filled, subject to such examination as the President may prescribe, by the appointment of persons learned in the law, selected from officers of the Army, the Judge Advocate General Officers' Reserve Corps, or the National Guard, or civilian members of the bar: Provided, That not less than one-half of the officers in the grade of captain, authorized by this section, shall be obtained by detail from officers of the grades of captain and first lieutenant commissioned in other branches of the Army: And provided further, That the provisions of existing law relating to the examination, promotion, retirement, and discharge of majors of the Judge Advocate General's Department shall apply to captains thereof.

"'The President may assign to duty with the branch of the Army from which he was selected for appointment in the Judge Advocate General's Department any officer holding a commission in that department, and from and after such assignment such officer shall be regarded for all purposes as an officer of the branch of the service to which he has thus been assigned.'

"Nothing contained in section 24 of the act of June 3, 1916, as amended by section 23 of this amending act shall apply to or affect the Judge Advocate General's Department or the officers thereof."

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for 17,832 officers. This amendment would not create any more officers, but it only provides that 223 of the 17,832 officers shall be put in the Judge Advocate General's office.

The law department of the Army is one of the most important in the service, or at least it ought to be so. Under this bill I can not help but think that some one outside of the committee has made a deliberate attempt to destroy the law service of the Army. We are asking in this bill for an enlistment of practically 300,000 enlisted men. It would be impossible for any parent who understood the provisions of this bill to allow his boy to enlist in the service of the Army of the United States, for the reason that he would absolutely surrender every civil right that he possesses. With the provision that is made in this bill for the Judge Advocate General's office there is not one of these boys who would be protected in any way in his liberties.

The law department of the Army, as I said before, is an important branch, and you can not find any responsible officer connected with that department who will say to you that the Judge Advocate General's office can function if this section is not amended. This bill only allows 100 officers to go into that service, and these 100 officers that are provided for the Judge Advocate General's office are to be detailed from the line.

The officer who wrote this provision of the bill proceeded on the theory that a man might be a good Cavalry officer, with all the qualifications of a Cavalry officer, or an infantryman, and he would therefore be qualified to enter the law department of the Army. Under this bill the men who would be detailed from the line, most of them, would never have had the opportunity to look inside of a law book.

This department is a highly specialized and technical branch of the Army, and it can not be made to function properly or at all, unless you provide for it a detail of officers who are supposed, at least, to be learned in the law. Under the provisions of the bill as it now stands, as I said before, the men who are detailed into this service need never have been in a law school or read law one day in their lives. During this recent war there have been brought into the service some of the best lawyers in the United States. Some of these men are willing to stay. Under this bill they can not, because the general provisions of the bill require as qualifications certain age limits, and under these provisions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Under the provisions of this bill, if there is no exception made of this department, it will be impossible to retain these men.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask my colleague if he does not think it would be better, if possible, in detailing men to the Judge Advocate's Department, to have men learned in the law and also well versed in military affairs, and therefore by detailing officers from the Army who have a knowledge of law you would have a better organization than you would get otherwise?

Mr. KEARNS. That would be true if it were possible to get these men who are lawyers from the line. But you can not get them. Under the amendment that I offer one-half of the officers detailed into this service are to be taken from the line, provided they can be gotten, and the other half are to be taken from the men who enlisted in the service during the emergency that has just closed.

As I said before, we have the best legal talent in the United States, some of the best, that has come into the Judge Advocate's office. Under this bill, in order to be a major, a man must be, I think, 36 years of age. In order to be a colonel he must be between the ages of 48 and 50. There is not a man in the Judge Advocate's office to-day that you could appoint as colonel under the provisions of this bill, and therefore there ought to be in this specialized branch of the service an exception made, and if this amendment is adopted there will be, and you will get real lawyers without another dollar's expense to the Government. And I want to say, as I said at the outset, that you are not providing by this amendment more officers. You are taking out of these 17,832 fixed by the bill 223 and putting them into the Judge Advocate General's office in order that the office may function.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Can the gentleman tell us how many officers there are in the Judge Advocate General's office at the present time?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know the exact number, but there are somewhere between 300 and 400.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. What is the explanation of putting these officers out of there who are in there and putting them somewhere else? Where are you going to put them?

Mr. KEARNS. As some Member said a few days ago, the provision of this bill that creates 17,832 officers will create such a large number that they will be falling over each other; they will have nothing to do. I am trying to provide a real job for 223 of them, a place where they are needed.

Remember, gentlemen, they are not only concerned with courts-martial. These men have some of the biggest contracts to pass upon of any department of the Government. The Army consumes each year, and makes contracts each year for, hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of supplies. Some of the biggest lawyers in the United States, representing firms who sell to the Army, are men who are receiving $20,000 or $30,000 a year, and they come to Washington to help prepare those contracts. Under the law as it stands to-day they meet down here a first lieutenant who never saw the inside of a law book who pits his judgment against that of the highest-paid lawyers in the United States, and as a consequence the United States loses hundreds of thousands of dollars every year because it has not a real law department.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I was out at the time the gentleman's amendment was reported. Does it provide for more men in the Judge Advocate General's Department than are provided in the section contained in the bill?

Mr. KEARNS. This bill provides for 100. My amendment provides for 223.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. To be deducted from the other force?

Mr. KEARNS. To be deducted from the other force. It does not create one new position.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. The gentleman spoke about preparing contracts. In addition to that, the Judge Advocate General's office will have to pass upon contracts and differences between contractors and the Government?

Mr. KEARNS. Absolutely so.

Mr. WELTY. Is it not a fact that there are a large number of contracts still undetermined which must be passed upon by this office?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. Will 100 officers be able to take care of this work and clean it up?

Mr. KEARNS. As I said before, every officer in the Judge Advocate General's office will tell you that if the provision in this bill is allowed to stand unamended the Judge Advocate General's office might as well be wiped off the slate, because it can not function.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Suppose this provision stands in the bill unamended, what will happen to the present organization in the Judge Advocate General's office?

Mr. KEARNS. On the 1st of July, 1920, it will have to be reduced to 100 officers, and all of the emergency men will have to leave, every one of them.

Mr. BARKLEY. How many are there now?

Mr. KEARNS. I do not know exactly—three or four hundred.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEARNS. Yes.
Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand the gentleman to say that all of these temporary emergency officers, many of whom have been rendering such excellent service, will have to quit the service if the committee provision is adopted.
Mr. KEARNS. They will have to quit the service or go back. Some few might be retained as captains, but you are not going to get any real lawyer to go in there and stay at a salary of $2,400 a year.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. KEARNS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEARNS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.
Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of this section having been specially written by some officer in a way that put something over the committee.
Mr. KEARNS. I said I suspected so.
Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman suspected that?
Mr. KEARNS. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman, who is a member of this committee, tell the Committee of the Whole in what manner this one officer who privately wrote this section was able to put it over this great Committee on Military Affairs?
Mr. KEARNS. I can not; and I do not want to leave that remark in my speech in that form either.
Mr. BLANTON. That was the idea I got from the gentleman.
Mr. KEARNS. I do not want the gentleman to inject that statement into my speech. I do not want to make a statement of that kind. I said I could not help thinking that the officer who assisted in the preparation of this section certainly did not have much love for the law department of the Army.
Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEARNS. Yes.
Mr. McKENZIE. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Texas I think it is pertinent to say that the majority members of the Committee on Military Affairs did not have anything put over on them.
Mr. KEARNS. Oh, no.
Mr. McKENZIE. But we took the position that it is better preparedness to have officers in the Artillery and Cavalry and Infantry than in the law department.
Mr. BLANTON. I was not asserting that. I was only carrying out the suggestion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].
Mr. KEARNS. And I do not want that statement in my speech, either.
Mr. REED of West Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEARNS. Yes.
Mr. REED of West Virginia. Do I understand my colleague's amendment to waive the age limit when it comes to this branch of the service?
Mr. KEARNS. It does.
Mr. REED of West Virginia. As it is now, a man might be President of the United States, yet he would have to live 13 years longer before he could be a colonel.
Mr. KEARNS. The Constitution of the United States provides that a man who has attained the age of 35 years has judgment and discretion enough that if he can get the votes he may become President of the United States. Yet he has not discretion enough to be a colonel in the law department of this Army until he has reached the age of 48.
Mr. REED of West Virginia. That is very interesting. I hope the gentleman will make that plain.
Mr. KEARNS. That is the proposition that is made. When a man reaches the age of 25 years he is eligible to a seat in this great body, yet he is not competent to be a major in the Army of the United States, because he does not have discretion enough and judgment enough at the age of 25.
Mr. REED of West Virginia. Then the gentleman thinks this waiver of age should extend further?
Mr. KEARNS. My opinion is that a Member of Congress occupies just as important a position in the world's affairs as a major in the Army.
Mr. REED of West Virginia. That is a very good opinion.
Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield again?
Mr. KEARNS. Yes.
Mr. WELTY. A little while ago the question was asked how many officers there were in the Judge Advocate General's office.
Mr. KEARNS. I do not know the number.
Mr. WELTY. Do the hearings show how many there are there?
Mr. KEARNS. I do not think so.
Mr. WELTY. Did you have anyone from the Judge Advocate General's office state to the committee just how many are necessary for the purpose of cleaning up the work that they have there as a result of this war?
Mr. KEARNS. I have the word of responsible officers in the Judge Advocate General's office, who say that they can not possibly function in the future at any time with less than 223 officers in that department.
Mr. WELTY. Did you have a member of the Judge Advocate General's office before the committee for the purpose of giving that testimony?
Mr. KEARNS. Men from that office were before our committee.
Mr. BARKLEY. Did I understand the gentleman to say a while ago that a man could not be a colonel in the Judge Advocate's department until he got to be 48 years old?
Mr. KEARNS. Yes.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.
Mr. KEARNS. I ask for five minutes more.
Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, with the idea of making progress on this section of the bill I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.
Mr. KEARNS. I do not want to take up the time, because there are other Members here who wish to be heard.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be limited to 30 minutes. Is there objection?
Mr. JONES of Texas. Reserving the right to object, who is to control the time?
Mr. KAHN. The Chair, under the five-minute rule. I apprehend that if the gentleman wants time, if he will indicate to the Chair that he wants recognition, the Chair will recognize him.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEARNS. I will.
Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman stated that this age limit applied to all officers of the Judge Advocate General's department. Is it not true that it only applies to the so-called emergency officers and not to the Regular officers?
Mr. KEARNS. It applies to the emergency officers. Now, Mr. Chairman, under this amendment it would give this department 1 major general, 1 brigadier general, 20 colonels, and 40 lieutenant colonels. The reason this arrangement has been made is that the salary of a lieutenant colonel, and along up the line, would keep the real lawyers that are now in the Judge Advocate General's office. In the future the men who are detailed from civil life with the kind of a plan before them in this bill, you would not be able to get some of the best lawyers in civil life to enter the Army because there will be no future for them. Under the bill as drawn to-day there is no provision for getting lawyers from civil life, no provision for good lawyers anywhere in the Judge Advocate General's office.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. KEARNS. Certainly.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much salary do these men get?
Mr. KEARNS. They get the salary of the grade.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much is it?
Mr. KEARNS. I think a captain gets $2,400; a major, $3,000; a lieutenant colonel gets about $3,600; and a colonel, $4,000 or $4,200.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think that you could get the best lawyers in the country to work for those sal[illegible]?
Mr. KEARNS. I know that during the recent emergency there were brought into the service some of the best lawyers in the United States, men who outside made $25,000 and $30,000 or $40,000 a year.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman think he could get those same officers to remain in the Army in a time of peace?
Mr. KEARNS. One of them last evening stated that he was willing to stay.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He is no good. [Laughter.]
Mr. KEARNS. He is one of the best lawyers in the United States. Perhaps he has made enough money now, so that he needs no more.
Now, Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted it would allow one man who is really a lawyer, a law officer, to preside at every important court-martial held in the United States. There are men inside and some outside of the Army who believe that when a boy enlists in the Army and is charged with crime that he ought to have the right of defense. This will provide one law officer for every important court-martial to be held in the future. I can not understand why a man should want to subject the enlisted man who comes from the rank and file of the citizenship of the country to all the indignities heaped upon them often when they get into the service. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of great satisfaction to me personally, and it must be to other Members of the House, to see a member of the Committee on Military Affairs insurge a little bit on some provisions of the bill. I am more than happy to say that I am in perfect accord with him, because I know that his amendment will do things that ought to be done to the Judge Advocate General's Department if we can secure any reform of the Articles of War or the court-martial statute.

This bill as it is drawn is intended to drive out from the Judge Advocate General's Department practically every emergency officer lawyer who came in as an emergency officer during the late war. If they have not driven them out in one way, they have driven them out in another; if not by age limitation, they proceed to do it by cutting down the personnel. We need good lawyers in the Judge Advocate General's Department. There are mighty good men graduated at West Point who help make it, and who are as good lawyers as you ever find in civil life. But it is a good thing to put in among the Regular Army officers a man who has learned his law in the hard school of civil life. If this amendment is adopted, it will give some of these men an opportunity to help improve the service by bringing into it the things that they have learned by hard experience. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can not yield the time, but I shall take the floor at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Illinois will be recognized for eight minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, for the life of me I can not see why they need 100 officers in the Judge Advocate General's office in time of peace. What do they do? What is there to keep them busy? The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] said they were drawing important contracts. We know that nearly all of the contracts that the War Department enters into are entered into on forms, and it does not take a lawyer to fill out a contract form. A law clerk will do it better. Of course they look after and review courts-martial, but there are not very many of those in time of peace.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. The Judge Advocate General's office says that it requires 70 of them if they are going to have one law officer preside at important courts-martial.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, the Judge Advocate General's office does not know any more about it than does the gentleman or I. They do not have 70 or anything like it, and they can not use 70 in time of peace. They want more law officers to conduct the little law work relating to courts-martial in an Army of less than 300,000 men than there are Federal judges in the United States. Perhaps that is an exaggeration, but it is not very much of an exaggeration. They have not got the work to do. The gentleman's amendment proposes not 100, as suggested by the bill, but to increase it to 232, and it is manifest, I think, after hearing the gentleman, that the purpose of that is to keep in the service some of the men who entered the service during the war. Perhaps they ought to be kept—I do not know—but I do not think they ought to be kept merely for the purpose of giving them a job when there is nothing for them to do, nor do I share the view expressed by the gentleman and by his amendment that because a man is a lawyer instead of a fighter he should have a higher rank reviewing courts-martial than he has at the same age leading boys in the line. I know that this is a body of lawyers, and I sometimes think that we would legislate better if there were not so many lawyers in the House and there were more practical men in it; but I do not think that a body of lawyers can afford to say to the country, when reorganizing the Army, that it will give preference in pay and age to the men who do law clerk's work than to men who are called upon to fight if necessary. That is what this amendment proposes. I would guarantee to find law clerks, plenty of them, in the United States at salaries from $1,500 to $2,000 a year, who would be far superior to the average of the officers, as far as law work is concerned, in the Judge Advocate General's office; but we can not afford to say that we will keep on and commission in the Judge Advocate's office a man who went in for temporary service on better terms than we will keep in a man or men who went in to fight. That is what this amendment proposes. I do not believe, first, that that ought to be done, and I do not believe, second, that there ought to be any increase in the number of commissioned officers in the Judge Advocate General's office over that proposed by the bill. I think there will be too many with 100, and they will fall over each other if we make it 232.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a representative of the Judge Advocate General's office, Gen. Kreger, appeared before our committee. I have looked in the record for his testimony, but it appears it was not printed for some reason or other. If it has been, I can not find it.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman will find it on page 1998 of the second volume of the hearings.

Mr. CALDWELL. Referring to a question asked by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the ex-Speaker of this House, than whom there is no man greater loved, or ever has been greater loved by the House, I have to say that the Army appeals to some men as Congress appeals to some others. Some men are carried away with the idea, and perhaps justly so, that no higher honor can come to any man than the privilege of putting on the uniform of an officer of the United States Army. There are some men who have the same idea toward Congress, and I must confess that I have sometimes asked myself why I try to stay here. It seems rather strange that men of the attainments of the ex-Speaker—of the two ex-Speakers of the House, who sit on this floor at $7,500 a year—would stay here when their mental attainments are such that they would earn in any of the great cities of our country perhaps twenty times as much as they are paid here. Why do they stay? It is because of the personal association of the men whom they meet here, because of the honor of the position, and because of the fact that they realize that they are performing a duty to their country which they are well equipped and qualified to perform, and we are glad that they feel that way and that they do give their services to the country at the great sacrifice they are making.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Not just now. Since I have come to Congress I have had occasion to examine many court-martial cases. I have yet to find a court-martial case that a good lawyer could not set aside if tried in any inferior civil court in the country. I believe that in all those cases the cause of the error in the trial is the failure to have upon the courts men skilled in the rules of law, who understand the rules of evidence, in order that they might exclude those things from the trial that ought to be excluded. I believe that this amendment would in a large measure correct that, and I believe that it would do away with the great criticism that started with the criticism of the ex-acting Judge Advocate General, Mr. Ansell. I believe that it would make it impossible for an amendment such as the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] proposes to introduce here in a few minutes to prevail. I believe that if this amendment were enacted into law a proposition such as Mr. JOHNSON proposes to make to this House would not even be considered by the membership.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Upon what theory does the gentleman base that belief?

Mr. CALDWELL. Upon the theory that those things that are now criticized would be eliminated by reason of the fact that the criticism is directed to the mistakes that have been made because of ignorance.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that the present articles of war and the court-martial laws of the United States are perfect?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; they ought to be amended, to a certain extent; but they should never be amended in the manner that the gentleman proposes here. They should be amended after careful study and hearings before a committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That is a matter of dispute; the gentleman does not say they are perfect?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I never did. There are very few laws ever passed by any legislative body in any of the countries of the world that can be considered as perfect, because we are not perfect people. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DONOVAN] suggests there is only one law that is perfect, and that is the law of gravity. Now, I believe that this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is a step in the right direction.

I am sorry the committee has not incorporated this provision in the bill, and, personally, I propose to vote for it, and I hope that the committee will see the wisdom of this provision and that the lawyers of this House will do for the lawyers in the Army what the doctors of this country and the preachers of this country and the nurses of this country are trying to do for the people of their service in the Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee has very liberally provided for the Judge Advocate General's Department. We have reached the stage in the bill now where we have to do with the special corps or bureaus in the Army. Every one of these corps and bureaus almost is at work in Congress conducting propaganda toward the further expansion of those bureaus, not for the purpose of necessity but largely for the promotions within those bureaus and the bringing of higher rank to the officers who are in them. That is at the bottom of these personal letters that Members of Congress are getting at this time, to seek further to enlarge and increase those bureaus over the increase which the committee has made after careful consideration and which we think are large enough for their efficient conduct.

Now, before the war there were 32 officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department, sufficient and ample to conduct the business for an Army of 120,000 men. We now propose 100 officers, and we realize that there is considerable unfinished business, perhaps, that needs looking after. We believe that number of officers can take care of it. They have done a great amount of work there. They have just finished going over thousands of courts-martial cases, where men were under confinement in United States penitentiaries serving penal sentences, where the cases were carefully examined with a view of recommendation for clemency. I am informed that most of those cases have been completed now and very little of that work remains. In connection with the number of officers necessary for this corps it is interesting to note the testimony of Gen. Kreger, who came before our committee a few months ago. Gen. Kreger at that time was asked what would be a sufficient number of officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department for the Army of 576,000 men which was being asked for by the department and the Secretary of War and as was provided in the bill we had under consideration then. Gen. Kreger said, in answer to the question of Mr. KEARNS, of Ohio:

> At an earlier stage of this hearing, in answer to a question, I said that for an Army of 576,000 officers and men, as contemplated by the bill under consideration, 72 officers would be required in the Judge Advocate General's office.

We are providing 100 here now for an Army of 299,000 when Gen. Kreger, the head of this corps, only a few months ago said 72 would be sufficient for an Army of 576,000 men.

Mr. MILLER. And if the gentleman will permit, Gen. Kreger also came from civil life into the Army, was a lawyer at the bar his entire life until he came into the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. KEARNS. If the gentleman will yield, Gen. Kreger when he made that statement had not taken into consideration the law officers for the courts-martial.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct. Then he modified his statement and said that if they provided a law officer for every court-martial at every place where a court-martial was held in the Army they would want 202 officers, and the gentleman is asking for 228.

Mr. KEARNS. Does not the gentleman think there ought to be a law officer in each one of those cases——

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not. I do not think most of the courts-martial are of sufficient importance.

Mr. KEARNS. I am talking about the real important ones.

Mr. ANTHONY. At the important ones I think probably it would be wise.

Mr. MILLER. If the gentleman will permit another suggestion, is not Col. Winship, the second in the Judge Advocate General's office, likewise a lawyer who came from civil life?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think a large majority of our legal officers are likewise men who were either lawyers out in civil life before they went into the line of the Army and were detailed to The Adjutant General's office or were men who, as they say, have burned the midnight oil and have studied law and were admitted to the bar and were detailed to the Judge Advocate General's office.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman heard the statement of the gentleman from Illinois when he said that any law clerk could do the work better than these lawyers. Does the gentleman subscribe to that suggestion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not. I think the Judge Advocate's corps has a number of highly competent lawyers in it. I think it is also true there are times when that corps has been open to the old joke that used to be told about it, that the Judge Advocate's corps, when asked for a legal opinion, used to render in response to the request made by a higher authority that they were a good deal like the old fiddle which, when scratched on the back, would play almost any kind of a tune.

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not believe it always did that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, we can not afford to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS]. I want you to read some of the things they say about the corps. I can not indorse what the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said against lawyers. I have very high regard for lawyers, and the splendid work they have done in all the different enterprises in this country, and I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois that it was a lawyer who laid the foundation stones of this country, sir. The Declaration of Independence breathed the spirit of legal trained authority. The Constitution of the United States, which this flag honors, came through the handiwork of lawyers. This Republic throughout all its different stages and epochs has had trained legal authorities to protect it, and the great enterprises of this country have trained legal men to protect their business. Yea, and more than that, Mr. Chairman, under our American system of jurisprudence, the lawyer has always been the poor man's friend and protector. The lawyer has always guarded the property rights and the liberties of the poor when the rich and powerful endeavored to oppress. The lawyer protects the poor and helpless in all State courts. And the gentleman, in casting aspersions upon the legal profession, seems to think that a clerk knows more than an able, trained lawyer. But, aside from that, we do not need in the Judge Advocate General's office another corps of lawyers. You do not need more courthouses full of lawyers in the War Department. Some say we need one for every court-martial trial. This very bill provides that these Army officers can go and be educated in the law at Government expense. The bill you have under consideration trains men to do the very thing you talk about, the filling up of this department here with lawyers. For God's sake, let us get a lot of these clerks out of these departments and some of the lawyers out of the Judge Advocate General's department and let them go back home, as the people need them there.

You need not be uneasy. These Army officers know what they are doing. Gentlemen educated at West Point, that splendid institution that this country provides in which to educate our officers, certainly can run the Judge Advocate's Department. Certainly they do need a few lawyers down there, but they can get along with very few. I ask the gentleman in good faith why he wants to add more than a hundred more there?

Mr. KEARNS. Because we need them in the administration of the law department there.

Mr. QUIN. Do you not know that the Judge Advocate will pay no attention to any opinion any lawyer may render? Gen. Ansell had an experience of that kind. Whatever the opinion of Gen. Ansell might have been toward this policy of courts-martial, where men were sent to the penitentiary for a lifetime for trivial offenses, do you think it had anything to do with the Army officers? When it got to the notice of the Judge Advocate General and of the Secretary of War, they said, "No; you can not." If you have a few lawyers down there who understand all the rules and practice, in my judgment the department will run smoothly and efficiently. You can not get rid of barbarous court-martial sentences by giving jobs to 138 lawyers more, as provided in Mr. KEARN's amendment. You have got to have the Articles of War changed, which articles stand to-day as a work of archaism and barbarism instead of a high degree of the Christian civilization we now have in this country, and you can not get the articles changed if the War Department has its way about it. You will have to do it through these lawyers in Congress, who breathe the spirit of patriotic freedom and justice from the people they represent. That is the only way you are going to get the articles changed and get the courts-martial trials down on a humane basis, as they ought to be. Who is going to do it? It must be Members of Congress; and I do not care what their profession is, whether it is that of a lawyer, a farmer, a conductor, an engineer, or what not; the men who represent the masses of the people certainly breathe the proper spirit to modernize and civilize and Christianize the Articles of War of the United States Army, whereby men who enlist in the Army, whether they are grabbed by the necks and put in there under the conscript act or whether they volunteer, can have a fair trial according to the rules of justice set out in the procedure of civil courts of this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. There are three additional minutes which the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] did not consume.

Mr. KEARNS. If no one else wants it, I ask to be recognized.

Mr. KAHN. I would like two minutes.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman asked for a vote, and I did not think he desired to take any more time.

Mr. KAHN. I thought the time was exhausted.

Mr. Chairman, there is no Member of the House who appreciates more thoroughly the work that is being done by the Judge Advocate General's department than I do. I would not attempt to hamper that work in any way. I know that the officers provided for in this section of the pending bill are required for the proper handling of the work of that department. Every court-martial case has to be reviewed by that department before it goes to the President for his approval. Of course, during the war there was an enormous amount of work in that line alone, and the number of officers in the Judge Advocate General's department was very largely increased. As we are returning to a peace-time basis, the number of officers has been materially decreased, but this bill provides for certain organizations in the Army. You have your departments; you have divisions; you have your brigades; you have your regimental organizations. There must be a judge advocate with all those organizations. I hope that the provision of the bill will stand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KEARNS) the committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota: Page 16, line 11, after the word "inclusive," insert:

"That this amendment shall be known as the military justice act, and the articles included in this section shall be known as the Army articles, and shall at all time and in all places govern the Army of the United States."

Mr. QUIN (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I wish the gentleman would reserve the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. I would suggest to the gentleman from South Dakota that this is a very long amendment and will take some time to read. I think that most of the Members of the House are familiar with the subject matter of it. I believe that it is clearly subject to a point of order. I think we can save the time of the House by——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has read the amendment of the gentleman all the way through, and would perhaps be able to consider the point of order against it without having the amendment read, if that is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I think the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is right in thinking that it is going to be settled on a point of order very quickly, and gentlemen of the House are familiar with the amendment, and it would simply take the time of the House to read it. Therefore I wish that he would reserve the point of order instead of making it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota be granted 15 minutes to speak out of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman from California will permit, if he has not read this amendment, how does he know it is subject to a point of order?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from California has read it, and almost every Member of the House has had his attention called to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with. Is that the gentleman's request?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. I will reserve the point of order in order to allow the gentleman from South Dakota to explain the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks meanwhile that, instead of reading the amendment, the gentleman from South Dakota have 15 minutes out of order to explain his amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not object to the dispensing of the reading of the amendment at this time, but the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] in his letter addressed to the Members of the House gave notice of his purpose to appeal from the decision of the Chair. I take it that he is still of the same mind?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, if that should occur, and the Chair should be overruled in the event the Chair sustains the point of order, then the amendment ought to be read if it is to be considered by the House. That is all I have to say on the subject at the present time.

Mr. KAHN. That would naturally follow.

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, if the amendment is not read at this point, will it be printed in the RECORD as having been offered at the point where it occurs? The point is, if the amendment is not read, how can it go into the RECORD?

Mr. GARRETT. It could not go in except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. It could be inserted by unanimous consent.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman can insert it in the RECORD as a part of his remarks under the agreement reached by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the matter can be straightened out by the unanimous-consent request that I now make, that the amendment be considered as read.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would say that the reading of the amendment will not be dispensed with in any way if it is to be voted on in any way. I am not willing for the House to vote on the very important proposition without having it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. GARRETT. That is exactly the suggestion that I made. In view of the fact that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] has notified the House that it is his purpose to appeal from the decision of the Chair, it is perfectly evident that at some time this amendment is going to be read. I am not objecting to the request that the reading of it be dispensed with now.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We have a unanimous-consent request now pending, that the gentleman from South Dakota have 15 minutes out of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request which I think will meet the situation, and that is that the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota be dispensed with until the point of order is passed on.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The other request is sufficient without that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There might be objection to that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there has been a suggestion by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union can not change the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the request was that the gentleman should be permitted to speak on the subject matter of his amendment, which he claims to be germane to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have no earthly objection to his getting 15 minutes to make a speech.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me the orderly way to dispose of this matter is to dispose of the matter now pending before the Chair for decision. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] has offered an amendment. I submit a unanimous-consent request for the present, that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with, in order that that point of order might be raised and determined upon which notice has been given of an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. However, during the reading of the amendment the gentleman asked unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota might proceed out of order. That does not dispose of the question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object to that for the present, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, it is obvious that it is going to take a great deal of the time of the House in the reading of that amendment. If there is going to be a point of order made on it, it might as well be made now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I was not insisting that the amendment should be read. My purpose was in fact to obviate the reading of the amendment. I was simply taking the position that that question of whether the point of order was to be passed upon should be considered first. If that ruling is going to involve the taking up of time to read the amendment I will withdraw my objection to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It will have to be read some time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask unanimous consent that if the point of order be overruled, the vote upon this amendment be deferred until to-morrow, and that the amendment be printed in the RECORD, and the reading of it dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that if the point of order be overruled, the vote upon this amendment be deferred until to-morrow——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I believe this amendment covers 66 pages. Suppose I should move to amend by offering a copy of Josephus?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, of course, as soon as this amendment is read part way, showing that it is out of order, some one can make the point of order on it, and have it ruled out of order without fully reading it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that the unanimous-consent request be put. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] please restate it?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The unanimous-consent request is as follows: That if the point of order raised against the amendment be overruled, then the vote on this amendment be deferred until to-morrow; that the amendment now offered be printed in the RECORD, and the reading of it be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York bases one condition upon another, and even the first condition has not happened yet. Nobody has made a point of order, and nobody has yet formally moved to overrule a point of order that has not been made, and yet he bases a unanimous-consent agreement upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman from California reserved a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the amendment, unless some parliamentary objection is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

I. PRELIMINARY PROVISIONS.

ARTICLE 1. Definitions: The following words when used in these articles shall be construed in the sense indicated in this article, unless the context shows that a different sense is intended, namely: (a) The word "officer" shall be construed to refer to a commissioned officer; (b) The word "soldier" shall be construed as including a noncommissioned officer, a private, or any other enlisted man—

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be postponed until the point of order is settled.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be postponed until the final decision is made of any point of order that is to be made against the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, how do the Members of this House know whether this is in order or out of order? Some may have read it and have an opinion with reference to whether it is in order or out of order, while the great mass of Members here, I dare say, know nothing about it; and even if the Chair had an opinion with reference to its being out of order or in order, his opinion might vary from the opinion of the majority of the House. I think the House is entitled to hear it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For the purpose of making an inquiry about the suggestion the gentleman from South Dakota made. The Chair intimated that he had read this amendment. He did not intimate that he had made up his opinion about it, but that he is familiar with it.

Suppose the Chair passes on it without it being read, how will the rest of us know how to vote on the question of overruling the decision of the Chair, unless it is read in some way? Members do not want to vote to overrule the decision of the Chair without thinking that it ought to be overruled.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to take up the time of the House. I want to get a vote, not to talk or to spend time in reading my amendment. But I realize the cogency of the statement of the gentleman from Missouri, and I withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his request, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(c) The word "company" shall be understood as including a troop or battery; and

(d) The word "battalion" shall be understood as including a squadron.

ART. 2. Persons subject to military law: The following persons are subject to these articles, and shall be understood as included in the term "any person subject to military law," or "persons subject to military law," whenever used in these articles: Provided, That nothing contained in this act, except as specifically provided in this article, shall be construed to apply to any person under the United States naval jurisdiction, unless otherwise specifically provided by law:

(a) All members of the military forces of the United States, including all officers and soldiers belonging to the Regular Army, all cadets of the United States Military Academy, all members of the Army Nurse Corps, and all contract surgeons, all volunteers from the dates of their muster or acceptance into the military service of the United States, and all other persons lawfully called, drafted, or ordered into, or to duty or for training in, the said service, from the dates they are required by the terms of the call, draft, or order to obey the same; and all officers of the Marine Corps when detached for service with the armies of the United States by order of the President: Provided, That an officer or soldier of the Marine Corps when so detached may be tried by military court-martial for an offense committed against the laws for the government of the naval service prior to his detachment, and for an offense committed against these articles he may be tried by a naval court-martial after such detachment ceases; and all other persons who now are or may hereafter be made members of the Military Establishment by law;

(b) All retainers to the camp and all persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and in time of war all such retainers and persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States in the field, both within and without the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, though not otherwise subject to these articles;

(c) All persons under sentence adjudged by courts-martial.

II. COURTS-MARTIAL.

ART. 3. Courts-martial classified: Courts-martial shall be of three kinds, hereinafter designated and hereafter to be known as—

General courts;
Special courts; and
Summary courts.

A. COMPOSITION.

ART. 4. Who may serve on court-martial: All officers and soldiers in the military service of the United States and officers and soldiers of the Marine Corps when detached for service with the Army by order of the President shall be competent to serve on general and special courts, and all such officers shall be competent to serve as summary courts, for the trial of any persons who may lawfully be brought before such courts for trial, except as may be hereinafter otherwise provided.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Clerk has proceeded far enough in the reading of the amendment to show that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota is out of order. Therefore, I make the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I will ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order.

Mr. KAHN. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has reserved the point of order, but, of course, there can be no discussion of anything except the point of order under the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the point of order does not bring a discussion on the point of order at all. But the gentleman can not reserve the point of order in the middle of the reading of the amendment and stop the reading of the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I ask to reserve it in order that the gentleman from South Dakota may have an opportunity to be heard on his amendment. I ask that the gentleman from South Dakota may proceed for 15 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota may proceed for five minutes out of order.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman from California stop the reading of the amendment to make a point of order?

Mr. KAHN. I made the point of order, but I asked unanimous consent at the same time that the gentleman from South Dakota might proceed out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the point of order against the amendment, and asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota may proceed out of order for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DENT. Reserving the right to object, will the amendment be read if unanimous consent is given?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If the point of order is sustained, it will not be read.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is sustained, then the amendment will not be read. Otherwise the Chair understands it will be read.

Mr. SANFORD. Read for amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the parliamentary situation will be this: The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] will have an opportunity to talk for five minutes on his proposition. Then, if the Chair sustains the point of order, we will be called upon to vote whether the Chair shall be overruled or not, without any discussion in opposition to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order would then be open for discussion.

Mr. CALDWELL. I know the point of order might be open for discussion, but I have a notion that the gentleman from South Dakota is not going to talk to the point of order, but is going to talk to the merits of his amendment; but if it is going to be before the Committee of the Whole on the motion to overrule the decision of the Chair, somebody ought at least to have an opportunity to defend the position of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want it made clear, if possible, whether if unanimous consent be now given the reading of this amendment will be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not state to the gentleman whether it will or will not be.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects. The gentleman from California makes the point of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. The amendment is clearly not germane to the provisions of this bill. This is an Army reorganization bill. The amendment establishes a complete rule for the trial of soldiers who are charged with military offenses. The gentleman's amendment has been introduced as a bill, and the title of it is "A bill to establish military justice." I submit that it is not germane to any pending provision of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have no desire to take up any of the time of the House on this amendment, because I know that every man here is familiar with it and with its purposes. The only reason I have for making these few remarks is to call attention to the fact that this matter has been submitted to the chairman of this committee for more than a year. When we determined to see that some vote was had upon this amendment while this military reorganization bill was pending, I took this amendment to the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. I know he has gone over it thoroughly. I know he has called in the House parliamentarian, and they have investigated the parliamentary situation. They have gone into the question as to whether or not the amendment is germane. Whether I agree with the distinguished Chairman of the Committee of the Whole or not makes little difference. I know he is going to hold that the amendment is not in order, and it would be a waste of the time of the committee and a waste of my time to discuss the point of order when I know that it will be sustained. When it is sustained I can only say that it will be the culmination of a fight that some of us have been trying to make for the last year and a half just to get a court-martial bill considered by some committee of this House. If we could have received even a moment's consideration of it from the Military Affairs Committee or from any other committee during the last year and a half we perhaps would have been satisfied, but that has been an impossibility.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. In a moment I will yield. This bill has been introduced in several different forms in the House and Senate, by Senator CHAMBERLAIN and myself. Last May I went before the Military Committee of this House when it was in session and asked that hearings be held upon this bill providing for a revision of the Articles of War and the military justice laws. At that time the statement was made by the chairman of the committee that there would be hearings and that a subcommittee would be appointed. At least I so took it. The members of the committee are here, and if I am wrong they can correct me. While I thought we would secure some hearing we did not get it. I anticipate that gentlemen on the committee, and perhaps the chairman of the committee, will now say that we will secure hearings, but I submit we have been trying to get them for a year and a half, and I had much rather get a vote at this time than to get some hearings in the next two or three years, at some time when I may be out of Congress.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman says he appeared before the committee last May. Certainly that is not a year and a half ago. And does not the gentleman recall the fact that during the months of May and June the committee were busy day and night on the Army appropriation bill which came to the committee as a holdover from the last Congress? Does not the gentleman know that ever since then the committee have been working steadily on the Army reorganization bill and that they have had hearings practically every day? There has been scarcely a day that the Committee on Military Affairs has not been in session. As soon as we get these matters out of the way I certainly shall take up important matters of the kind that the gentleman refers to; but the committee have been as hard at work as any committee in this House right along. That is why we have not had hearings on the gentleman's bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I can only say, not being on the Military Committee, that it is impossible for me to tell what the committee has been doing. I do know this, that when the bill was originally introduced, the discussion started about December 18, and we have been unable in this House to secure a vote on it or any feature of it.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows that in December, 1918, the present Committee on Military Affairs was not in existence.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The bill that forms the basis for this amendment was introduced in May, 1919, was it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. It has been introduced in some form or other by Senator CHAMBERLAIN and myself—I could not be certain of the date—but I think this bill was introduced in May and its predecessor in January.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Let me ask the gentleman this: Has he attempted to exhaust the parliamentary remedies for getting this bill out of committee, when he feels that the committee has not taken time to consider it? The rules of the House provide a method.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am not certain, but I am going to try and exhaust them to-day.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. The chairman of the committee suggested that the committee had been very busy. What I want to know is whether they had anything more important before them than to secure a fair trial for the soldiers in the American Army? [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman this question, bearing in mind what may happen hereafter. The gentleman intimated a while ago that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union would hold that this amendment was not in order, and I understand if he does so rule the gentleman from South Dakota will appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am in sympathy with a great deal that is in the gentleman's amendment, but I desire to vote on the question of overruling the Chair according to the rules of the House. Would the gentleman be willing to state, if the Chair does so rule, he thinks it is in accordance with the rules of the House?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman repeat the question?

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Chair rules that the amendment is not in order, the gentleman thinks the ruling is correct under the rules of the House? I am asking the question in good faith; while I sympathize with the gentleman's purpose I do not want to vote to overrule the decision of the Chair if it is in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I must answer the gentleman's question fairly whether or not it is in good faith. I think the weight of authority in the ruling is on the side of the Chairman, but I think the House still has the right to reverse the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if we vote to overrule the decision of the Chair it would be a precedent for future chairmen.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. That is a true statement, and the gentleman will have to cast his vote under those conditions.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us whether any consideration whatever has been given to the amendment he now submits, in any committee of the Senate; and if so, what consideration, and also what action has been taken by the Senate committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not think it is necessary to waste the time of the House answering the question, because the gentleman knows that the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, of which I think the gentleman from Wyoming [Senator WARREN] is chairman, has been considering this particular bill along with others. What action they have taken I do not know. But the mere fact that the Senate has given some consideration to the matter ought not to preclude us. Sometimes I think the House ought to legislate a little bit instead of letting the Senate do it all.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand the bill was introduced in the Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN. He was chairman of the Military Committee and dissented from the policy of the administration of military affairs in so far as courts-martial were concerned. I understand that Senator CHAMBERLAIN, Senator WARREN, and Senator LENROOT have been acting as subcommittee for several months; that they have had hearings, and that the hearings closed either in November or December of last year, and since that time those three Senators have not been able to conclude a report to the Senate, yet the gentleman wants the House to act on his proposition without having had it read.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not ask that the amendment should not be read. The omission to read it has been by no request of mine. I can not speak for the Senator from Oregon or the subcommittee. I might suggest that his association with the Military Affairs Committee might be like the association that many of us have had with this committee, and he might have had the steam roller run over him during the last year and a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows, I presume, how the Articles of War as they now exist were passed by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I might say that, as was so exactly stated to the gentleman from Illinois, such a revision was attached to an appropriation bill by the Senator from Oregon, but it was a great improvement over the old articles.

Mr. KAHN. It was not considered at all by the House or by any committee of the House. They are the articles that the Senator from Oregon offered to an appropriation bill and had no consideration by the House or any committee of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. These articles which were attached to that appropriation bill were, as I say, a great improvement over the former articles.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Has there been any subcommittee appointed by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House to consider this proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Not as far as I know; and I doubt if there ever will be.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Is it possible that the committee is so busy that it has not had time to appoint a subcommittee to even consider the proposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Not being on the committee, I can only state the fact that none has been appointed.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Yes.

Mr. POU. If it is not germane to a bill reorganizing the Army to provide these rules of trial by courts-martial, then just what would be germane?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have already stated that I have not wanted to argue that, because I know that the ruling will be against me. If anything ought to be germane, it ought to be legislation of this kind. We can manufacture generals by the thousand, but we can not do the one thing that would give some justice to the enlisted man. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. I would like to suggest to my friend that if the subject matter of a court-martial bill is not germane to the bill now under consideration, I myself must be very obtuse, for I can not think just what should be more germane than something of that kind.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota why he forecasts the result of the ruling of the Chair?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. By talking with the Chair before I took the floor.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Of course, I was not advised of this conversation between the gentleman and the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would state that the Chair informed me that in his opinion the amendment was not germane.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Why not submit it to the ruling of the Chair right now and bring the matter to an issue?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] offers as an amendment a bill introduced by him "to establish military justice," embracing the Articles of War and a complete military code. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] makes a point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the bill under consideration. The gentleman from South Dakota was kind enough to submit this matter to the present occupant of the chair several days ago; in fact, before he had been designated to preside over this committee. At that time I had not considered the matter at all, and so told the gentleman from South Dakota. I further told him that if I should be called upon to preside over this committee that of course I should consider the matter purely and solely from a parliamentary standpoint in construing the rules of the House. When I was notified that I was to preside over this committee I conferred with the parliamentary clerk, and since that time both he and I have spent some time in going over the decisions and precedents of the House. When queried a short time ago by the gentleman from South Dakota in respect to what progress had been made, I frankly told him that thus far I had been unable to find any decisions in the precedents that in my judgment would justify holding his amendment to change the Articles of War and to establish military justice as germane to a bill to amend the national-defense act.

The Chair is in the same situation now. He has not heard anything during the discussion of the point of order to-day that would further enlighten the mind of the Chair in that regard. The present occupant of the chair did not tell the gentleman from South Dakota that he would rule one way or another but simply informed the gentleman as to the result of the light that had been thrown upon the subject up to that point and what his opinion was at that time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion to the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, this bill as reported by the committee I do not think is entirely simply an amendment to the national-defense act. It contains provisions that were not in the national-defense act at all, and in the closing pages of the bill, beginning on page 62, there are a lot of miscellaneous provisions incorporated in the bill. That also appears all the way through the bill, so that it strikes me the bill is a bill providing for Army reorganization. If an appeal is to be taken from the decision of the Chair, I want to vote intelligently on the proposition without making a mistake, but it does seem to me it is germane under the general provisions contained in this bill. The bill is not confined solely to amendments to the national-defense act, but it has separate and independent provisions.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What portion of the bill is not an amendment to the national-defense act?

Mr. DENT. I called attention a moment ago to the provision beginning on page 62, miscellaneous provisions.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is to insert a new section in the national-defense act. It so states:

> That said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after section 127 a new section, to be numbered 127a, and to read as follows:

The gentleman has not read his bill.

Mr. DENT. Oh, this is not my bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It comes from the gentleman's committee, and I know that he has read a good deal of it very carefully.

Mr. DENT. I certainly have. Mr. Chairman, I suggest further that this is a reorganization bill, and it does contain a lot of new provisions so far as the national-defense act is concerned. Personally, I want to say that I do not think it is advisable to take up the subject of court-martial procedure in all of its details in a bill of this kind, when it has never been considered by a committee, but the question that is worrying me is whether or not it is germane to the sections of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, has the Chair ruled?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled, but is ready to rule. However, as he stated in the beginning, he is ready to receive any light on the subject which may be submitted to him.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of some of us who are not expert parliamentarians I would like to hear the Chairman's opinion as to whether this is not germane to this kind of a reorganization bill. I have not got that clear in my mind, and many Members are in doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill, as the Chair stated, is a bill to amend the national-defense act, and does amend it in many of its sections. At no point in the bill is there any provision for amending the Articles of War or for establishing military justice. In the printing of the military law in the statutes the Articles of War are carried in a separate and distinct chapter, entirely apart from the organization of the Army. In this bill there is no mention of any matter contained in that chapter or of the Articles of War except a single reference to the one hundred and nineteenth article of war, but without proposing a modification of that article in any respect.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair permit me to make a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. The Revised Statutes have a provision in them that the chaptering and the arranging of these laws shall not be taken into consideration in interpreting the law.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct, and it would not be binding at all, but would simply indicate that these matters were not considered to be so closely related as to be printed together in a single chapter in the making up of the statutes. This is all the bearing that such a fact would have.

After a somewhat careful examination of many of the decisions cited in the books of precedents the Chair has been unable to find a single one going so far as to warrant a ruling making this amendment in order. If an amendment, 66 pages in length, embracing the Articles of War and a complete code of military justice, offered to a bill to amend the national defense act is not introducing a different subject under cover of an amendment, and therefore in contravention of the rule, the Chair is not able to conceive of a case that would introduce a different subject.

This is the opinion of the Chair deliberately formed after a somewhat thorough examination of the precedents so far as he could find any bearing upon this subject. Having been kindly notified by the gentleman from South Dakota that in case of an adverse ruling he would take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and having examined the precedents and considered the question with that fact in mind, nevertheless the Chair is of the opinion that in order to uphold the rules and precedents of the House it is his duty to hold that this amendment is out of order. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, as much as I regret to appeal from the decision of the present occupant of the chair, because I know he has given this matter careful consideration, I must appeal from the decision of the Chair as affording this House the last and only opportunity that it perhaps will have to vote on this amendment and on this class of legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not catch how the question was put.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, to relieve the Chair from embarrassment, I ask for tellers.

The question was taken, and tellers were ordered.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no confusion in the vote, will the Chair announce how the vote shall be taken?

The CHAIRMAN. Those in favor of sustaining the decision of the Chair will vote "aye," and those in favor of overruling the decision of the Chair will vote "no." The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] will take their places as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, noes 66.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, to add a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANFORD: Page 16, after line 13, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 8a. Construction service. The construction service shall consist of one chief of construction with the rank of brigadier general, 250 officers of the grades from colonel to captain, inclusive, and 8,000 enlisted men. The chief of construction, under the authority of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures—other than fortifications—and utilities, and the preparation of plans therefor, in accordance with the requirements of the several arms, corps, bureaus, and services of the Army of the United States, and with the operation of utilities in connection therewith and with acquirement of real estate and issuance of licenses in connection with the military reservations under the jurisdiction of the War Department."

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] in a general way under general debate opposed the suggestion that is contained in this amendment and stated to the committee that a separate construction corps would cause an additional expense. If the gentleman from Kansas hereafter attempts to show by any facts how this amendment will cause any extra expense, I will meet his suggestion, but at this time it is only necessary to say that the officers and enlisted men provided for in this amendment are to be taken out, if the amendment is adopted, from the following sections of the bill; that is, the proposal of the amendment is to take from the Quartermaster's Corps, as provided for in this bill, 8,000 men and 250 officers and put them under the construction corps. It is first necessary for me to say to you that the bill as it is written provides that the Quartermaster's Corps shall have charge of its own construction and of construction for the other bureaus of the Government so far as the personnel goes. Impliedly, however, it provides that we shall go back entirely to prewar conditions, and it impliedly provides for six separate construction corps.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will gladly yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows anything about the amount of money that is to be expended in construction in any given year?

Mr. SANFORD. I will speak of that in just a moment. I wish to refer to it. I want to make clear to you now that the bill as it is written provides in the War Department six new construction corps. That is, all these departments—chemical warfare, aircraft, and so forth—must each take care of its own construction except for its personnel. Coming now to the question of the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will yield.

Mr. SNYDER. Right at that point I would like to ask if each of the six construction divisions will have the right to make their own purchases and bid against each other in the market?

Mr. SANFORD. I do not see how you can avoid competition, just as we had at the opening of the war, if you preserve six separate organizations engaged in the same kind of work. I think it is necessary.

Mr. SNYDER. I asked that question to get just the information the gentleman has given me. I am absolutely opposed to any such proposition, and I think these purchasing departments should be brought under one section.

Mr. SANFORD. We know when the war came on all these separate departments were bidding one against the other.

We come to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. I want to say to you that in the 10-year period before this war there was spent by the Quartermaster Corps for construction in one year an amount as high as $19,000,000, and the lowest amount spent in any one year was $8,000,000. Now, of course, without going very much into the question of the present real estate of the Government, we know we have vastly more real estate now than we had then. It is fair to say, and I think Mr. Crowell estimated it, that from now on for a few years, at least, it will be necessary to spend, whatever department has charge of construction, between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000 for construction and maintenance. Therefore you have before you the concrete suggestion, namely, do you want to provide for the expenditure of a sum of money as high as $40,000,000 or $50,000,000, and scatter that in four or five or six different bureaus? The construction corps during the war had charge of the construction of an amount that reached figures of a billion dollars. The work they did during the war was the biggest construction program that was ever put through by this or any other country. They built those cantonments, and they built them on time. They built the port terminals, and they built them I would have you know on the cost-plus fee basis. I want to relieve the construction corps from any criticism that may be in the mind of some of you, by telling you they did not operate on the cost-plus basis as it is generally understood. They operated on the cost-plus fee basis. That is, each contractor was told of the amount of money he could earn by doing the job, and he could not gain anything by increasing the price. His fee was limited.

Now, the work of the construction corps was necessarily done in the war by civilians. When the war came on there were no

Army engineers that could be spared. The quartermaster could not handle the job, in the very nature of things, and the call was sent out for civilians to come and enlist in the construction corps. Now, from that work in the war and from the cooperation of the civilians with the War Department, that corps built up an esprit de corps of its own. Men who did that work are very proud of it, and they are willing and anxious to organize in reserves all over the country, to come back, if the emergency should arise again, and render a similar service.

But what you have before you now is a peace program. The question is, What kind of establishment do you want to organize in time of peace to do the construction work of the Government? I contend that we ought to maintain an organization in time of peace that can be expanded in time of war to perform the duties that belong to it. [Applause.] It is absurd to spend millions and millions of dollars every year on a military peace program that must be discarded when war is declared, as our former military policy in some of these respects that I am pointing out had to be discarded when this war was declared.

Mr. McKEOWN. Under the gentleman's amendment you would keep this corps as a separate entity, so that it would function without being distributed——

Mr. SANFORD. Without having these same functions performed in several different departments.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will it increase the cost?

Mr. SANFORD. It will not increase the cost one dollar.

Mr. GALLAGHER. It ought to reduce it.

Mr. SANFORD. It ought to reduce it; and the way it will do it will be this: That instead of having Army officers trained at West Point letting the contracts and supervising construction, you will have men trained in civil life who will come into the Army to do that duty. Men who are acquainted with the business of construction—architects or builders themselves—can save, they tell me, from 5 to 10 per cent, at least, over the amount that we have customarily expended in that work, because they know their business. Now, what is the sense of running that great institution at West Point and teaching our soldiers up there about military matters and then bringing them down here and putting them in the War Department in order to make builders out of them?

The plan is to preserve in this country the business organization that it now has. I would not for a moment have you think it is not the plan to relate this work under these civilians, whom we hope to keep and will keep in this corps, with the work of the department. Of course, the scheme in this bill that has been referred to so favorably puts all the supply of the Army under the Assistant Secretary of War, who will be a civilian.

What sense is there in having a specialty like this developed by men who know their business if you do not let them function through the civilian head of the War Department without going through the red tape of an Army official who himself is busy with another specialty? In other words, how could this construction corps operate effectively under your new organization, which the whole committee stands for, if you are going to compel it to function through the Quartermaster General?

Now, it happens in this case that the Quartermaster General is a very competent and a very efficient man. We hope he will live a long time. But you do not want to tie this reorganization scheme to the coat tails of anybody. The reason why I feel that this scheme was put into the bill as it is written was that the members of the committee have great confidence in the present Quartermaster General. I have great confidence in him, too, but I have just as great confidence in the men who are operating in the construction corps now, and I think it is better policy to write this bill now in such a way that if war should come the men who come after us will find the Army ready to function. When this war came on the biggest problem that confronted the men who had the supervision of our war effort was the problem of organization. You heard all over the country that the Army could not function, and to a large extent it was true. It had to stop in order to reorganize. The purpose of this reorganization bill is to reorganize these departments now so that they not only may function economically in time of peace but so that they may function effectively in time of war.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. MILLER. I am going to ask the gentleman if this is not one of the lessons that we learned in this war—the value of a separate organization for the construction corps?

Mr. SANFORD. I hope so; that is, I hope we have learned the lesson.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Is it not a fact that these men who came from civil life and did such fine work during the war now favor a separate corps?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes. All the men who came down here and tried to work with their hands tied with what they call "red tape" finally became so efficient that in 90 days the boys that went into the Army were housed in the cantonments necessary for their protection, and they all believed in the system which they left here, and they have reason to be proud of it.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Gladly.

Mr. REAVIS. Under the plan that existed prior to the war, and which would exist under this bill, many separate bureaus of the War Department were functioning with reference to construction, were they not?

Mr. SANFORD. That is absolutely true.

Mr. REAVIS. And each one had its overhead, and each one had its own individual designs and plans. Does not the gentleman believe that if we coordinate all these activities in one organization, such as is suggested by his amendment, so as to standardize the products that we purchase under one overhead, instead of increasing the cost it will vastly decrease the cost?

Mr. SANFORD. I feel perfectly confident of it, and every person acquainted with the subject that I know of entertains that same opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANFORD. I am glad that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] has put the thing so clearly in his simple question. It seems to me that any man of business has the answer ready in his mind. Therefore, because the gentleman has made that so clear, I shall not touch upon it further. I appeal to the business sense of the House on that.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. This, then, takes one brigadier general instead of six?

Mr. SANFORD. No. I must be perfectly fair. This takes one brigadier general to be the head of this department. Now, these other departments are all created by the bill, and each must engage in its separate speciality, as, for example, the Chemical Warfare Service and the Aircraft, and they must have officers appropriate for that work; and the plan is to let these specialists follow their own specialties and to take away from the Quartermaster the supervision of business like this construction work that does not belong to him.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in the proposition in the bill a brigadier general would have charge of the construction work, although it does not say that. You should organize this department in such a way that these people can function in the things they can do best rather than put them under some one who has no enthusiasm to make their building scheme effective, but in his mind has another scheme to accomplish.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman feel that there is any danger, if you make a separate corps of the construction branch of the Army, that the men who are in command of the corps will be devoting a good deal of their time to seeing how they can find ways and means to make new construction and thereby levy new charges on the Treasury?

Mr. SANFORD. I am glad the gentleman from Illinois mentioned that. I think there is always that danger with respect to Government employees and Government work, and Congress must hold the purse strings and authorize only the work that ought to be done and refuse to authorize it when it ought not to be done.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that the record made by the construction division during the war amply justifies the amendment?

Mr. SANFORD. I do. It was found to be wonderfully efficient.

Mr. ASWELL. Furthermore, the amount of money expended by the construction department is one-tenth of all the appropriations for the Army or has been.

Mr. SANFORD. It is very large.

Mr. ASWELL. Would it not be good business to make one construction division to handle that enormous sum?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes. Now, before I leave this subject, I want to say that I was surprised to find that the construction work which is being done by this Government of ours is being done in 9 different Federal departments, in 35 different bureaus, and in 4 unattached commissions. Altogether, there are 39 separate organizations now doing construction work.

Mr. ASWELL. And all have overhead charges.

Mr. SANFORD. All have overhead charges. The purpose of this bill is to add six more. Now, I propose that this Army bill, as one feature of its reorganization scheme, shall start to maintain something resembling a public-works department. I do not believe in going too far at a jump, but I feel that this is a safe jump in the right direction.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. How soon after the war began did they create the construction corps?

Mr. SANFORD. I have not the date, but it was as soon as the problem of the cantonments arose.

Mr. ASWELL. In April, 1917.

Mr. SANFORD. Very early in the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is one of the rocks on which the Committee on Military Affairs split, so far as construction is concerned. Others believed that it ought to go back to the Quartermaster Corps. Others believed that it ought to be put, where it properly belongs, under the Corps of Engineers. For one, I am not going to take the time now to discuss the construction corps or to reply to the gentleman from New York in the statements that I fear he has not investigated very far, or perhaps he would not have made some of them, as to the economy and the wonderful ability of the construction corps in saving this Government millions of money during the war. At a later date I hope to have something to say on that subject.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me there for a moment?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. I did not attempt to say that the construction corps saved money. That was not the purpose of the construction corps during the war. The purpose of the construction corps during the war was to house the soldiers and win the war, and I say they did that. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I think my colleague will not attempt, even in that feeble way, to make a defense of a system which, in my judgment, cost this Government hundreds of millions of dollars. [Applause.] I am not saying that as a criticism of the individual men in the construction corps. The men in the construction corps were engineers and builders, who came from civil life and took commissions in the construction corps, many of them able, honorable, and upright gentlemen. I do not criticize them individually; but they were working under a system that was prepared by three men on the emergency construction committee down here in Washington which led to the extravagance that followed in the construction of our cantonments and other war buildings and over which the construction quartermasters were just as helpless as the gentleman from New York or myself.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman admits, then, that any unexpected expenditures which occurred were not on account of the construction corps, but on account of some committee?

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand; but Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the time of the Committee of the Whole in discussing that proposition.

Mr. ASWELL. Does not the gentleman believe the passage of this amendment would prevent in the future just the thing he describes?

Mr. McKENZIE. No. The writing into the law of our country of a provision that would forever prevent the recurrence of the character of contracts under which this work was done might be of some service. I am not criticizing these men in the construction corps and Gen. Marshall at the head of it. I do not blame them for lobbying about the Capitol of our country or coming to the House Office Building to try to have us continue this corps. But I do say that if the men of this House are insisting on economy and efficiency, they will never consent to the creation of a separate corps to take care of construction in time of peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. You are all well aware that through all our history we have what is known as the Corps of Engineers. The Corps of Engineers is good enough when war comes to go out in the field of battle, build the railroads, build the housing facilities to take care of the troops, and do all that work.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Did the Army Engineers build the railroads in France, or did Gen. Atterbury, from the Pennsylvania Railroad, a civilian, build them?

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand that Gen. Atterbury was acting under the Engineer Corps. I want to say that we have provisions in the law under which the best engineers of the world have come in; and when war comes they can be called into service.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I simply want the opportunity to say that I have never in all the history of Congress seen such a lobby as there has been in an effort to make this a separate corps.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am simply pleading for efficiency and for economy. We have the engineers. We educate them at West Point, we call them in from civil life, and why should not these men have something to do?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Reference has been made to a lobby in behalf of this amendment. Have not we all heard from engineer societies and the business people back home recommending the creation of a separate construction corps in the Army?

Mr. MADDEN. What do they know about it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. They think they know, and they know they pay the bills. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. I presume that is true. A great many of them held commissions in the construction corps. I am not criticizing them, but I am criticizing the membership of this House if it is going to aid that sort of propaganda and put the additional burden on the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. The gentleman mentioned a while ago the extravagance that had occurred. If we had had the construction corps they could have taken up the work and there would have been no such extravagance in contracts as the gentleman referred to. The work would have been conducted in a proper manner by an efficient force.

Mr. McKENZIE. That has all gone by, we had the Corps of Engineers and Gen. Black, Chief of the Corps of Engineers, testified that they were ready and willing to take over the work.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. But you are adding work to the Quartermaster Department.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not in favor of putting the construction corps in the Quartermaster Department; I am in favor of putting it where it belongs—under the Corps of Engineers—and letting the men who have had experience and who have served us well in time of stress do the work. We are paying them, and why should we let other men do the work which they can do?

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. Why did not the gentleman bring in a bill to put this under the Corps of Engineers?

Mr. McKENZIE. I was defeated in committee. I can say that practically all the military men in this country are unanimous in their opinion that the construction corps should be under the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. WELLING. Is it not a fact that the Engineer Corps is composed of military men?

Mr. McKENZIE. The Corps of Engineers is made up of men who graduated at West Point and men who have come in from civil life and reserve engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I have twice to-day heard reference to a lobby and a propaganda on this floor with reference to the construction corps section in this bill. The word "lobby" in its most sinister sense and meaning suggests the use of money or some other valuable consideration for the support of any matter under consideration. I think the gentlemen making the references did not use the term in that sense. If, however, they intend that a lobby or propaganda means that the people, the citizens of this country, have come or have communicated with their representatives and presented the facts as they understand them, giving information of value for the betterment of the service and the lessening of taxes, showing that both can be accomplished by the adoption of this amendment by the continuing and making permanent this corps, I admit that I adhere to that sort of a lobby and a propaganda and shall always welcome it. [Applause.]

Much has been said about the Engineer Corps, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] has stated his intention of offering an amendment to have the work of the construction corps committed to it. I will oppose that amendment. Let us not forget that the Engineer Corps, so designated in the War Department, is charged with specific and definite duties, largely of a military character, and neither by training nor experience is it fitted for the functions of the construction division. These duties are in bridge building, surveying, and deepening of rivers and harbors, making entrenchments, fortifications, and work of purely a military character. Therefore be not deceived when you are told that the Engineer Corps is the proper place for this work. It is a deceptive and alluring term, Engineer Corps. If it was a corps of building engineers, it would be a happy suggestion or performance to assign this work to it. This amendment, as a matter of fact, will create just such a corps that alone can properly do the work, and I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that it should be under an Engineer Corps, but that corps should be a corps of construction engineers who are mainly commercial engineers who have practical experience in all the arts of building and construction and are the men who have had charge of that line of activity in the construction corps as now constituted.

It was the big construction men of the country who came into this corps during the war, who established its high-grade efficiency, and who rescued it from its prewar archaic condition. It is an admitted fact that under this same corps, as now constituted, these men within three months transformed virgin fields into thriving cities in which to house our troops and thereby solved the greatest problem with which America was confronted at the beginning of the war, and by so doing established a world record for war-time construction.

This problem was not one alone of construction of buildings, but it embraced likewise the utility feature, which was, in my opinion, of greater importance than the erection of buildings. The gas, electricity, water, and sewerage systems was also under its jurisdiction, and the highest approval of its work in these avenues is the glorious fact that no epidemic, or insanitation, affecting our troops was in the slightest degree discovered.

So, gentlemen, the proposition reduces itself to this situation. Here is a department in the War Department that has been developed, because the Quartermaster Department was absolutely inefficient and unable to handle these problems, not because that department was not in the main efficient, but because, when the test came, it was not its business to build and construct cantonments. That department was created to handle and distribute food supplies, clothing, and equipment.

The construction corps is a commercial proposition, and now has in its personnel trained experts and enlisted tradesmen occupying a related position to the rest of the Army as the Bureau of Yards and Docks so successfully does to the Navy.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes.

Mr. ASWELL. Does the gentleman believe that men trained for the Quartermaster Corps know anything about construction?

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not. I believe the average quartermaster officer is an expert in handling supplies and the distribution of them. I believe it to be a great mistake to abandon or to disintegrate the construction corps, now perfected to such a high degree; to direct its function into six different avenues of effort, and into six different channels, and thereby increasing the expenses of operation further by not coordinating energy and effort under one jurisdiction. We all know that Gen. Rogers, the Quartermaster General, is a very capable man; he can not, however, successfully take charge of the administration and expenditure of the $48,000,000 which will be invested during the year with as good results as can the construction corps. The function of administering and expending something over $150,000,000 by his department for supplies and equipment is in itself a gigantic undertaking for one man. It seems elementary to me and needs no great argument that this amendment should be adopted, for here we have a concrete, definite thing. The war has proved the inefficiency of the prewar condition of the Quartermaster Department to solve this problem. We have proved that we can carry out the very purposes for which this corps was created, and did so under the guidance of these men who alone in this country built over 100 miles of railroad, and who built these wonderful cantonments and gave our boys, as was stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], proper housing facilities which enabled them to be physically trained to a point where they won the war. [Applause.] And for all these and many other reasons which I could enumerate, in my opinion, this amendment should be adopted.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 49.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on this.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. REAVIS and Mr. KAHN) reported that there were—ayes 82, noes 45.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12775, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills and joint resolution:

H. R. 12164. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across the Columbia River, between the towns of Pasco and Kennewick, in the State of Washington;

H. R. 12213. An act authorizing F. R. Beals to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Nestucca River in Tillamook County, Oreg.; and

H. J. Res. 305. Joint resolution to amend a certain paragraph of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921," approved February 14, 1920.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MORIN was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, March 12, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Acting Attorney General, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Justice for expenses incident to the enforcement of the national prohibition act for the fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 683); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the president of the Board of Commissioners, District of Columbia, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the employment of expert service and for incidental expenses of the Zoning Commission, created by the act of March 2, 1920 (H. Doc. No. 684); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the District of Columbia for additional teachers for the public schools of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 685); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GANDY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2786) authorizing the sale of lands in Gregory County, S. Dak., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 734), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12626) for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands along the Snake River in the State of Idaho under an erroneous survey made in 1883, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 735), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11706) granting a pension to Patrick Kinney; Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 10835) to fix compensation of officers of the National Army who incurred disability while in the service; Committee on Ways and Means discharged, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WELLING: A bill (H. R. 13026) to enlarge and extend the post-office building at Logan, Utah; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. DALLINGER: Memorial of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relative to maintaining transportation through the Cape Cod Canal; to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. ROGERS: Memorial of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, favoring an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, giving Congress power to regulate the hours of labor; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 13027) granting an increase of pension to David A. Whitaker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FORDNEY: A bill (H. R. 13028) authorizing the appointment of Paymaster T. De F. Harris as a pay inspector in the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13029) granting a pension to Leon B. Leach; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRENCH: A bill (H. R. 13030) for the relief of Lyn Lundquist; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HAYS: A bill (H. R. 13031) granting an increase of pension to John F. Darb; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13032) granting an increase of pension to John Lynn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LUCE: A bill (H. R. 13033) granting a pension to Andrew T. Wilson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MADDEN: A bill (H. R. 13034) granting a pension to J. C. Baldridge; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13035) granting a pension to Winifred Greene; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOORES of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 13036) for the relief of Seth Seaton Ward; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. VESTAL: A bill (H. R. 13037) granting an increase of pension to Wilber C. Gahret; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WASON: A bill (H. R. 13038) granting a pension to Abbie E. Avery; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13039) granting a pension to Marilla R. Simonds; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

2236. By Mr. ASHBROOK: Petition of Ralph Courtright Post, No. 65, American Legion, Coshocton, Ohio, in favor of bonus legislation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

2237. By Mr. DALLINGER: Petition of the Cleveland Americanization Council, Cleveland, Ohio, favoring House bill 3315; to the Committee on Education.

2239. By Mr. ESCH: Petition of the Italian Chamber of Commerce, of New York City, relative to Senate bill 3718; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] is recognized.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. MYERS. Does the Senator from Colorado wish to put something in the RECORD?

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to do so.

Mr. MYERS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I received this morning a telegram from the Louisville (Ky.) Courier Journal, upon which I deem it my duty to make brief comment. The telegram refers to the treaty, and reads as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., March 11, 1920.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Courier Journal has championed vigorously the league without reservation or modification, but it now believes national interests demand every Democratic Senator should vote for ratification on best terms possible. It urges you to do so because, first, no American commission can hereafter exact from Germany terms of settlement contained in this treaty. Second, rejected treaty means we are absolutely out of league, while ratified means we are partly in, and with passing years will get fully in. Some future Democratic Senate will relax reservations, but more than likely Republicans themselves, if they get into power will do so and furnish the best vindication of present Democratic position and proof of their insincerity. Third, the league can not be presented as a clean-cut campaign issue. It will be obscured by domestic issues, and the election result will not be a fair decision. Undoubtedly, Nation is for league, but is tired of question and will vote on home matters. Fourth, ratification will give to treaty for all time Wilson's name. Rejection means elimination his name from the ultimate settlement. Courier Journal and people generally would deplore Democratic alignment with Borah battalion of death. Politically, Democrats will make mistake to assume irreconcilable attitude helping BORAH deprive country of peace.

COURIER JOURNAL CO.

Mr. President, I construe this telegram to be an appeal to me to conform my vote upon the treaty to party purposes and for party ends, and because it bears that construction and that construction only I am constrained to occupy the time of the Senator for a few moments regarding it.

If a great international covenant which is to influence not only the present but all future generations, not only Americans but the entire human race, a document dealing with all the political, social, and economic conditions of the present and the future, a document creating and reconstructing nations, a document which admittedly marks an epoch in the vast procession of human affairs, is to be disposed of as a partisan measure, the fact should be announced without equivocation. Moreover, it should have terminated this discussion long ago.

If, when the framers of the Constitution imposed upon the Senate of the United States the supreme duty of passing final judgment upon treaties they intended or even imagined that the exercise of that power would be influenced and determined from the standpoint of party advantage or disadvantage, then we should revise our estimate of their wisdon and their patriotism and our estimate as well of the Constitution and the nature of our official oaths to support it.

I would be reluctant, Mr. President, to charge, much less to believe, that in his heart of hearts a single Member of this body will in his final vote be thus actuated. If the fact be otherwise, then I can only say that his conception of the nature and character of this great obligation differs fundamentally from mine.

Mr. President, I would as soon abandon the wife of my bosom, disown my children, and repudiate my friends as to permit myself in this or any similar crisis of our country's affairs to be influenced, much less concluded, upon the subject by any consideration of partisan advantage or partisan gain. I would rejoice if my conclusion coincided with party policy, but that happy consequence would be in no sense controlling of my official conduct. I can not but believe, Mr. President, that the authors of this telegram penned and forwarded it without due reflection on their attitude regarding this treaty, and certainly with a very low opinion of the nature of my own convictions upon the subject. I have said, and I repeat for the last time, I hope, that this treaty can not and should not become a partisan issue or the subject of a party policy. If it does assume that form, it will cleave present party divisions in twain. The line of division will be at right angles to their existing planes of disposition. That of itself is not a subject of regret; it is creditable to the American spirit and to the national independence of American citizenship.

Now, just a word as to the reasons which are outlined in this telegram for the request that it conveys to me:

It urges you to vote for ratification on the best terms possible, because, first, no American commission can hereafter exact from Germany terms of settlement contained in this treaty.

If that means anything, it means that I should change my convictions or suppress them and vote for this treaty because it can never be enforced; that I should make it a part of the supreme law of my country for the reason that its due observance is impossible, and to the extent of nonenforcement it will become a dead letter. Such a reason, Mr. President, does not appeal to my obtuse sensibilities. I am unable to perceive the relation of its cause and sequence upon any conviction, be it permanent, temporary, partisan, or nonpartisan. If it is at all important, it furnishes me with a reason against ratification rather than for it. But let me proceed.

Rejected treaty means that we are absolutely out of league.

I understand that, hence I have determined to vote against the treaty. But we are told—rather I am told, for I do not know that anyone else has received a copy of this telegram—I am told—

That if we ratify the treaty it means that we are partly in and with passing years will get fully in.

I recommend that assurance to the reservationists, to the mild reservationists, to the nullifiers, to the mild nullifiers, to the Democrats, and to the Republicans. Remember, this is a Democratic appeal, and I am urged to vote my country into this league partially, because it means that hereafter it will be in completely.

I have voted for some of the reservations, my purpose being to safeguard the country as far as I think it can be safeguarded by reservations, if we are to ratify the treaty at all, but not because I am in the slightest degree deceived as to the ultimate effect of these reservations upon the treaty itself. I sat in the Senate gallery 27 years ago and heard the roll call upon a bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the silver act, known as the Sherman Act. That bill contained as a final section a pledge of the United States to bimetallism, coupled with a pledge to advocate it on all occasions and to obtain it if possible.

That was a sop to Cerberus. It did not deceive me; I do not think it deceived a single Member voting for or against the measure. It proved so completely a dead letter that I do not believe 5 per cent of the Members of either House of Congress have any recollection of it whatever, if, indeed, they ever heard of it. So 20 years from now your reservations will have proven utterly inconsequential and the United States will be, as the Courier Journal assures us, "fully in." That may be desirable; a great many think it is; I do not think so. My judgment may be fallible; it probably is; but there is no difference between myself and the Courier Journal upon this proposition.

It is much easier to get into trouble than to get out; it is much easier to enter any scheme, whatever the conditions, than to emerge from it unscathed or to continue the conditions in all their integrity. But I must proceed—

More than likely the Republicans themselves if they get into power will do so—

That is, relax the reservations—and furnish the best vindication of present Democratic position and proof of their insincerity.

I suppose this means proof of Republican insincerity, although the phraseology would justify the opposite construction.

But, Mr. President, must I surrender my convictions and yield to a party appeal because obstructing Republicans may hereafter be convicted of insincerity; because their work may be shown by the logic of time to have rested upon an insecure foundation; because their insistence, in other words, may prove to have been partisan and not patriotic? I am unable to reconcile abandonment of a sincere conviction with such a plea. Certainly it carries no sanction sufficiently attractive to justify me in yielding to it, whether partisan or not.

Another reason why I am urged to change front upon this issue and vote for ratification is that—

Ratification will give to the treaty for all time Wilson's name; rejection means elimination of his name from the ultimate settlement.

In other words, I should shape my conduct upon this proposition by the effect that it will have upon the fame of a single individual. Can this journal seriously urge such a plea for the acceptance of a world covenant?

Mr. President, ever since I met Mr. Wilson in 1911 I have been what is termed a "Wilson man."

I advocated his nomination, and in my poor way I contributed both to that and to his subsequent election; I have been an administration Senator, and I hope I shall always continue to be such while I am honored with a seat in this body and the occupant of the White House shall belong to my party. Wherever it has been possible for me to support administration measures I have done so; where I have found it impossible, I have declined to do so and made my position clear as soon as I took it. That is my conception, Mr. President, of an administration Senator. I follow no man blindly and without question.

I know that it is very easy in this world to let others do one's thinking, to harmonize one's convictions with those of the majority, and to accept wisdom coming from on high as absolutely sound and absolutely conclusive. If I had been created with such a disposition my life would have been a most happy and agreeable one; but, unfortunately, I am so constituted mentally that it has been necessary to do my own thinking and to reach my own conclusions, however imperfect or pernicious they may be, by the exercise of my faculties of intelligence and investigation, by reflection upon causes, and, above all, by those processes of inductive reasoning which consider consequences, both ultimate and immediate. I must try, however imperfectly, to guide my feet by the lamp of experience, by the light of example, and by the recorded wisdom of the great men whose completed labors constitute the beacon lights of human kind.

This is Mr. Wilson's method also. It has been one of the attributes, if not the chief one, which attracted me to him as a follower and kept me so since I have had the honor of his acquaintance and, I trust, of his friendship. But servile imitation is not the equivalent of respect and confidence.

Mr. President, is it possible that in determining one's duty under his oath of office, and especially in the discharge of the most tremendous obligation imposed upon a Senator of the United States, he should be influenced by the effect of his action upon the renown of any individual, however mighty or deserving he may be; that the fate of this Nation and the future of the world should be weighed in the balance with personal ambition or personal interest? The statement is a monstrous one, to be rejected without equivocation and without reflection. It is one which I am satisfied the President of the United States never would entertain, much less advance or approve of its suggestion by others.

Mr. President, in my judgment, Mr. Wilson's name is immune from the corroding influences of time, whatever the fate of this treaty may be. He has been the Chief of the greatest Nation that ever existed in the tides of time during the gravest crisis it ever confronted. He carried it through all the perils of war to a glorious and permanent triumph. His name is written high upon the scrolls of immortality, there to remain forever, whether this treaty be ratified unconditionally, whether it be ratified with reservations, or whether it fails of ratification.

I need not detain the Senate longer upon that part of the message.

I come now to the last one:

People generaly would deplore Democratic alignment with BORAH battalion of death. Politically Democrats will make mistake to assume irreconcilable attitude, helping BORAH to deprive country of peace.

Of course, Mr. President, this counsel is based upon the assumption that the Senator from Idaho controls my action or in some manner influences it, and that by refusing to ratify I am supporting his position and writing my own political sentence of death. Such a left-handed compliment would have been more graceful and more appreciated had it proceeded from another source than that of a great Democratic journal, made illustrious for many years under the management of the Hon. Henry Watterson, one of the greatest Americans of his day and generation.

Mr. President, my convictions are my own. They are reached by my own processes, however defective. The fact that they harmonize with those of my distinguished colleague from Idaho is a coincidence, although I flatter myself that they are largely justified by the fact that a man of his intellectual eminence and powers of reasoning has reached the same conclusion, but the fact that the Senator has investigated this matter for himself has had no more effect upon me than has the fact that my friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], has reached a different conclusion through the same processes.

I think my associates will bear me out in the statement that since announcing my attitude upon this treaty I have sought to proselytize or influence no man. I have intruded my views upon none of my colleagues unless they requested it. I have avoided, purposely and deliberately, the caucuses and the conferences of my party associates, lest my presence might prove embarrassing. I have exchanged views occasionally with some Republican Members of the Senate upon the question arising out of this treaty, precisely as I have exchanged views with them upon other subjects; and consequently I am as indifferent to "Senator BORAH's battalion of death" as I am to the extreme reservationists, to the mild reservationists, to the Republicans, and to the Democrats as regards my own sense of obligation and my own convictions of duty in this great crisis. I presume that I am classified as a member of that battalion which has now been christened with the name of the Senator from Idaho, but it must be because I have been overcandid in informing my associates and the country of my position upon this treaty. I can not concern myself, much as I would like, with the effect of my vote upon the future of my party or of its accord with the battalion of death so long as my conscience tells me that what I do I do honestly and openly and from that conviction which comes from long and anxious investigation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As an enrolled member in good standing of the "battalion of death," I desire to inform the Senator that the slogan of that battalion is only "Death to international socialism."

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, we have at least received some information as a result of this discussion. We know now what the slogan is, but the battalion has no monopoly of it. I hope that all good citizens are similarly inspired. It is my slogan, although I am not even an honorary member of the battalion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We will make the Senator a member emeritus.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President. Should I accept that offer, I suppose the announcement would be made in the morning by the Louisville Courier-Journal that I had absolved myself from all allegiance to the Democratic Party, and received on the other side of this aisle, chanting the ancient chorus:

While the lamp holds out to burn
The vilest sinner may return.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, upon which side of the other side of the aisle?

Mr. THOMAS. That is the other side to me, and this is the other side to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. There are schismatics over here, too.

Mr. THOMAS. I am aware of that, Mr. President; and I trust their schism is no outgrowth of partisan feeling toward the treaty and influenced by partisan considerations.

Politically, Democrats will make mistake to assume irreconcilable attitude, helping BORAH deprive country of peace.

A tactical mistake, a fundamental mistake, or a political mistake? Fortunately, we are not left to conjecture, for the Journal assures me that, politically, this mistake will be made if I persist in my "irreconcilable" attitude.

Mr. President, I have heretofore wearied the Senate by protesting against the intermixture of partisanship with consideration of this treaty. I have refused not less than a score of invitations with which I have been honored from different parts of the United States to come and express my views upon the treaty, because I apprehended that if I did so I would be reproached for criticizing the administration, and of disregard for the party to which I have always belonged. I have at no time of which I am conscious so conducted myself in the consideration of the treaty as to justify the view that I was influenced or could be influenced by any political or partisan consideration. I have reached my conclusions regarding this treaty after a long and patient process of investigation; and, while I may subject myself to the charge of egotism, I venture the opinion that I know more about the treaty, I am more familiar with its text, and am more capable of judging its results than any man or association which thus far protested my conclusions or instructed me as to my vote, and I have been besieged with correspondence commending and condemning my views with rigorous and never-ending iteration.

I read this treaty six times before I formed any conclusion about it, and always with the earnest desire to ratify it. I can not do so, and I affirm with due regard for all men that if anybody thinks that I shall be false to my convictions, whatever the consequences, either to myself or to my country, he is unacquainted with my convictions of public duty. If every person in the country should request me to vote for this treaty, with or without the League of Nations, I could not do it. If I did so, the mirror would never reflect my own features without reminding me of my self-betrayal. If the people of my State request it in any great preponderance, they can have my resignation, but I must retain my honesty of conviction, my sense of self-respect, and the obligations of my official oath.

So let me say once for all that whatever the result, partisan, political, social, or economic, upon the question of the ratification of the treaty with Germany, I shall be compelled to cast my vote in the negative.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 250).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 8, 1919, a duplicate of a report made on December 20, 1919, in regard to claims for compensation before the War Risk Insurance Bureau, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ASHURST presented a petition of the Common Council of Globe, Ariz., praying for the enactment of legislation to exclude from the mails certain classes of advertising matter, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Derby Line, Vt., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the salaries of and to provide a bonus for Government civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of the United States, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the parole of Federal prisoners, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of Local Union No. 1246, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of Menominee, Mich., and a petition of the Trades and Labor Council of Port Huron, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Sterling sedition bill, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry inmates of the soldiers' home at Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to Spanish War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

RECLASSIFICATION COMMISSION.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the Joint Commission on the Reclassification of Salaries have completed their report and have transmitted it to the President of the Senate for presentation and reference. Copies will be furnished to Senators when printed, which I hope to be able to have done to-morrow.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 3995) providing for the relinquishment of certain described property by the United States to the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 468) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11175) for the public sale of customhouse building and site at Kennebunkport, Me., reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 4063) granting an increase of pension to John Ferriter; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 4064) for the relief of the estate of C. C. Spiller, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4065) granting an increase of pension to Ruth A. Day; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4066) granting an increase of pension to Sarah McIntire (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4067) granting increase of pension to survivors of the War with Mexico now on the pension roll, and granting increase of pension to widows of those who served in the War with Mexico now on the pension roll; to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions with reference to the bill granting Mexican War pensions.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the Senator refer the letter to the committee which will have the bill before it, and then if the bill is reported out of course the letter will become a part of the report.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a very short letter, and I think will give very valuable information to the general public on the number of pensioners in connection with the Mexican War and the amount that the Government is paying them.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not make the request now.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator objects, I will have to withhold it.

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4068) granting increase of pension to widows of those who served in the war with Great Britain of 1812, now on the pension roll; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 4069) for the relief of the owner of the steamship Urubambra; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4070) to establish and maintain the American school army and to organize and equip the American reserve army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POSSESSIONS OF GREECE.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 333), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Whereas northern Epirus, south of a line drawn from the Bay of Grammala, northeastward to the Ostrovitsa Mountain, and thence northward to Lakes Ochrida and Prespa, has always been Greek in every respect; and

Whereas the Dodecanese, or Twelve Islands of the Aegean, have always been Greek; and

Whereas the western coast of Asia Minor, from the Gulf of Adramyti to the Bay of Macri, which lies to the northwest of the island of Rhodes, including the entire Province of Aidin, with the exception of the district of Denizli, including also the district of Balikisseri, which is a part of the vilayet of Broussa, is preponderantly Greek; and

Whereas Turkish rule over Christian peoples has been desolating; and

Whereas the Young Turks are again in the ascendant; and

Whereas the program of the Nationalists, held at Sivas, adopted as its program:

First. Turkification of all races in the Turkish Empire;

Second. Boycott of all Christian merchants;

Third. Expulsion of all Europeans from the Empire;

Fourth. Resistance to all interference from outside in the internal affairs of Turkey;

And

Whereas this program of the Turks shows neither repentance nor intention to protect the Christians: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that northern Epirus, south of a line running from the Bay of Grammala northeastward to the Lakes of Ochrida and Prespa; that the Twelve Islands of the Aegean; that the western coast of Asia Minor from the Gulf of Adramyti to the Bay of Macri, including the entire Province of Aidin, with the exception of the district of Denizli, including also the district of Balikisseri, which is a part of the vilayet of Broussa, should be awarded by the peace conference to Greece and become incorporated in the Kingdom of Greece; and that Turkish rule at Constantinople and over Christians everywhere be now abolished.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION OF PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 251).

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 38 of the act approved March 2, 1917 (39 Stat., 951), entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of each of 38 franchises granted by the Public Service Commission of Porto Rico. The copies of the franchises inclosed are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting them to me.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
12 March, 1920.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany in open executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we have arrived at reservation No. 2, which applies to article 10 of the treaty. I am going to offer a modification or amendment to that reservation as it stands. It is done in consonance with what I have stated on the floor many times, that I did not feel that I should be justified in insisting upon the defeat of the treaty on the simple question of phraseology employed in any reservation.

If I thought what I offer affected in any way the principle or the substance of the reservation as it stands, I not only should not offer it but I should vote against the treaty which contained it. I now offer the modification which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the original reservation and the modification now proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Reservation No. 2, as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, reads as follows:

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

In lieu of the reported reservation No. 2 it is proposed to insert the following.

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have refrained at this session from taking the time of the Senate by extended remarks upon the treaty of peace. I feel, however, that I should now make a brief but emphatic statement as to my position on article 10 of the League of Nations covenant, so that the country, my State, and the Senate may definitely know my position. The original Lodge reservation was reported by the Foreign Relations Committee—a standing committee of the Senate. It was approved by a majority vote of this Senate and by the majority party of this body. It was, in my judgment, approved by the great body politic of this country. There is no doubt about the meaning of that reservation. The country understands it. The Senate understands it. The world understands it.

It says, in effect, that "we do not" assume any obligation, moral or legal, to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of States members of the League of Nations.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the Senator states that he understands no one claims that there is any doubt about it. I understood the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to insist that under that reservation the obligation remains; and he made a long and elaborate speech to prove it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. From my understanding of the Lodge reservation up to the present time, and eliminating the present modification, it is the strongest reservation that has been presented to the Senate to protect American rights.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is certainly a modification of the one presented originally by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very glad to have the observation of the Senator from Minnesota. I simply wish to continue, Mr. President, without interruption, if I may, until I finish my statement, and then I shall be very glad to answer any questions in regard to my position that may be presented.

That is my position, and I intend to stand by the Foreign Relations Committee. If that reservation is not adopted, I shall vote against the treaty. Since the Senate voted for it attempts have been made by "unofficial committees" on foreign affairs, functioning all over this Chamber, "in vain attempts to paint the lily," so to speak.

I have been asked by certain Senators to support substitutes before having the text submitted to me, with the statement that "It only makes a verbal change," or "It protects the United States against assuming a moral or legal obligation"; "We want something that will save the faces of So-and-so, opposed to the Lodge reservation"; "We do not want to take this into the campaign," and so forth.

No amendment can be written that will prevent assuming the obligation and assume it at the same time. I do not criticize those who desire proper ratification after protecting America's rights or honest attempts to bring it about, or their right to make the effort. But so far the attempts made only evade the real issue. A fundamental principle is involved and no compromise can be written that does not surrender that principle, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has said that "that principle shall not be surrendered."

I refer to the very able speech which he made on March 9. At the end, speaking of the President, he said:

It is well that he has said it; the issue can be veiled no longer; it justifies the position that we on this side, all alike, have taken, that there must be no obligation imposed on the United States to carry out the provisions of article 10.

Only the other day a substitute was drafted and was in possession of two or three Members of each side of the Chamber. I made a careful study of it and its clouded meaning. I understand the original reservation. I did not understand the compromise and submitted it to several able authorities, including a prominent international lawyer. This lawyer stated that it was artfully drawn and leaves the implication that the United States assumes a moral obligation. This is too grave and important a question for the Senate to allow everyone to be drafting amendments, hastily considered, withheld until time of presentation and a vote is imminent and then ask a Senator to assume the solemn obligation of casting his vote without understanding what he is voting for.

Senators, we are playing with fire. I hold my duty to my country too sacred to trifle with this question. If we remain out of the league I know we will be safe. If we go in, I am not sure of it. I was and still am willing to vote for the original Lodge reservation, though, even then, with that adopted, I believe, to make a frank confession, we are in a much safer position outside rather than inside the league. We have contrived to get along pretty well for 140 years without a League of Nations, and it is my belief that the United States will still be functioning in the same glorious manner at the end of another 140 years if we do not go in. I am not thinking of the effect this will have on the coming campaign. I am not thinking of the effect it will have on my political future. I will not place President Wilson before my country, I will not place my party before my duty. I consider the obligation resting on me at this time too sacred for political or personal considerations.

The issue before us is now plain. No longer can it be argued that by article 10 no obligation is imposed on us to safeguard the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations. The author of the article, the President, in his recent letter to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] writes that the obligation is "expressed in positive terms." He says that the treaty will be nothing more than a scrap of paper unless it guarantees "as a matter of incontestable right, the political independence and integrity of each of its members." He tells us that we should "welcome the opportunity to share the responsibilities of article 10, a responsibility which he characterizes as "an overwhelming one." He asks us to consider "humanity" rather than our "special national interests." He defines article 10 "as the essence of Americanism" and insists that it affords us "a great and glorious opportunity to contribute our overwhelming moral and material force to the establishment of an international régime."

By this letter he admits what time and again I have charged, viz, that he is an internationalist, that he has forgoten that he was elected President not of humanity but of the United States, and that he had no authority to propose in our behalf that we should police Europe, take part in its every quarrel and send abroad our boys to guard the frontiers of nations.

With all due respect to him and to my learned associates who are ready to substitute his judgment for their own, quite contrary to their oath, I do not believe that the President or the President and Senate combined, without any amendment to the Constitution, have any right to give the pledge which he advocates. We all know that our people would not fulfill any such pledge. An attempt to draft an Army to protect India as against Russia would most certainly result in riots and probably in revolution. We must be guided by reason rather than by visions. The President would obligate us to preserve frontiers which he and others have established. He argues as though he and the diplomats who made the treaty were infallible, forgetting that in his notes on the Adriatic question he repudiates the existence of infallibility outside of himself.

I have said that the issue is plain. It is. Should we or should we not undertake to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of other nations? The President says we should. I say that we should not and, if I correctly understand the sentiment of this Senate, a majority says that we should not. The President has stated his position in unmistakable terms. Why should we quibble? Can not we use language equally as clear as that employed by him? Why do we not simply say that the United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of any other nation? If that is what we mean, why not say it? Why add language which serves only to becloud our meaning? Why act as though we believed that language was invented to conceal thought? What is the meaning of the reservation now before us? Does it or does it not mean that we assume no obligation? Has not the President clearly indicated in his letter to the Senator from Nebraska that if we simply entwine article 10 and the Constitution, that if we simply make article 10 subject to the exercise of powers which, under the Constitution can be exercised only by Congress, we will perform a mere act of supererogation? Has he not told us that it was proposed by some nations at the peace conference that reservations should be added in their behalf making performance of their obligations subject to their constitutional methods of action, and that he and others who had met for business and not for talk listened to such proposals "of scrupulous supererogation with indifferent silence"?

By the reservation now before us there is no obligation on our part to employ our military or naval forces, our resources, or economic discrimination unless Congress so decides. Is it not plain to you that our Army can not be used, that our Navy can not be used, that economic discrimination can not be practiced, and that our resources are not available unless Congress acts? What position will we be in to deny any obligation under article 10 should this reservation be adopted if the President publicly construes same for the benefit of foreign nations as simply entwining our constitutional methods with the article and as being prompted solely by a superabundance of caution and as being merely an act of supererogation, which neither adds to nor detracts from the force and effect of the article?

Has he not warned us that he will view a declaration that before any obligation becomes legal and binding upon us Congress must act under and in accordance with the Constitution as being merely explanatory and as something which may be treated by himself and by others with indifferent silence and as acts of scrupulous supererogation?

I have no desire to be told that any reservation to which I may agree upon article 10 is a mere act of supererogation. I am not skilled in dialectics, casuistry, or sophistry. I have no desire to use language which one who is so skilled may construe to mean the opposite of what I intend. I am a business man who desires agreements to be so written that he who runs may read. If we would not open the door to misunderstanding let us say exactly what we mean and say it in language that can not be mistaken. If we do not intend to assume any obligation let us say so. What is clearer than a plain declaration that the United States does not assume any obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other nation? Why add anything to such a statement? Why qualify it with adjectives or phrases? Why confound it with words? Why afford those skilled in casuistry an opportunity to say that all that we meant was to entwine article 10 with our Constitution? My position is very plain. I am unalterably opposed to any obligation to protect other nations. As a business man I desire that our refusal to assume such an obligation should be stated in language so clear and straightforward that no one can misconstrue it, no matter how skillful he may be in dialectics, casuistry, or sophistry.

I therefore move that the reservation be amended so as to read as follows, and I believe there will be no doubt in the mind of anyone as to what this amendment means——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator a question? Does he mean that the reservation be amended or that the proposed modification be amended?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The proposed modification. I offer a substitute for the proposed modification or amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

The United States assumes no obligation to interfere in controversies between nations or to employ its military or its naval forces or its resources for any purpose under any article of the treaty.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, this is a very solemn hour in a long-protracted debate. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who have spoken, breathed a profound and moving conviction. No man has followed the speech just concluded but still hears ringing in his ears references which the Senator from New Jersey has made to efforts to save the faces of persons parties to this long controversy at a time when we should be moved to save the honor of the United States to-day and the lives of her sons in the years to come.

There are none of us, I think, who would spontaneously attribute to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] the authorship of the alternative reservation just offered. To be sure, he brought it forth to-day, but so many have been concerned in its gestation that its parentage happily will remain forever in doubt.

The great New York World, the organ of the administration, the ablest of the journalistic supporters of the covenant, to-day announces:

SIMMONS juggles new deal on the treaty.

Perhaps the Senator from North Carolina begot that which the Senator from Massachusetts has brought forth.

If the League of Nations gets through the Senate and by the President—

Writes the correspondent of the World—

the linked nations ought to erect a tall monument to FURNIFOLD M. SIMMONS, Senator from North Carolina. Twice he has seen the thing at the very point of realization, only to have it all knocked into a cocked hat by the backsliding of some one or some group.

* * * * * * *

So many different modifications of the reservation on article 10 have been suggested that both count and authorship have been lost. After a whole day of whispering, wheedling, and supposing, the net result was a feeling that whenever a variation of phraseology in the reservation gained a Democrat vote for the compromise it lost a Republican.

Says the correspondent:

The Senator from North Carolina is probably the only man in the Senate who believes that he can get a reservation to article 10 that will hold the votes of 32 Democrats and 32 Republicans and successfully run the White House gauntlet.

I pray that the hopes of the solitary and able Senator may be disappointed. If it be true that his hopes are to be fulfilled, we have now heard the terms of the Republican capitulation, the terms of the capitulation of the reservationists. It only remains to be discovered whether those terms will be accepted by the administration.

At this time, awaiting the discussion of their legal and contractual significance by those learned in the terms of contracts, permit me, sir, to repeat what I have said before, that ratification by the President with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate can be had only if the President and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] eat their words, or if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] eat their words.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I hope before the Senator concludes he will point out what obligation does remain under this amendment.

Mr. McCORMICK. Oh, Mr. President, I will address myself to the terms of the amendment in due course. Let me repeat what I have said as to the parties to the controversy, that if ratification be had with the consent of two-thirds of the Senate and by action of the President, there must be surrender on one side or the other. Does the Senator from Wisconsin hold a different view on that point?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not; but when the Senator charges the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wisconsin with being parties to the surrender, it seems to me that he ought to furnish a bill of particulars and show wherein they have surrendered anything.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Illinois has charged neither the Senator from Wisconsin nor the Senator from Massachusetts with surrender, nor yet has he charged the President or the Senator from Nebraska with surrender.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I apologize to the Senator, for I evidently misunderstood him.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator from Illinois said that if ratification were had by the consent of the Senate and the act of the President, then there must be surrender upon one side or the other. The debate presently will develop whether or not the terms of this reservation imply surrender. I had been about to say at the moment when my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, interrupted me, that the President explicitly in the letter he addressed to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Massachusetts no less explicitly on this floor each have declared that the issue was joined.

It has been manifest for a long time that in all probability the first violation of the tenth article of the covenant would occur not in Europe, not as between the new republican States for whose security so much solicitude has been expressed by the supporters of the covenant, nor as between them and many of their older and greater neighbors, but in Asia. When the menace in Asia was first pointed out in the Senate it seemed incredible that before the Senate would have acted finally upon the treaty a violation of the tenth article actually should have occurred. The cables to-day announce in a dispatch dated March 8 that:

The Syrian Congress at Damascus to-day declared Syria to be an independent State. There were fireworks to-night and Beirut celebrated its independence.

It is reported that Prince Feisal, son of the King of the Hejaz, will be crowned King of Syria to-morrow. Palestine, Lebanon, and northern Mesopotamia are included in the districts where the Arabs are voting freely, apparently with the purpose of forcing the peace conference to recognize Syria, under a threat of cooperation with the Turkish Nationalists if independence is refused to them.

The Arabs claim to have 100,000 troops ready to cooperate with the Turks in Cilicia and Anatolia. Apparently they are willing to accept French advisers.

They are not willing, it seems, to accept French or British governors.

A dispatch dated four days later announces that—

Prince Feisal, son of the King of the Hejaz, has been proclaimed King of Syria, according to advices received in Cairo from Beirut, says a dispatch to the London Times from the Egyptian capital.

An assembly of 29 Mesopotamian notables now sitting in Damascus probably will proclaim Mesopotamia a State and form a joint government with Syria under the regency of Zeid, a brother of Prince Feisal of the Hedjaz, according to the Daily Mail's Cairo correspondence.

A third dispatch from London reports that—

Official advices received recently stated that the situation in Damascus was serious. Emir Feisal, son of the King of the Hejaz, it was explained, thought it advisable to summon the Syrian Congress, which had announced its intention to declare the complete independence of the country and proclaim him King. The Emir, it was stated, succeeded temporarily in forestalling such action, procuring the postponement of the meeting of the congress, which had been called for March 6, but the excitement was said to be so great that he probably would be compelled to accede to the demands.

In my opinion the reservation offered will precipitate a controversy on this floor which will cast a doubt upon its meaning before this week has run its course. It will be held, on the one hand, that it frees us from moral, legal, and contractual obligation to carry out the guaranties imposed by the tenth article of the covenant, and, on the other hand, it will be held that it does impose guaranties, considerable or small to the point of exiguity, according to the intellectual bent or the political bias of the speaker.

The American people, aye, not only the American people but every people whose government is party to this covenant, have a supreme right to demand of the Government of the United States and of the Senate as party to any action by this Government that the terms of the obligation to be assumed shall be explicit beyond doubt; yes, even beyond challenge in any quarter. That can not be said of the terms of the reservation offered here to-day. If the Senate consent to the treaty under this reservation and the treaty be ratified, forthwith disputants will arise in America and on both sides of the Atlantic as to the degree of our obligation and as to its kind. If the Government of the United States take and uphold the view which will be upheld by my friend from Wisconsin, and, of course, with consummate ability, then other countries will hold that we have defaulted upon the obligation—countries seeking our forces, demanding that our men pour forth their blood and that our workers give up their earnings to guarantee frontiers over the whole world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my friend yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. McCORMICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have noticed in the discussion of article 10 by the distinguished Senators who are opposing the ratification of the treaty, as well as by some who are in favor of it with reservations, that they always assume an obligation upon the part of the United States to preserve the territorial integrity and the political independence of other signatories of the league, but they seem to ignore the fact that, if there is any obligation, or whatever the character of the obligation, there is none upon the other signatories to the treaty. When they talk about pouring out the blood of our sons in the defense of the territorial boundaries of other nations, they never speak about the obligation, if there is one which requires us to pour out our blood, which requires other nations to pour out their blood in the defense of territorial boundaries, whether they be territories in which we are interested or otherwise. Why is it, if the Senator will permit me, that particularly the "battalion of death"—that expression seems to be famous—in discussing——

Mr. McCORMICK. That term originally was applied to a battalion which offered itself to its country without regard to the consequences to its members.

Mr. KING. I am inclined to think that the Senator from Illinois rather claims and arrogates to himself and to those with whom he is associated too much glory in claiming to belong to a similar battalion.

Mr. McCORMICK. It was not we who so named ourselves; nor have we so referred to ourselves on this floor.

Mr. KING. I say that because I do not think the Senator from Illinois—and I speak with all friendship for him—is offering his life for his country, nor are those who are associated with him offering their lives for their country in their persistent opposition.

Mr. McCORMICK. No; it is other Senators who would offer the lives of our fellow-countrymen. It is those Senators with whom we are engaged in controversy.

Mr. KING. But to return, why is it that the Senator and those who belong to the courageous and stout-hearted band who are standing here opposing the ratification of the treaty persistently refer to the obligations which it is assumed our Government undertakes, but never refer to the obligations which other Governments assume, and seem to convey the idea that the obligations are unilateral instead of joint; that the United States assumes all of the obligations, and that other nations assume none? Is it for the purpose of beclouding the issue or trying to convey an erroneous idea to the American public as to the real meaning of the treaty?

Of course, I would disclaim the suggestion that the Senator and others would purposely do that, but is not that the effect of the attitude which they take?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, we conceive that it is our primary obligation to defend the interests of the United States. That, I know, is coming to be considered an old-fashioned point of view by those who "have awakened to the vision of a new day."

Mr. President, we refer to the obligation upon the United States because, first, it is the welfare of the United States that chiefly concerns us; secondly, because the obligation under the first sentence of the tenth article is unequivocal, absolute, and binding upon each member of the league, without regard to the measure in which it may be fulfilled by any other member of the league. Patently, the United States, as the great reservoir of fighting men and of treasure, will be the one upon which the obligation must bear most heavily, even if none of the others default, and if any of the others do, then more heavily still. Finally, sir, I would say that as between the United States and the other powers, the obligation under the tenth article is unilateral. It is entirely to their advantage, and inures not at all to ours. There is no enemy whose assault upon our frontiers we need to fear.

However much the British or the Japanese, alone or in alliance, might damage our commerce upon the high seas, there is no force which they could marshal by which invasion of our frontiers is credible, even to the apprehensions of the Senator from Utah. We do not seek—we do not need—the problematical protection of any of the powers of Europe, nor ought we to be called upon to guarantee the empire won by the sword over 500,000,000 sullen subject peoples, subjects of the three great powers—Britain, Japan, and France. This obligation runs not with the frontiers of the democracies in Europe alone, but with every frontier in the world.

Sir, it has been argued that the issue of the treaty ought not to enter into the presidential campaign; that Americans ought not to be joined in the discussion of its terms, ought not to meet in controversy over the terrible tenth article of the covenant. Therefore it is purposed that agreement should be had upon a reservation of which the best that can be said is that it will leave in doubt our obligation to send young men forth into military campaigns upon the deserts of hither Asia. In order to preclude a decision upon the treaty by the American people, it is proposed to hazard a decision upon our obligations by the council of the League of Nations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am not going to argue this reservation at length at this time. I am merely going to say a few words in reply to my friend, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Glass	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Gore	Moses	Smoot
Brandegee	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Harrison	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Henderson	Norris	Sutherland
Colt	Hitchcock	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Townsend
Dial	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Trammell
Dillingham	Kellogg	Phipps	Wadsworth
Elkins	Kenyon	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	King	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Knox	Reed	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Sheppard	Williams
Gay	Lodge	Shields

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators having answered to the roll call, there is a quorum present.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I regret the position taken by my friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. He is earnest; he is able; but I think he has taken his position hastily, without that due consideration that he is wont to give all public questions, and I feel satisfied that after giving it more thorough consideration he will see that he is not justified in the position that he has taken.

As I understood the Senator, he objects to this modification upon two grounds: First, that it changes the phraseology of the original reservation, and that he was opposed to any change in phraseology because, as he said, the country understand the original phraseology of the Lodge reservation, and they may not understand any modification of it.

Secondly, he is not certain whether this amendment does change only the form and not the substance, and he is opposed, as I understand him, to any change in the Lodge reservation upon this article, either in form or in substance. I followed him quite clearly upon that point, and what was my surprise, therefore, at the conclusion of the Senator's speech, to find him offering as a substitute for this reservation one that not only changes the form, but is so different from it that it could hardly be called a distant relation; and certainly everyone concedes that his substitute most vitally changes the substance of the original Lodge reservation.

What is the Senator's substitute? Let me read it:

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

If he had stopped there, he would have preserved the substance of the original Lodge reservation, but changed in form quite as much as the pending substitute does change the form. But he goes on:

The United States assumes no obligation to interfere in controversies between nations or to employ its military or its naval forces or its resources for any purpose under any article of the treaty.

Here he not only changes the form, but vitally changes the substance of the Lodge reservation. Under the Senator's substitute he would cut out the economic boycott under article 16, which, it has been agreed from the very beginning of this controversy, should be left; which the Senator from New Jersey heretofore has never objected to. That is saved by the Lodge reservation. But this reservation would relieve the United States from any obligation to employ the economic boycott for a violation of covenants relating to arbitration and to inquiry. So I can not understand how the Senator can longer object to the substitute because of the change of phraseology, when he himself has now proposed a substitute very much more changed in phraseology than the pending one.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is the original Lodge reservation satisfactory to the Senator?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FELINGHUYSEN. Then why change it now?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to answer the question. I am not one of those, Mr. President, who desire to see the defeat of this treaty. So long as this treaty can be Americanized with proper reservations, I am not only willing but I am anxious to make any change in phraseology that may tend to secure a sufficient number of votes to secure ratification.

I did not vote here last November for the ratification of this treaty with the Lodge reservations with the idea that I was going to fool the country, that I was hoping the treaty would be defeated, but that I would go on record as favoring it with these reservations, and I am satisfied the Senator from New Jersey did not. I am satisfied that he was sincere in believing that so long as the United States was protected by the reservations he was in favor of its ratification. My position is the same to-day. Evidently the position of the Senator from New Jersey has changed in that respect. So long as there is no surrender of the substance of the reservations, and particularly the Lodge reservation, if it will secure more votes I am willing to change the form of the reservation, and I can not understand why any friend of the treaty should not likewise be willing to do so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator consider this modification as a compromise?

Mr. LENROOT. In language only.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator believe that there is no assumption of either a moral or legal obligation under it?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and that, I think, can easily be demonstrated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator knows that there is no assumption of a moral or legal obligation under the Lodge reservation, does he not?

Mr. LENROOT. No more so than I know it under this.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But the Senator admits that there is no assumption of a moral or legal obligation under the Lodge reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is true of them both.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then what is the object of the change?

Mr. LENROOT. I think I have stated it. Of course, Mr. President, we might as well be frank about it. I will state the position of these bitter enders, and I say it in no terms of disparagement to them. It is not, in my judgment, because they believe there is any surrender of substance, because I do not believe they can possibly think that themselves. It is because they believe that by changing the phraseology enough votes can be secured to ratify this treaty. That is why they are opposed to it. I do not blame them. They are trying to kill the treaty, and that has been their intent from the very beginning. But that ought not to be persuasive with those of us who have been in favor of the ratification of the treaty, provided the interests, the liberties, and the independence of the United States are protected by reservations.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator's position to be that the substitute now offered does not in any way subtract from the Lodge reservation in principle?

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. REED. That is to say, we all agree, at least the advocates of it agree, that under the Lodge reservation we do not assume any obligation under article 10.

Mr. LENROOT. At that point may I say that that is my position? However, the Senator will remember that the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] argued at great length when the reservation to article 10 was under discussion that the obligation did remain under the Lodge reservation.

Mr. REED. That may be the position of others; it may be the position I take with reference to the treaty, not with reference to article 10. I am not trying to get into a controversy with the Senator. I am trying to get the matter cleared up.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand.

Mr. REED. I understand it to be the position of the Senator that in substance and effect the proposed substitute means exactly the same thing as the Lodge reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. And that the only change is a mere change in verbiage.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. Was the language of the Lodge reservation in any way obscure, so that it had to be clarified?

Mr. LENROOT. I did not think so. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], however, did.

Mr. REED. He takes a different view from those who are seeking to make this change. If the language of the Lodge reservation was clear, did not need to be elucidated by any change, if the principle expressed in both the reservation and the substitute for it are exactly the same, then the Senator's position is that by changing words which do not need to be changed in order to clarify it, and which in no manner change the principle, there are likely to be some additional votes for the treaty. I think that is the Senator's position. Do I state his position correctly?

Mr. LENROOT. That is the Senator's hope.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator must entertain the notion that there are some Senators on this floor who either are incapable of understanding that the language is changed without changing the substance, and therefore are going to be fooled by a change which is not a change at all, or else that there are Senators here who are not acting in very good faith, but who want some kind of a pretext or excuse for changing their votes, and therefore this is put forward as that excuse. It seems to me that is an inevitable conclusion; but it does not seem to me that it will reflect very great credit upon the gentleman who changes his vote upon either of those considerations.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that a proposition can not be stated in more than one way. While I, with others, participated in the drafting of the original Lodge reservation to article 10, I have never taken the position that we were inspired in our work in that respect, and that the same thing might not be accomplished in a different way; and if there be those who think that they would prefer or would be willing to support this reservation with it stated in different language, I would be a poor American, indeed, I would be a poor Senator of the United States, if, not changing the substance, surrendering no principle, I would stand upon language, and subject myself to the same criticism to which President Wilson has been constantly and properly subjected, that he was unwilling to accept any change in the document, either by the change of the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

So much for the position of the Senator from New Jersey. As I say, I hope he will reconsider, and when he has more thoroughly advised himself that this reservation in substance is exactly the same as the original reservation, that it will receive his support.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I do not want to take the time of the Senator, who has accused me of inconsistency because I offered a substitute to the former Lodge reservation as now modified. I presume that I got the habit, too, of writing substitutes, because that has been the occupation of all the Senators in this body ever since the Senator took a definite position himself last year upon this question. I have not changed my position. I am willing to vote for the treaty of peace with the Lodge reservation. I believe that it protects American rights. I am doubtful about these flypaper modifications that are spread over with molasses to catch flies. We understood the Lodge reservation, the country understood it, I understand it, and I am willing to vote for it.

I see nothing to be gained in changing verbiage when it is already satisfactory. The Senator himself stated that. I think the Senator, with whom I generally agree, will understand that I am making no criticism of him, only a friendly criticism, the same as he has made of me because I have offered this substitute, but the Senator said in the Senate November 19:

> Mr. President, before the vote is taken I wish to say just a word—
> Speaking on the Lodge reservation—
> Much has been said concerning compromise and negotiation. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] this evening said that as to many of the reservations it was a mere matter of form, but that the reservation upon article 10 was vital; that it cut the heart of the league.
> I want to say to the other side that that reservation, as most of the other reservations, was drawn not by the enemies of the treaty, but by its friends, and article 10 being the crucial point of difference between the two sides of the aisle, upon that article there can be no compromise, there can be no negotiation that will change the substance of that reservation. If the other side of the aisle and the President of the United States desire a ratification of the treaty, they must take the reservation upon article 10 in substantially its present form.
> That being true, there can be no advantage or good accomplished by further negotiation or talk about compromise. We might as well settle it now.

The Senator then refused any further negotiation on the Lodge reservation. He took a stand on it, and yet ever since that time he has been considering changes in this reservation and changes in the substance of it. If anyone in the Chamber is inconsistent, it is the Senator from Wisconsin and not I.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very much obliged to my friend from New Jersey for reading that quotation from the speech that I made last November. I sometimes may be inconsistent, I expect, as others are, but it so happens that in the quotation which the Senator just gave I am entirely consistent. The Senator read from what I said at that time that there could be no negotiation and no surrender upon the substance of the Lodge reservation. That is exactly my position to-day, and it has been my position from the beginning.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I interrupt the Senator further?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator has lost sight of these words:

> That being true, there can be no advantage or good accomplished by further negotiation.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator read preceding that. It has to be read with the context. I said there could be no surrender and no negotiation and no compromise upon the substance of the reservation. The Senator from Wisconsin has occupied that position from that time to this, and there is no surrender, there is no compromise upon the substance of the Lodge reservation in the pending amendment.

I am not going to argue it at length now, but I do want to say this: We are going undoubtedly to hear from the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and others—and their great ability is well known—arguments that there is a surrender; but this language is so plain in this reservation that they never will be able to convince the American people that there is the slightest surrender. In fact, as between the two, for the ordinary person who is not a lawyer to construe the two reservations it will be easier for him to construe this substitute as taking the United States out of any obligation than the original Lodge reservation, sweeping and conclusive as it is, and why?

Under this reservation we say explicitly that we assume no obligation to use the military or naval forces under article 10 or any other article of the treaty unless Congress in the exercise of full liberty of action shall so provide. Is there anyone that would say that there is the slightest semblance of an obligation left with this reservation to use our military or naval forces for any purpose under the treaty?

Then we go on to the next specification, and we assume no obligation to use the economic resources of this country under the provisions of article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country unless Congress, again in the exercise of full liberty of action, shall so provide.

Mr. KNOX. May I inquire if the Senator thinks that a reservation of full liberty of action on the part of Congress would justify Congress in repudiating an obligation which had been previously made?

Mr. LENROOT. If the obligation had been previously made for a subsequent authority to exercise full liberty of action, it might be a repudiation, but where it is made in the same instrument, where it says the United States itself does not assume and Congress, one of the departments of the United States, shall exercise full liberty of action, there is no obligation.

Mr. KNOX. If the instrument does not assume any obligation, what is the use of reserving full liberty of action on the part of Congress?

Mr. LENROOT. Because it is contended, as the Senator well knows, and with force, that where, as the original reservation read proposed by the other side, we assume no obligation to employ the military forces of the United States unless Congress should so provide, that that is merely declaring the constitutional limitation upon the executive power or the treaty-negotiating power, and that the obligation would rest upon Congress to provide the military or naval forces, but when we say Congress shall exercise full liberty of action it negatives any obligation upon Congress.

Mr. KNOX. If the Senator will allow me just one further observation, how can we take full liberty of action away from Congress? Who has the authority and power to deprive Congress of full liberty of action?

Mr. LENROOT. Because the President of the United States and the Senate of the United States may negotiate a treaty that will impose a moral obligation upon the Congress depriving it of its liberty of action.

Mr. KNOX. That, in my judgment, is just exactly what this does.

Mr. LENROOT. It does not. That is exactly what this saves us from. If it were not for the language "in the exercise of full liberty of action," the Senator might make that argument, but that language relieves Congress from any moral obligation whatever imposed by the terms of the treaty.

The same observation can be made with reference to the specified means of any form of economic discrimination. If we stop there, it might be argued that there was a form of obligation, but a release upon the part of the United States from using any means that might make the obligation effective, but we do not stop there. After these means are specified we further assume no obligation in this reservation to interfere in controversies between nations unless Congress shall assume that obligation.

I wish, before this debate is over, that some of the Senators who are attempting to defeat the treaty would explain to the Senate, even assuming that the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania is correct upon the other proposition—which I do not for a moment concede—how any obligation could arise upon us that did not involve an interference in a controversy between two or more nations? Could there be a case of external aggression that was not preceded by a controversy between the parties affected by that aggression? If we assume no obligation to interfere with controversies between nations, therefore we assume no obligation to take any action whatever.

I expect that it will be argued that enumeration of these particular means nullifies this language; but that is not so. We use the language "no obligation to interfere in controversies between nations," and that is complete in itself; but even though we do interfere in a controversy by the exercise of our good offices or otherwise, we still by this reservation say that although we do interfere we are under no obligation to use the specified means named in this reservation. So that no obligation whatever is assumed to interfere in controversies; but if we do voluntarily interfere in a controversy the reservation says that we assume no obligation to employ our military or naval forces or economic resources, or any form of economic discrimination to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. If we assume no obligation, what is the use of saying anything about it at all? If a controversy should arise between two nations, like it did between Germany and several nations, could we go into it of our own free will and accord? If we assume no obligation under this treaty, what is the use of discussing it? What is the use of having any reservation upon the subject?

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator, of course, is against the treaty, and from his position he might as well ask why any treaty at all. There is one obligation that we do assume under article 10 under this reservation, and under the original Lodge reservation, and that is the obligation to respect the territorial integrity and political independence of every other member of the league. That obligation remains under this modification as it does under the original reservation, but full liberty of action remains with the United States concerning any matter or act of external aggression in the future under this reservation, as it does under the original Lodge reservation.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator think there is any practical sense in the United States entering into a treaty to respect the rights of other nations? We are not in the habit of violating the rights of other people.

Mr. LENROOT. No; but the Senator quite well knows that there was one period in the history of our country when that charge was made against the United States with some foundation.

Mr. KNOX. When was that?

Mr. LENROOT. The war with Mexico. Does the Senator agree?

Mr. KNOX. In a very limited way.

Mr. LENROOT. Of course, we have enough matter for debate here now without going into the old Mexican War, but it did occur to me that that was an illustration in response to the Senator's question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I doubt my competency to discuss from a legal standpoint the meaning of this language. Perhaps my mind moves in a rather simple channel. What is there in this new suggested Lodge reservation which is more attractive to Senators than in the old one?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had understood the Senator from Wisconsin to indicate very clearly and in fact it is a matter of common knowledge that the reservation now proposed and which the Senator from Wisconsin is defending is going to get some votes that the other could not get, and I want to know why. We have heard that the two are exactly alike in substance, but some Senators must regard them as different.

Mr. LENROOT. I am not called upon to attempt to explain the motives of any Senator upon this floor, but I do say if there be any Senators who have heretofore voted against these reservations that are willing to yield to us the substance of them, if we were in favor of ratification last November with the reservations, we ought to be willing so long as they yield the substance to yield the form.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator understand that that is what those Senators are yielding—the form?

Mr. LENROOT. That is all they are yielding—the form.

Mr. BORAH. The Senators who are voting for the reservation are taking the form and you are taking the substance?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Well, that is a good trade.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the modification which the Senator from Wisconsin is advocating, which he claims does not differ in principle from the original Lodge reservation, should prevail and the President should file the instrument of ratification of the treaty containing that reservation the Senator would consider, would he not, that the President understood that under the modification of the Lodge reservation this Nation had accepted the obligation under article 10?

Mr. LENROOT. I did not quite follow the Senator's question, and I beg his pardon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I noticed that the Senator's attention was diverted. If the modification proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the original Lodge reservation should prevail and the President should exchange ratifications of the treaty with the modified Lodge reservation substituted for the original Lodge reservation, the Senator from Wisconsin would consider, in view of the letter which the President wrote to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], would he not, that the President considered that we had accepted the obligation imposed by article 10 of the treaty?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think that the President would exchange ratifications of the treaty, after the letter he wrote to the Senator from Nebraska, if it did not contain the obligation imposed in article 10?

Mr. LENROOT. I am not called upon to express an opinion upon that, but I do feel very clearly as to what my view of the situation would be if the President did exchange ratifications. It would be, first, that it would be only one more example of the frequent changes of mind of the President; and, secondly, it would be evidence that he desired to put the onus upon his party followers in the Senate for the defeat of the treaty and refuse to assume it himself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, that theory would involve the assumption that the President was merely playing politics in this matter. I was interested really in ascertaining, inasmuch as the Senator from Wisconsin justifies his advocacy of the change of words in this reservation upon the ground that it is actuated by his desire to have the treaty ratified; if, therefore, he considers that the President would more easily file the instrument of ratification if the change were made; and then it occurred to me whether the President, if he should file it and was acting in good faith—as, of course, I assume he is—would have to take the position, in view of his letter to the Senator from Nebraska, that the Senate had preserved the obligation under article 10, without which the President says the whole covenant of the league falls to the ground and becomes a scrap of paper.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure the Senator from Connecticut does not wish to imply that I am in the confidence of the President of the United States?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no; I do not think anybody in the Senate is. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. And, in the second place, I am not greatly concerned about what the President may do, although I hope, if the treaty is ratified here with the reservations, that he will deposit the ratifications; but I do not believe that the views of the President of the United States, whatever they may be, should control the action of the Senate upon this question, nor do I think the Senator from Connecticut believes so. We have our duty to perform, and the President has his. We have our responsibility; let him assume his.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree with that sentiment, Mr. President, and it is upon that theory that I am utterly disgusted with the spaniel movements of Senators who, like retrievers, run between this Chamber and the White House before they exercise their constitutional duty, the President having finished his, in the attempt to ascertain whether, if they do something, it will meet with his approval.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he knows of or can think of any other means by which the United States could fulfill its obligations to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other nation except the means specified in the substitute, namely, by the use of its military and naval forces, its resources, or some form of economic discrimination?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not. I want to be perfectly frank with the Senator and the Senate with regard to my views. The only other possible action which I can conceive that the President might take would be severance of diplomatic relations, and the clause assuming no obligation to interfere in controversies relieves us of any obligation to sever diplomatic relations; but, even though that were not so, any action that the United States takes must be taken with a view that that action will tend to accomplish the purpose. When we relieve ourselves of any obligation to use any of these material means to accomplish the purpose no President of the United States would say that the mere severance of diplomatic relations would preserve the territorial integrity of any other country against external aggression.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. It might be remarked in passing that Congress has no power to take from the President the right to sever diplomatic relations in any event.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. Of course, Congress can relieve the President of an obligation to do so, but I challenge any Senator, in so far as carrying out an obligation is concerned, if there were one, to state what could be done by the United States that did not involve either military or naval force, resources, or some form of economic discrimination.

Mr. STERLING. Then, Mr. President, if those are the only means that can be used in the fulfillment of our obligations, is not the reservation in substance and in effect the same as the Lodge reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly; there can be, in my humble judgment, no question about that. I would be willing to let any court pass upon that, and I am satisfied what the verdict would be.

Of course, I understand, we all understand, Mr. President, that there is going to be hairsplitting in this debate by those who are trying to defeat the treaty. These gentlemen are not considering the matter judicially in the presentation of their arguments; they are appearing as advocates, but with the ultimate purpose of defeating the treaty, for, whatever the fact is, they believe that the treaty may be ratified with this change in form. Therefore it behooves them to make it appear, if they can, that there is some change in substance. I do not charge any Senator with an attempt to mislead the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator has just charged Senators with that.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. KNOX. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was going to take exception to his language.

Mr. LENROOT. If I did, I withdraw that statement; but I was about to add that in their view of it, as, perhaps, in my view upon the other side, the attitude is not that of a judicial mind or an unprejudiced one, but a view is taken—and honestly taken—that will serve their purpose.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he believes that any Senator who conscientiously and honestly considers that this treaty is not for the good of his country, and that the treaty-making power under our Constitution can not lawfully obligate us to such a League of Nations as is formed by this treaty, can not sit down here and construe judicially a paper that has been offered here that bears upon this subject? I should dislike to have the Senator from Wisconsin entertain such a feeling as that about me.

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps the Senator from Pennsylvania is different from myself and different from human nature generally. I think it is one of the weaknesses of human nature to advocate a construction, if, in the judgment of the one so advocating, it can possibly bear that construction that is along the line of his own view.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator, then, would admit that he is subject to the same frailty?

Mr. LENROOT. I have already said so. Of course, in my argument upon the construction of this reservation everyone knows that I believe that it does fully protect the United States, and that I am for the ratification of the treaty with that protection. I assume, accordingly, that Senators will, to such extent as they may choose, discount the value of my opinion upon that subject because of that position.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator in his statement asserted that there would be a great deal of hairsplitting by those who did not want the treaty ratified and who were not in a judicial frame of mind. I trust that he will admit that those who earnestly desire the ratification of the treaty are of no more judicial frame of mind than those who do not desire its ratification. We are engaged in a contest on that question.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. They are splitting hairs themselves.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And hairsplitting and lack of judicial poise, I think, perhaps may be equally charged, if it is true of either, to both contestants when their blood is up.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be, but I think when we finish the debate upon this proposition we will leave an impartial country to judge upon which side the hairsplitting has taken place.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, yes; and we will all shake hands, like lawyers do, when it is over. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. But I am minded to say what I have said, Mr. President, for I remember that when the original Lodge reservation came up there was the same contention—that it did not protect the interests of the United States—upon the part of some of these gentlemen. They then argued that the obligation was assumed, exactly, I apprehend, as they will argue now; but now to these very gentlemen the language of the original reservation, which they so severely criticized then, has suddenly become sacred and must not be changed even in form, although when that language was before us they said that it did not accomplish the purpose. Of course, that matter will be developed, I take it, as time goes on, and I frankly say that in any further discussion I am going to attempt to justify these provisions, for I believe that they fully protect the interests of the United States; that there is no change whatever in the substance of the original reservation, and when we hear from the other side, from those especially who are bent upon defeating the treaty irrespective of the reservations, we will then be in a better position perhaps to judge where the merit lies.

I just want, in conclusion, to say, as to these criticisms, that this reservation does not fully protect the United States; that if the Senators who are criticizing it will vote for the Lodge reservation as it is, and then vote to ratify the treaty with the Lodge reservations, I am willing to go back to the original Lodge reservation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, when a Senator is arguing for a straightforward, veracious, and intelligible set of words by which to express the idea of the United States Senate in a great international document, the question is not whether, when that certain expression of words has been added to an instrument, the framer of the expression of words will then vote for the instrument. Those who intend to vote against this treaty when it is perfected have just as good a right to express their views about the reservations to be attached to it as the Senators who intend to vote to ratify the treaty. Although I intend to vote against the ratification of this treaty, if the proponents of ratification have their way and drag us into this European combination of powers against our will, I am just as much interested in having a proper set of safeguards on that treaty as I would be if I were going to vote for it. If we are to be drawn in, the country is just as much interested in having the proper reservations on the treaty as it is in its ratification.

Mr. President, in my view of the matter, when the Senate, after due consideration, by a majority has determined upon a reservation which adequately expresses the view of the majority of the Senate, it is a pitiable exhibition for Senators to stand here for days in an effort to contrive a set of "weasel words" so adjusted, punctuated, and related to each other as that they may be slipped through the Senate more easily and get a few more votes, for the purpose of meaning one thing to this section of Senators, and another thing to another section of Senators, and a third thing to the President, who has said upon what conditions he would ratify the treaty, and perhaps a fourth thing to our partners in the league. What sort of an exhibition is that for United States Senators to be engaged in?

If it is true that the Lodge reservation, as agreed to by the Senate last November, expresses exactly the views contained in the proposed artfully contrived set of readjusted sentences, why, in the name of Heaven, offer that here as a substitute? I do not believe that the ordinary, common-sense, straightforward American voter wants to be trifled with in that way.

What would anybody think of taking a square declaration, such as is contained in article 10, in which we are designed to be the saviors of civilization, and in which we solemnly agree to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of all our associated partners in this great international concern, and hitching onto it a set of words leaving that declaration standing and then saying: "But in the preservation of your territorial integrity and your political independence we shall not use troops, we shall not use economic pressure, we shall not use trade discrimination, we shall not intervene in the controversies of any nation. After assuming the obligation, we intentionally deny any means by which it may possibly be executed."

Is that the talk of honest men? Is that fair and square between man and man when it is publicly avowed here by the advocates of this change that it is not a change at all, that it is simply a new form of words designed to catch four more votes, under an interpretation placed upon it by the four gulls who are to walk into the springe, like woodcock—that it is a change in principle? What sort of good faith is that to be evidenced by half of the treaty-making power to those who are to be deceived by it as our partners?

Here is a definite pledge to preserve the territorial integrity and political independence of the members of the league. That has to be redeemed, or else it had better be disavowed and not taken. What would you think of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] if he should take my note for $100 down to the Riggs Bank and write on the back of it: "I guarantee payment of the within note, but in doing so I want it distinctly understood that I am not to pay in gold certificates, or silver certificates, or silver dollars, or any obligations of the United States, or in any legal-tender currency; and, reserving full liberty of action for myself under all the circumstances of each particular and specific case as it may arise in the future, I hereby and with this reservation cheerfully, heartily, cordially, and sincerely indorse this note"? [Laughter.] And yet we are the preachers of the dawning of the new day and the establishment of a new international morality!

What went ye out into the wilderness to see? A reed shaken with the wind?

A coyote quivering behind the bushes or an independent nation of 110,000,000 citizens, looking the world in the eye, and either guaranteeing something or declining to do it?

I am sick of this tiptoeing around, Mr. President. I do not see why we have not the courage either to ratify this treaty or to decline to ratify it. If we are going to ratify it with reservations, as a matter of self-respect to ourselves and to the country, with knowledge that history is going to be written in the future, let us consider how men, unprejudiced by party passions, and having only in their hearts the pride of looking back upon the unsullied career of their country and their flag, will look at this piece of legerdemain if the Senate now should decide to recede from its fair and square declaration, intelligible to all the world, and to adopt a device by which one part of the treaty-making power, composed of different factions, will all understand a set of words in their own way, and the other part of the treaty-making power in the White House will understand it in a different way? What is history going to say of that sort of a proceeding?

It does seem to me that good faith and square dealing, which used to be our motto a few years ago, and I hope we have not yet fallen from that ideal—this being the age of ideals—require that we should express our intent so that he who runs may read, as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] said. Let us not leave this to dialecticians and to the sophistical and casuistical interpretations of men who speak different languages all over the world.

The official copy of this treaty is in French. I wonder how some French linguist will translate and interpret this set of assorted words if it should be written into the treaty. What will be his first step? Why, he will say: "This appears to me to be a contradiction in terms. To guarantee to preserve our territorial integrity, and then in the next sentence to say, 'We will not interfere in a controversy where any territorial integrity is assaulted,' seems to me to be a contradiction in terms, and an effort to write one kind of language on one side of a sheet of paper, and then write the contrary on the other side of the sheet, and then throw it into the scales so that the poise will not move on the beam, so that it will register zero."

How are they to determine it when they translate it into French and German and Spanish and the language of all the other members of this league? What will be the first thing they will do? They will say, "Why, let us go to the official debates of the Senate. Let us see what the man who offered the amendment said in its favor. Let us see what the other Senators thought it meant." That will be one method by which they will interpret it, and God help them when they commence to review this debate with the idea of finding out what this meant! [Laughter.] I think they would all say, "We are a great deal better off with a League of Nations in Europe to look after the questions with which we are familiar, and in which we are concerned, than to have this babel of tongues from 3,000 miles away, in a league consisting of all the nations of the world, with this announcement finally from the highest legislative body in their land to be an ever-present help in time of trouble."

Mr. President, that is all there is to this thing. It is a mere device. I will not say that it is not offered in good faith, because it is; but the good faith in which it is offered is simply the good faith of an effort to get three or four more votes on the ground that it has not changed the principle. That good faith consists, as the Senator from Missouri has so well stated, in the fact that the three or four more Senators who are utterly bewildered by this camouflage and inextricable maze of words are to be fooled into voting for something that here and now they say they understand differently from the man who proposes it in good faith. God forfend that this Nation should ever write such a miserable subterfuge into a great international guaranty of good faith!

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is not often that I agree with anything political that is said by my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], though I am most friendly toward him personally. But I want to indorse his illustration about the note for $100. I think his illustration much in point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator want to indorse the note?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be delighted to do so. Then with the indorsement of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] it would make a gilt-edge security. It would have the effect for which it was intended. But, just as the Senator from Connecticut said, the indorsement must be a genuine indorsement, without any reservations or conditions or any surplus words of any sort in connection with it. In other words, it must be an unconditional obligation in writing to pay. That is the only kind of indorsement that makes it good, as we lawyers know.

Mr. President, that is just what article 10 is. If we indorse article 10 as it is written, it will be an unconditional guarantee of peace, and we will have a treaty of peace that means something. It is the only article of the league that has real force behind it, and it has the force and it has the punch; and, to use the illustration of the Senator from Connecticut, if it is indorsed unequivocally by this body it will preserve the peace of the world, and we all know it. Put conditions to it, and like a conditional indorsement of a note it is to all practical purposes valueless.

I want here to refer to the remarks of my distinguished friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who read into the RECORD a telegram received from the Louisville Courier-Journal advising us Democrats to surrender and accept the Lodge reservations.

Mr. THOMAS. I assume the Senator from Tennessee got one also?

Mr. McKELLAR. I got one also. I materially differ from the Senator from Colorado in reference to his views on that telegram, and right here and now I am going to read my reply. It is as follows:

MARCH 12, 1920.

COURIER-JOURNAL,
Louisville, Ky.:

Telegram received. Democrats on bipartisan committee engaged in an endeavor to compromise offered everything except surrender on article 10, and their offers were refused. Republicans insist that the obligation of article 10 be destroyed, and are willing to ratify only on its destruction. This is the only article which makes the league really effective in enforcing peace. Everybody knows this. I believe it would be better for us not to be in the league than to destroy the obligation of article 10. The whole world knows that President Wilson and his friends in the Senate are for the league, and the whole world knows that a large majority of the Republicans in the Senate are against the league and that their so-called reservations nullify it. The issue before the people, therefore, will be plain. Generally speaking, those who believe in the league will vote the Democratic ticket and those who are against the league will vote the Republican ticket. A cleaner-cut issue can not be had. The people are not going to be misled into a controversy over reservations. They will understand, as we all do, that the purpose of these reservations was to strangle the peace pact which President Wilson had made and to kill America's influence in the league, and that they were put forward by the enemies of the league and not by its friends. I was on the bipartisan committee and intensely desirous of compromise. I would compromise now, so anxious am I to see the treaty and league ratified, but I shall not surrender to those who would make the league a vain thing and America's participation in it a mockery. The Republicans are in absolute control of the Senate. They have been talking against the league for nearly 15 months. Everybody knows that if they had really wanted to ratify it, it would have been ratified long since, inasmuch as nearly all the Democrats have been for it all the time.

That telegram, Mr. President, in answer to the Courier-Journal, gives my views about this matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I interrupt the Senator merely for an observation which does not apply to the telegram. Perhaps the Senator could help me find out what I tried to find out from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. I asked the Senator from Wisconsin what was in this last reservation that was more desirable than the original Lodge reservation, and how it was, as we have been told, that it would get more votes than the Lodge reservation would receive. I did not know but that the Senator could give us some information about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. About whether it would get more votes or not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am unadvised as to how many votes it will get. I am rather inclined to agree again, for the second time in many months, with my distinguished friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. I think that vote getting was probably its only purpose, and I do not think it has changed the meaning of the reservation to any very great extent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. To any very great extent?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But to a little extent?

Mr. McKELLAR. Possibly so. I am rather inclined to think it does, in a very modified way.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would be very glad if the Senator would explain that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I say that with reservations. I think the matter of the difference in this verbiage or language is so delicate that any gentleman, if he is careful of his reputation, in attempting to explain any difference in meaning it may have should be a little careful to make reservations as he goes along.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is getting more and more mysterious. Will not the Senator specify what that little difference is?

Mr. McKELLAR. To be perfectly frank, I think it takes a man with a more discriminating mind than mine to tell what the difference is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator must suspect something, though.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not suspect enough to make me vote for it, I am frank to say to the Senator, because I expect to vote against it. Like the Senator from Wisconsin, I think substantially it means the same thing as the original Lodge reservation, and for that reason I am going to vote against it. I believe that it destroys the obligation of article 10, and I do not believe the obligation of article 10 ought to be destroyed.

It is the simplest thing in the world. That master mind in your own party, a man to whom America has given many honors, a man the memory of whom America holds in the greatest respect, Theodore Roosevelt, put exactly the same provision as article 10 in the Panama treaty in 1903, as I remember, when he guaranteed the independence of Panama, and, of course, no one has sought to interfere with Panama since, and never will. Why? Because any nation that undertakes to interfere with the independence of Panama will have to fight the United States. So, when the great nations of the world put into this treaty the solemn obligation that if the territorial integrity of any other nation is interfered with the offending nation will have to deal with all the great nations of the world, it is going to have exactly the same effect as our putting it into the Panama treaty. It will deter any other nations from attempting to interfere with the territorial integrity of the nation assailed. Article 10 merely enlarges the scope of article 1 of the Panama treaty negotiated by President Roosevelt.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCORMICK. I trust that the Senator will permit me to remind him that it is those who opposed Theodore Roosevelt, those whose cold jealousy forbade the country his service during the war, who quote him in support of this treaty. None of those who supported him have done so. In so far as he spoke or wrote upon this subject before he died he defined a position which would forbid any support of the terms of this covenant.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am much obliged to the Senator for the interruption. Of course, the Senator must know that I voted to send Col. Roosevelt to France at the head of a division of troops during the war. I am an admirer of the distinguished ex-President.

I have noticed this, Mr. President, from my historical reading, that President Wilson is not the only President of the United States who has accomplished great things for his country who has been assailed in his lifetime by political and other kinds of opponents. Even Theodore Roosevelt was assailed, and he was one of the greatest of Americans. But to-day I am going to refer specifically only to two illustrious examples in our country's history. I am going to refer to the career of Mr. Washington and the career of Mr. Lincoln, one of whom served two terms and another served a term and a part of a term. Both of these Presidents, as much as we revere their memories to-day, were assailed during their terms of office, just as President Wilson is being assailed to-day; and I want to call the attention of the Senate and the country to some of the infamously false charges then made against the Father of his Country and our martyred President.

I am reading from an article recently published by Mr. Theodore Price, of New York City, and from time to time may make comments upon Mr. Price's article.

The vociferous vigor with which Woodrow Wilson is now being assailed as an "usurper" by some who disagree with him recalls the attacks that were made on Washington and Lincoln, both of whom were also reviled as "usurpers." Perhaps it may reassure those who are at times disturbed by the bitterness of the President's opponents to read again the story of the malignant attacks that his two great predecessors had to meet as they led the Nation through previous crises in its history.

Curiously enough Senator LODGE, who is one of the chief antagonists of the administration, wrote a "Life of Washington," in which he deals at length with what his detractors had to say of the Father of his Country. He says:

> In his lifetime Washington had his enemies and detractors in abundance. During the Revolution he was abused and intrigued against, thwarted and belittled, to a point which posterity in general scarcely realizes. Final and conclusive victory brought an end to this, and he passed to the Presidency amid a general acclaim. Then the attacks began again. Their character has been shown in a previous chapter, but they were of no real moment except as illustrations of the existence and meaning of party divisions. The ravings of Bache and Freneau, and the coarse insults of Giles, were all totally unimportant in themselves. They merely define the purposes and character of the party which opposed Washington, and but for him would be forgotten. Among his eminent contemporaries, Jefferson and Pickering, bitterly opposed in all things else, have left memoranda and letters reflecting upon the abilities of their former chief. Jefferson disliked him because he blocked his path, but with habitual caution he never proceeded beyond a covert sneer, implying that Washington's mental powers, at no time very great, were impaired by age during his Presidency, and that he was easily deceived by practiced intriguers. Pickering, with more boldness, set Washington down as commonplace, not original in his thought, and vastly inferior to Hamilton, apparently because he was not violent, and did not make up his mind before he knew the facts.

Then, telling of the Democratic opposition to the treaty with Great Britain negotiated by Washington in 1795, LODGE says:

> Their (the Democratic) orators did not hesitate to say that the conduct of the President in this affair had been improper and monarchical and that he ought to be impeached.

After the treaty had been signed a New York newspaper, the Aurora, declared that the President had violated the Constitution, and made a treaty with a nation abhorred by our people; that he answered the respectful remonstrances of Boston and New York as if he were the omnipotent director of a seraglio, and had thundered contempt upon the people with as much confidence as if he sat upon the throne of Industan.

How similar, Mr. President, are the maledictions that are being hurled at President Wilson by Senators in this body and by representatives of the press in this country.

Commenting on this, Senator LODGE says:

> It is not probable that the writer of the brilliant diatribe just quoted had any very distinct idea about either seraglios or "Industan," but he, and others of like mind, probably took pleasure in the words, as did the old woman who always loved to hear Mesopotamia mentioned. Other persons, however, were more definite in their statements. John Beckley, who had once been Clerk of the House, writing under the very opposite signature of "A Calm Observer," declared that Washington had been overdrawing his salary in defiance of law, and had actually stolen in this way $4,750—

How like a speech that we not long ago listened to right in this body on the other side of the aisle! The more recent speech against Wilson sounds almost like a plagiarism—

> Such being the case, the "Calm Observer" very naturally inquired: "What will posterity say of the man who has done this thing? Will it not say that the mask of political hypocrisy has been worn by Caesar, by Cromwell, and by Washington?"

Again, how like another description of President Wilson recently uttered in this body:

> Another patriot, also of the Democratic Party, declared that the President had been false to a republican Government. He said that Washington maintained the seclusion of a monk and the supercilious distance of a tyrant, and that the concealing carriage drawn by supernumerary horses expressed the will of the President and defined the loyal duty of the people.

Again, I say, how like the expressions that are used about Woodrow Wilson almost daily in this body. Some of them might have been copied from these statements made against George Washington.

In February, 1796, 13 months before Washington's retirement, the House of Representatives refused to adjourn on his birthday for half an hour, in order to go and pay him their respects, as had been the pleasant custom up to that time. The Democrats of that day were in no confusion of mind as to the party to which Washington belonged and they did not hesitate to put this deliberate slight upon him in order to make their dislike apparent. This was not the action of a partisan mob, but the well-considered procedure of the representatives of a parfy in Congress, and on March 6, 1797, two days after Washington's final retirement from the Presidency, the Aurora printed the following editorial:

This is written of Washington, not of Wilson.

> "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace," was the pious ejaculation of a pious man who beheld a flood of happiness rushing in upon mankind. . . . If ever there was a time that would license the reiteration of the ejaculation, that time has now arrived, for the man who is the source of all the misfortune of our country is this day reduced to a level with his fellow citizens and is no longer possessed of power to multiply evils upon the United States. If ever there was a period for rejoicing, this is the moment. Every heart in unison with the freedom and happiness of the people ought to beat high with exultation that the name of Washington ceases from this day to give currency to political insults and to legalize corruption. A new era is now opening upon us, an era which promises much to the people, for public measures must now stand upon their own merits, and nefarious projects can no longer be supported by a name. When a retrospect has been taken of the Washingtonian administration for eight years it is a subject of the greatest astonishment that a single individual should have cankered the principles of republicanism in an enlightened people just emerged from the gulf of despotism, and should have carried his designs against the public liberty so far as to have put in jeopardy its very existence. Such, however, are the facts, and with these staring us in the face, the day ought to be a jubilee in the United States.

Commenting upon this editorial, Senator LODGE says:

This was not the outburst of a single malevolent spirit. The article was copied and imitated in New York and Boston and wherever the party that called Jefferson leader had a representative among the newspapers. It is not probable that stuff of this sort gave Washington himself a moment's anxiety—

I might stop here long enough to say not more anxiety than stuff of the same sort is now causing President Wilson in the White House—for he knew too well what he had done, and he was too sure of his own hold upon the hearts of the people to be in the least disturbed by the attacks of hostile editors. But the extracts are of interest as showing that the opposition party of that time, the party organized and led by Jefferson, regarded Washington as their worst enemy, and assailed him and slandered him to the utmost. They even went so far as to borrow materials from the enemies of the country with whom we had lately been at war by publishing the forged letters attributed to Washington, and circulated by the British in 1777, in order to discredit the American general. One of Washington's last acts, on March 3, 1797, was to file in the State Department a solemn declaration that these letters, then republished by an American political party, were base forgeries of English origin in a time of war.

And in a paragraph which the Senator might perhaps reread with profit to-day he comments upon Washington's unshaken hold upon the masses in the following words:

Yet despite all these attacks there can be no doubt that Washington's hold upon the masses of the people was unshaken. They would have gladly seen him assume the Presidency for the third time, and if the test had been made thousands of men who gave their votes to the opposition would have still supported him for the greatest office in their gift. But this time Washington would not yield to the wishes of his friends or of the country. He felt that he had done his work and earned the rest and the privacy for which he longed above all earthly things. In September, 1796, he published his farewell address, and no man ever left a nobler political testament. Through much tribulation he had done his great part in establishing the Government of the Union, which might easily have come to naught without his commanding influence. He had imparted to it the dignity of his own great character. He had sustained the splendid financial policy of Hamilton. He had struck a fatal blow at the colonial spirit in our politics, and had lifted up our foreign policy to a plane worthy of an independent nation. He had stricken off the fetters which impeded the march of western settlement, and without loss of honor had gained time to enable our institutions to harden and become strong. He had made peace with our most dangerous enemies, and, except in the case of France, where there were perilous complications to be solved by his successor, he left the United States in far better and more honorable relations with the rest of the world than even the most sanguine would have dared to hope when the Constitution was formed.

I am going to stop here long enough to say that the same could be said of President Wilson, who is being so bitterly assailed to-day, for it was under his leadership that the United States has won the greatest war in all the history of time. It is under his leadership that the United States to-day is enjoying the greatest prosperity not only that this country has ever enjoyed but that any civilized country under the sun has ever enjoyed, and we all know it. It was under his leadership that there was enacted the greatest banking system that was ever established in all the world, sufficient not only to finance us in the most expensive war we have ever known but sufficient to finance the world. You Republicans had been trying for 50 years to establish such a system and had utterly failed.

You can take our merchants and they are making more profits in the last seven years than ever before in their lives. You can take our laboring men in the last seven years and they have made more wages than in any seven years in their entire lives. You can take our farmers and they have gotten more for their products than ever before in the same period. You can take our banks and other business institutions and they have been more prosperous than ever before. The whole country has never had such prosperity as it has had in the last seven years, and the only offense Mr. Wilson has committed is that he has been at the head of the Government while this has been going on. He ought to be crucified for giving to America her greatest prosperity!

In his life of Washington Sparks tells much the same story, and Washington Irving confirms it in his biography, but it is related in greatest detail in the chapter on "Slanderers of Washington" that is to be found in McMaster's History of the People of the United States in the volume covering Washington's administrations.

Those who are shocked by the virulence with which President Wilson is being attacked to-day should read this chapter. They will be comforted, for Washington was accused time and time again not only of violating the Constitution and trying to set up an autocracy and an aristocracy but of "debauching the country," "seeking a crown," and "trying to pass himself off as an honest man."

One libeler took great pains to prove that the President had committed murder. Benajmin Franklin Bache reprinted a series of letters which many years before had been forged and published under Washington's name. Bache says that when Fort Lee surrendered a mulatto servant of Gen. Washington fell into the hands of the British. With him came a portmanteau, and in the portmanteau were seven letters. Some were addressed to Mr. Lund Washington, some to John Parke Custis, and one to Mrs. Washington. In them Washington was represented as looking on the cause of the Colonies as hopeless and lost. Both the story and the letters were false. The servant had never for a moment been in British hands. Not one of the letters had come from the general's pen. Yet now, after 19 years of oblivion, the slander was again spread before the country. Washington was deeply hurt, and as the 4th of March approached drew up and placed in the hands of the Secretary of State a solemn declaration that not one of the letters was his.

Meantime Thomas Paine, famous as an infidel and the author of the "Rights of Man," had fled to France, where he joined in the French Revolution and entertained himself the while by writing pamphlets attacking Washington as chiefly inspired by "a sort of nondescribable, chameleon-colored thing called prudence," which was in many cases a substitute for principle and indistinguishable from hypocrisy. He alleged that "once in the presidential office the natural ingratitude of Washington's character appeared, and that he assumed the merit of everything to himself, swallowed the grossest adulation, traveled America from end to end to put himself in the way of receiving it, had in his chest as many addresses as James II, and had supported monopolies of every kind from the moment his administration began." The gist of this attack was given in one sentence:

And as for you, sir, treacherous in private friendship (for so you have been to me, and that in the day of danger), and a hypocrite in public life, the world will be puzzled to decide whether you are an apostate or an imposter; whether you have abandoned good principles or whether you ever had any.

Those words were spoken by Thomas Paine of the man whom the whole world reveres to-day.

But the attacks upon Washington were mild when compared with those of which Abraham Lincoln was the object. On the floor of Congress he was again and again assailed as a "tyrant," "a usurper," and "a despot as absolute as the Czars of Russia."

Again, we find the words that are being so commonly used to-day against President Wilson by those who would defame him. Senator after Senator charged that for much less arbitrary acts Kings of England and France had lost their heads. One of them termed Lincoln "the most weak and imbecile man" he had ever met. I am quoting from history about Lincoln. I am not quoting from speeches of Senators on this floor about Wilson. One of them termed Lincoln "the most weak and imbecile man" he had ever met. Benjamin R. Curtis, a former justice of the United States Supreme Court, described Lincoln's powers as "a military despotism" (Curtis pamphlet on Executive Power, Oct. 18, 1862), and Joel Parker, a former chief justice of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, wrote, November 1, 1862, that—

The President is not only a monarch, but that he is an absolute, irresponsible, uncontrollable Government; a perfect military despotism.

I stop here long enough to wonder whether the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who was assailing the President for alleged physical and mental disability the other day, did not copy in substance some of the language that was here used about Abraham Lincoln. It sounds very much like him. Is it possible that even illness will not soften the bitter malice of partisanship? A foreign observer, Schleiden, wrote to Charles Sumner:

One of the most interesting features of the present state of things is the illimited power exercised by the Government. Mr. Lincoln is, in that respect, the equal, if not the superior, of Louis Napoleon. The difference consists only in the fact that the President rests his authority on the unanimous consent of the people of the loyal States, the Emperor his on the army. (Rhodes's History of the United States, III, p. 442.)

And I am reminded of another speech in the Senate, which undertook to show that President Wilson was not honest. I call the attention of our friends to this letter of September 23, 1864.

On September 23, 1864, under the heading "Is Mr. Lincoln Honest?" the New York World printed the following editorial:

The greatest claim of Mr. Lincoln to the confidence and support of the people has been his reputation for honesty. Strip him of this and there is nothing left but vacillation, imbecility, and obscene jesting. Will this claim of honesty bear examination? The very prefix of "honest" to a man's name indicates that he will bear watching. Robespierre caused himself to be called "the incorruptible." Henry Clay said that "Honest John Davis" (of Massachusetts) meant "Canny John Davis." What does it mean with Mr. Lincoln? Let us look at Mr. Lincoln's honesty. He held on to Secretary Cameron until compelled by public indignation to remove him. Secretary Floyd was a pigmy to Mr. Cameron in speculation. And yet Mr. Lincoln, knowing all about Cameron, sent him to Russia, compelling the Emperor (the only potentate in Europe who had been our friend) to consort with this disgraced Cabinet minister. Moreover, the President sent his own private carriage to take this ex-Secretary to the White House and offered to send him to Russia in a frigate when the Nashville was committing her depredations and we had not successfully blockaded a single southern port. Furthermore, Mr. Cameron is now managing the Pennsylvania election for Mr. Lincoln and disbursing the secret-service fund.

If Mr. Lincoln is "honest," why has he taken such pains to give to his personal friends letters to generals commanding departments ordering them by his signature to permit these friends to go whither they choose and to get out what cotton they can?

I digress long enough to say that I resent this base calumny upon the fame of Mr. Lincoln. I am a southern man; born with all the prejudices, perhaps, of a southern man, for I belong to the old régime; but say to you now, in all honesty and fairness, that such a statement about the President of the United States at that time—Mr. Lincoln—is one of the basest and most awful calumnies that were ever uttered out of the mouth of man. It is not baser, however, than some of the utterances which have been made against Mr. Wilson recently, which are just as entirely without foundation. Must true greatness ever be the victim of malicious abuse? I continue to read:

If Mr. Lincoln is "honest," why has he, for friends of worse than doubtful reputation, requested contracts and special trading privileges?

If Mr. Lincoln is "honest," why has Master "Bob" Lincoln had a share in the profits of Senator ———'s and Senator ———'s cotton expeditions, whereby he has been enabled to outshine shoddy itself at Saratoga this summer?

I am again reminded of a speech made in the Senate not long ago in reference to the President's shining in Paris; and the one statement is just as baseless and inaccurate as is the other.

If Mr. Lincoln is "honest," why does he pay himself his salary in gold certificates when other creditors have to content themselves with depreciated greenbacks?

If Mr. Lincoln is "honest," why was the McKinstry court-martial dissolved immediately after the evidence had traced $90,000 into the hands of a female relative of Mr. Lincoln's sister? Did our "honest" President fear lest the public might push the inquiries nearer home?

How can an American citizen thus write about a great man like Lincoln, false and untrue as every one of us knows such statements to be? And false and untrue as they were, so are the statements which are now being made about the present President of the United States in like manner false and untrue.

The President went himself, as was his right and duty to do, and negotiated the best peace terms he could get. His voice and his influence and his power were always on the side of the just and right. All the world acclaimed him as the unselfish and just arbitrator in every settlement at the peace table. The whole world, except a majority of 1 in the United States Senate, was willing to accept his decisions as to fair dealing between nations. And yet this majority in the Senate, as I believe being moved more by partisanship than by patriotism, has for nearly a year been fighting this just settlement and abusing this just man simply because he is a Democrat and not a Republican. In my judgment, if a Republican had negotiated this treaty every one of the 49 Republicans would have been for it, irreconcilables and all.

This was followed on the 1st of October of the same year with another editorial attack under the caption "The ambitious buffoon," in which the man so revered to-day is thus assailed:

Some time ago we took occasion to say that Mr. Lincoln was a buffoon, whereat mightily shocked were the sweet-mouthed Republican organs. We brought forward some evidence that Lincoln is a buffoon, and have ever since waited for a reply. Here it is again. Will somebody undertake its rebuttal?

If to prove publicly therefore now in this crisis of our politics and of the Nation's fortunes, that Mr. Lincoln is a buffoon—that is, "a person who makes sport by low jests"—will prevent any number of votes, no matter how few, from being cast for his reelection, then that proof is a public duty; and mere questions of decorum must stand aside as trivial and untimely.

How like the statements that are being constantly hurled at the sick President of the United States to-day! Men have no mercy in their souls for the man who has given to America the very leading place among all the nations of the earth. When we went into the war under the leadership of Mr. Wilson we were admittedly in the third place among the nations; to-day we are in the first place; and yet Americans who claim to be patriotic are devoting the most of their time and their talents to abusing and traducing the man who is more responsible for our success in the late war than is any other man in the country. While we were in the war Mr. Wilson was the greatest of leaders and patriots. No one applauded him more than our Republican friends. All he did while the war was going on was in their eyes exactly right. They got into power in 1918 by saying they had supported him more loyally than the Democrats. But as soon as the war was over, in the twinkling of an eye all this was changed, and Mr. Wilson became the worst man in the world. The truth is they do not believe this themselves in their hearts. But I proceed further.

And now for the proof that Mr. Lincoln is a buffoon, we appeal to every man of good sense and intelligence whom public or private duties have taken to the White House frequently during the last three years.

We appeal to all the gentlemen on the Republican side of the United States Senate.

We appeal to that Republican Senator whose self-respect would not permit him to stay in Mr. Lincoln's presence and hear from his lips the language which he was there compelled to hear.

We appeal to the 150 clergymen who went in a body to the East Room, in order to present to Mr. Lincoln the resolution of one of the largest and most respectable religious denominations.

We appeal to the eminent divine who was deputed to make their address, and who has publicly and repeatedly pronounced the President's deportment on the occasion the deportment of a "buffoon and a gawk," so sickening in its offensiveness, and so humiliating to his patriotic pride, as to have made him quite despair of the fortunes of a Republic whose helm is in such hands.

We appeal to the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House of Representatives. Let the Tribune ask them what is the fact.

We appeal to the blackguards there—for such there are on that floor, though few—whose staple of talk in their midnight orgies is the low and obscene stories daily retailed to them in the chamber of the Chief Magistrate.

We appeal to the gentlemen who fêted Mr. Lincoln here and escorted him to the clubs when he last visited New York.

We appeal to that eminent Republican who left the room where the future President was recounting some experiences of his earlier life rather than that his ears should be defiled with the echoes of such filthiness.

We appeal to the staff officers who galloped behind the President when he visited the battle field of Antietam, and who increased their distance from him rather than listen longer to the low nigger song of "Picayune Butler" which Mr. Lincoln called on Marshal Lamon to sing as he rode among the fresh graves and trenches where were buried the 10,000 dead soldiers of the Republic.

A series of editorials in the same paper, which was then supporting Gen. McClellan for the Presidency, were headed "Mr. Lincoln—has he or has he not an interest in the profits of public contracts?" The question was answered affirmatively—by implication, at least—and followed by a final fling at him as responsible for the high prices then ruling in the following:

If Mr. Lincoln's three years' misrule has run up the price of coal to $15; flour, $16; butter, 60 cents; coffee, 69 cents; clothing to five times its former price—and everything that the people eat, drink, and wear in a similar proportion—what will be their prices if Mr. Lincoln is reelected? Under McClellan and a Democratic administration the people will once more be able to live as in times past, on cheap coal, cheap flour, cheap coffee, cheap clothing, and cheap everything that they want. In other words, $1 of real money will buy as much as $4 of greenbacks.

At the Democratic national convention in Chicago McClellan was nominated for the Presidency. Many of the speakers were absolutely unrestrained in the violence with which they attacked Lincoln. S. S. Cox, later nicknamed "Sunset," delivered an address in which he said:

Abraham Lincoln has deluged the country with blood, created a debt of four thousand million dollars, and sacrificed 2,000,000 of human lives. At the November election we will damn him with eternal infamy. Even Jefferson Davis is no greater enemy of the Constitution.

A Michigan Congressman named John Fuller asked:

Are you willing to follow in the footsteps of Abraham Lincoln, the perjured wretch who has violated the oath he took before high heaven to support the Constitution and preserve the liberties of the people?

Congressman Stambaugh, of Ohio, declared:

You might search hell over and find none worse than Abraham Lincoln.

And the Hon. Henry Clay Deam, of Iowa, made an oration from which the following quotation is taken:

The American people are ruled by felons. With all his vast armies Lincoln has failed, failed, failed.

I pause here long enough to hear the cry that is being raised to-day by our Republican friends that we failed in the war—that England really won it, or that France really won it. What kind of Americans have our friends become? There have been, I think, 67 investigating committees appointed by this Republican Congress to see if they could not find 15 cents somewhere that had been misspent in the prosecution of the war, and I understand they have already expended more than $2,000,000 in the vain endeavor to find out some mistake of the administration at whose head is President Wilson. Do you really think that the American people are going to pay any attention to the little mistakes that were made in the prosecution of the war? If you do, you are going to be woefully mistaken. Of course we made mistakes. But we won the war! Is that not enough? And we won it under the leadership of President Wilson; and all your efforts to take from him the credit will prove in vain. But I continue:

And still the monster usurper wants more victims for his slaughter pens. I blush that such a felon should occupy the highest gift of the people. Perjury and larceny are written all over him. Ever since the usurper, traitor, and tyrant has occupied the presidential chair the Republican Party has shouted war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt. Blood has flowed in torrents, and yet the thirst of the old monster is not quenched. His cry is ever for more blood.

Horace Greeley's petulant faultfinding with Lincoln in the columns of the Tribune will be recalled by all students of the history of the Civil War and need not be reprinted. The editor of the Tribune continued these attacks until the President finally silenced him with his famous letter of August 22, 1862.

Now, I wish to read what Mr. Lincoln himself said in answer to these infamous traducers of his. This letter is written, I believe, to Mr. Greeley, although it is not so stated:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, August 22, 1862.

DEAR SIR: I have just read yours of the 19th addressed to myself to the New York Tribune. If there be in it any statements or assumptions of fact which I may know to be erroneous, I do not now and here controvert them.

He was silent under them. He knew what he had done for this country, he knew these attacks were false, and he says, "Though I may know that they are false, I do not controvert them."

If there be in it any inferences which I may believe to be falsely drawn, I do not now and here argue against them. If there be perceptible in it any impatient and dictatorial tone, I waive it in deference to an old friend whose heart I have always supposed to be right.

This is the man, Senators, who was abused as a "low, obscene buffoon" by men whose memories have long since faded into insignificance or have been buried by the dust of oblivion.

As to the policy I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, I have not meant to leave anyone in doubt.

I would save the Union. I would save it the shortest way under the Constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will be "the Union as it was." If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time save slavery, I do not agree with them. If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery.

If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all of the slaves, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save the Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views as fast as they shall appear to be true views.

I have here stated my purpose according to my view of official duty; and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men everywhere could be free.

Yours,
A. LINCOLN.

It is, however, worth remarking that it was not until after Gettysburg, when the war had been really won, that the cabal against Lincoln took organized form and the opposition to the man who had saved the Union became most venomous and bitter.

And so it is that after the greatest World War that ever took place has been won, we find the greatest bitterness, the greatest reproach, the greatest abuse hurled at the man who was our leader during that war. For shame, Senators on both sides of the aisle! Can we afford to let partisanship lead us further to such lengths?

On August 5, 1864, Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, Republican leader of the Senate, and Henry Winter Davis, one of the Republican leaders of the House, issued the following manifesto to the people:

The supporters of the administration are responsible to the country for its conduct and it is their right and duty to check the encroachments of the Executive on the authority of Congress and to require it to confine itself to its proper sphere.

Oh, how often has that been repeated in the 15 months of debate we have had about this treaty, almost daily—that the President was usurping some function that he was not entitled to perform; that he was violating some provision of the Constitution. Where is the provision that he has violated? Who has ever presented the facts, and what provision of the Constitution has Woodrow Wilson ever violated? Who will point it out? We know he has violated none, but, like Lincoln, he has been standing for his country first, last, and at all times, and has faithfully and patriotically performed every duty.

A more studied outrage—

Listen to this! We have heard this, too, in this very Chamber for 15 months:

A more studied outrage on the legislative authority of the people has never been perpetrated.

The President has greatly presumed on the forbearance which the supporters of his administration have so long practiced, in view of the arduous conflict in which we are engaged.

And I want to speak to my colleagues on this side of the Chamber as well as to our friends on the other side. They say that they are forbearing toward the President. I fear some of them are not. I fear they are too critical. He is your leader. He is the head of your party. He is the head of an administration of which you are a part. Let us uphold him. His administration will be indorsed by our forthcoming convention. It ought to be indorsed. It has accomplished great things for our beloved country. We detract from those great things by not standing by our leader.

But he must understand that our support is of a cause and not of a man; that the authority of Congress is paramount and must be respected.

If he wishes our support, he must confine himself to his executive duties—to obey and execute—not to make the laws.

The specific act that provoked this outburst was Lincoln's refusal to sign a reconstruction bill which would have imposed very harsh and inhumane terms upon the South. He persisted in his refusal nevertheless, and he lived to rejoice in the generosity with which Gen. Grant treated the leaders of the Confederacy when they surrendered to him at Appomattox on the 9th of April, 1865. Five days later Lincoln was assassinated, and now he is canonized.

The record is one which the critics of the President will do well to ponder; for, though Washington and Lincoln are immortal, much research has been necessary to identify their detractors.

Mr. President, I have read this article for the purpose of showing that the vilification and abuse that is now being leveled at the President of the United States is no new thing in American politics. They did it to Washington in his day and they did it to Lincoln in his day; and I say, in the words of the writer of this article, that the names of Washington and Lincoln are immortal, whereas no man except the student knows to-day who their detractors were. In the audience that is here I doubt if there is a single one who can remember offhand the name of a single detractor of either one of those great Presidents of the United States. And so, in my judgment, when the final account is taken, it will be found that Woodrow Wilson, just as Washington did in his day and as Lincoln did in his day, rose to the full height and majesty of an American citizen, and has done only those things and has stood only for those measures that meant the glory and the prosperity and the happiness of our beloved Republic.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McCormick	Shields
Borah	Hale	McKellar	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Calder	Harrison	Moses	Smoot
Capper	Hitchcock	Nelson	Spencer
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sterling
Colt	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson
Dial	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Fernald	Kendrick	Owen	Townsend
Fletcher	Keyes	Page	Trammell
France	King	Phipps	Underwood
Frelinghuysen	Kirby	Pittman	Wadsworth
Gay	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	Lenroot	Ransdell	Watson
Glass	Lodge	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, it is hardly necessary for me to express again my earnest desire that the Senate ratify the treaty with reservations protecting American interests and preserving, untrammeled, the discretion of Congress upon subjects intrusted to it by the Constitution.

It is most important for our country to be no longer technically at war. We can make no treaty with Germany except subject to the treaty already made by Germany with the other countries that have been at war with Germany.

It is important that our country take part in the adjustments incident to those treaties.

While I believe we should have as little as possible to do with settling European boundaries, there are many questions growing out of the war from which we can not escape responsibility, and ratification of the treaty is essential to properly guard American interests.

The provision of the league covenant for adjustment of differences by arbitration and through conference may do much to prevent wars. With our domestic problems safely removed from foreign interference, it will be wise and helpful to the peace of the world for the United States to be a party to the league, so far as it undertakes, by arbitration and by conference, to bring about the settlement of disputes which might lead to war.

I am convinced that the interests of the country require that the treaty be ratified now. To carry it into the campaign this fall will take the attention of the country away from domestic problems and leave the treaty with no more prospects for ratification in the future than it has at the present time.

More than one-third of the Senators who will remain in the Senate two years after the 1st of March are opposed to the treaty without substantial reservations; and, regardless of the election this fall, the treaty can not be ratified for two years longer without substantially the reservations which a majority of the Senators will now agree upon.

Anyone who will take the list of Senators to be elected this fall who are opposed to ratification without substantial reservations must concede that quite a number of them will certainly be reelected. My own judgment is the vote of the Senate will be stronger the 4th of next March against ratifying the treaty without reservations than it has been during the past 12 months.

I do not believe that a majority of Senators will at any time be found—no matter how distant that time—who will be willing to place the obligation upon this country to send our soldiers and our sailors into the wars of the world, as required by article 10. Those duties which the Constitution places upon the Congress, and which article 10 would require them to approach with a prior obligation constraining their action, must be removed or the league covenant can not and should not ever be ratified.

The questions before us to-day are: Shall we leave our country technically in a state of war? Shall we refrain from caring for the interests of our country in connection with the adjustments that must be made under the treaties, because the covenant of the League of Nations is not to be made as strong as some would have it?

To those who wish it stronger than the Senate is willing to leave it, I appeal for favorable action on ratification. Even if they do not agree with me that the modifications should be made, they must know they will never obtain a league covenant going beyond the terms to which the majority of the Senate will now consent. They therefore, by refusing a vote for ratification, keep this question before the country and before the Senate, interfering with other important problems that should receive consideration, without the possibility of doing more in the direction of the covenant than they can help do to-day.

Of course, it is useless to make an appeal to Senators who frankly admit their desire to kill the league covenant altogether. But I appeal to those who really wish ratification but wish in the league covenant more than the majority of us think wise or right.

Do not keep your country distressed over this question when you know that the first sentiment of the country was for the league without modification, and that the changes of sentiment have all been against you. Not only do the interests of our country require ratification now, with substantial reservations, but the judgment of the American people to-day will sustain no other course.

Within the last few days the Courier-Journal, the great Louisville, Ky., paper, editorially urged ratification now.

This paper has been continuously, from the time the treaty was brought to the United States, demanding ratification without reservations. But now, recognizing the fact that there will never be a League of Nations with less reservations, it appeals to the Senate to ratify the treaty. It appeals to the Senate; it appeals to those who, with it, have been for the treaty as it was first written, to lay aside their preferences, to end the battle, and to vote now for the treaty as the majority of the Senate present it.

In my own State there are three papers published in Atlanta, with large circulations all over the Southeastern States. One has been against the treaty all the time unless substantial reservations were made. The other two have supported the treaty and last fall condemned all reservations and condemned Democratic Senators who voted to ratify with reservations. Now, both those papers have changed their attitude.

The Atlanta Constitution on the 27th of last month editorially urged the Senate to delay no longer, but to accept such reservations as the majority adopted, and to end the matter. I will read a couple of extracts from that editorial:

> The public knows that a large part of the unrest that exists the world over is attributable to the Senate's failure to dispose of the treaty. * * *
> The people want the treaty ratified with or without reservations.
> Even if it is ratified with reservations the principle, at least, of a universal league to enforce peace and prevent war will have been recognized.

I read this from a paper representing the thought of those Senators who have voted for ratification without reservations, who have stood out against reservations. I present it to them as speaking the voice of those who have been with them, not of those who have been with me. I have all along believed in reservations. But I urge Senators to consider the fact that those who have been with them against ratification without reservations are with them no longer, but believe the treaty should be ratified now even if reservations are made.

I turn now to an editorial in the Atlanta Journal, which was published day before yesterday. This paper for seven years has followed the President, approving every act, I think, of his administration. It has been extreme in its attitude with regard to ratification without reservations. I call attention to this editorial, and I appeal to the Members on this side to heed the thought of their own people, and the members of their own party. I will read from this paper. On day before yesterday for the first time it called upon the Senate to accept the action of the majority, and ratify the treaty now, recognizing the fact that never would they obtain more in a league covenant than they can obtain now.

Understand, in presenting this line of thought, it is not because I want the league as it was. I could not vote for it as it came to us. I would not now vote to ratify without reservations. But to those who are willing to ratify it without reservations I present the appeal that they will now get more than they will ever get hereafter, and that the friends of the treaty without reservations to-day favor ratification with reservations rather than a failure to ratify at all. I read from the Atlanta Journal editorial:

> The covenant which President Wilson brought back from Paris represents what was then the most workable plan on which he and the others at the peace table could agree. But it did not represent the only conceivable plan by which the purposes concerned could be accomplished. It was not a Decalogue, whose every syllable was sacred; it was not a Revelation, to change one letter of which would be impious. It was a human document, regarding which there was bound to be a variety of views among men who were sufficiently in earnest over it to think for themselves.
> The hour has struck for independent action by the Democrats of the Senate, action which at least will give their party a clear record, and which may spare their country grievous confusion.
> Plainly, then, it is the duty of the Senate Democrats—their party duty, their patriotic duty, their humanitarian duty—to strike boldly and unitedly forth for ratification. If this involves a breaking away from presidential leadership, the interests at stake abundantly warrant it, for when loyalty to a person means recreance to a principle, thinking men need not hesitate.

So I wish to state to my associates that the thought of this country to-day follows the interests of this country, and it requires that we ratify the league, ratify the treaty, and do it now.

As I said before, the friends of the covenant will never secure more than they can secure to-day. If they cast it away now the probabilities are they will lose it all for all time. If they do not obtain all they wish, they certainly obtain much that they wish, and they serve their country and follow the wishes of the people of this country by ending the matter and ratifying the treaty.

I shall support the substitute agreed upon by a conference of Democrats and Republicans and offered by the Senator from Massachusetts this morning. I shall finally support for ratification the treaty under such reservations as the majority of the Senate may place upon it.

[Mr. REED addressed the Senate, and before concluding yielded the floor for the day.]

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, March 13, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 12, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father of good, purity, holiness, guide us by the star of love to the larger life, as Thou didst guide the Magi by the star of Bethlehem to the manger where the young child lay—destined to be the King of men; that His spirit may be our spirit; His thoughts, our thoughts; His words, our words; His acts, our acts; that the world may be a little better that we have lived and wrought; and glory, and honor, and praise be Thine. In the spirit of the world's Great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McARTHUR. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes the point of order there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Twenty-six Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS ON HOUSE RESOLUTION 476.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KING. To ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on a resolution introduced by myself, House resolution No. 476, for the investigation of the administration of the Federal Reserve Board, and including a statute just passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on a resolution which he has introduced, having reference to an investigation of the Federal Reserve Board, including a statute passed by the State of Mississippi upon the subject. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the resolution a resolution for investigation?

Mr. KING. The extension of remarks is largely taken up with the statute just passed by the State of Mississippi and approved by the governor on March 6, 1920.

Mr. WINGO. What I wish to ask the gentleman is, Is the resolution he speaks of one introduced by himself?

Mr. KING. Yes, sir.

Mr. WINGO. Calling for an investiagtion of what?

Mr. KING. Of the administration of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. WINGO. Is that resolution now pending before the Rules Committee?

Mr. KING. It is now pending before the Rules Committee and is known as House resolution 476, of which I present the gentleman a copy.

Mr. WINGO. Has the gentleman had a hearing before the committee?

Mr. KING. No, sir. I have not requested a hearing, but expect to do so within a few days. There are some bankers here, from the South especially, who want to be heard.

Mr. WINGO. I am not antagonistic to the resolution. Now, the gentleman wants to extend his remarks, and, in addition to that, embody some resolutions, did he say?

Mr. KING. Embody a law just passed by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi and approved by the governor of that State on March 6, 1920, with reference to that subject.

Mr. WINGO. Has the gentleman any assurance that the Rules Committee is going to give him an investigation?

Mr. KING. The Rules Committee is always fair, and I am satisfied when the matter is presented to them it will give it careful consideration, and I hope to receive a favorable report.

Mr. WINGO. It is not a question of fairness, but a question of judgment.

Mr. KING. When you speak of the Rules Committee, it is a question of fairness as well as judgment.

Mr. DYER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REFERENCE OF H. R. 10835—COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAYBURN. I rise to ask unanimous consent for five minutes in which to make a statement about the action of the House on yesterday with reference to House bill 10835. A transfer from the Ways and Means Committee to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was made of this bill in the absence of any member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I think the action had at least the seeming tendency of doing an injustice to the Speaker of the House, who after consultation with a subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce referred this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means after we by resolution the other day put all soldier legislation in the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas state his request?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes in order to make a statement relative to the reference of the bill referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but at the proper time I shall ask for five minutes in which to address the House on this subject.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, as I was the author of that bill and had about as little consideration in the reference of it to the Committee on Ways and Means as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] thinks that he had in the rereference of it, I will ask for five minutes if the gentleman is to have five minutes. I want to state my position about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. With the action yesterday of transferring, by unanimous consent, this matter to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, is not now the incident closed and the bill referred to the proper committee?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. This bill has been referred to three committees already, and rightly as to only one of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the House, with respect to the reference of a bill to a committee, can reconsider any action taken upon a measure of that kind.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we have a very important bill before us, and in view of the fact that this is likely to consume considerable time, I am compelled to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 127, noes 31.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirty-two Members are present, a quorum.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to speak 10 minutes on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on the pending amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, would it be disagreeable to the gentleman for me to ask that the amendment be read? The amendment is brief and a number of gentlemen were not here when it was read before.

Mr. MADDEN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANFORD: Page 16, after line 13, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 8a. Construction service: The construction service shall consist of one chief of construction with the rank of brigadier general, 250 officers of the grades from colonel to captain, inclusive, and 8,000 enlisted men. The chief of construction, under the authority of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures (other than fortifications) and utilities, and the preparation of plans therefor, in accordance with the requirements of the several arms, corps, bureaus, and services of the Army of the United States, and with the operation of utilities in connection therewith and with acquirement of real estate and issuance of licenses in connection with the military reservations under the jurisdiction of the War Department."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, at one time I almost persuaded myself that it would be a good thing to adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], but the psychology of the situation has turned out to be such that if it were not so serious it would be amusing. Judged from the number of contractors and material men who had contracts under this organization during the war, it is the most popular organization in the United States.

Now, it does not speak very well for an organization to be so popular in the minds of those who are performing contracts under their jurisdiction. Everybody in the United States, except the people who pay the taxes, who have had an interest in contracts during the war executed under the direction of this organization is for the establishment of a separate corps.

The officers of the Army itself, usually acquiescent as to how the corps shall be organized, have been more active in their effort to dictate to the House just how these corps are to be formed than I have ever seen them before. There is not an Army officer who knows me, and who is a member of the construction corps, who has not been to see me to urge that this organization be made separate from the rest.

Now, I have no complaint to make about the ability of these men, nor have I any statement to make against their integrity. I assume that they are both able and honest; but somebody somewhere in the Government of the United States ought to speak for the men who are not organized and who have no lobby. [Applause.]

Now, I know that you do not organize a lobby unless you have an interest; and if there is an interest, what is it? What interest would you assume to say the contractors who made millions under the cost-plus contracts, directed by these men, have in their effort to make a separate organization in the Army known as the construction corps. They say that Gen. Marshall is a wonderfully able man. I have not any doubt about it. But what will happen if Gen. Marshall dies? Will there be any other man who will come forward, in whose behalf these contractors and material men can urge a separate organization of the construction corps? Ah, we spent billions of money during the war, and spilt vast quantities of American blood; and are we to-day to organize this construction corps for the profiteers or are we to organize it for the men who pay the taxes and have no lobby?

I am opposed to such an organization. We can well perform the functions of the Army either under the Engineer Corps or under the Quartermaster Corps. But these men and this organization want no superior. They want unlimited jurisdiction. They say their experience is invaluable to the United States; and the Secretary of War says in a letter dated day before yesterday, that the only reason why this corps has not already been transferred to the Engineer Corps is that many of these men said that they would quit if they were disturbed. Is that the kind of patriotism they possess? If so, I invite them to quit now. [Applause.] This Government is too big, too powerful, too just, to permit any element less than the majority of the people to dictate its policy, and that is what this crowd of men in the construction corps are now attempting to do. Contractors and material men have told me in days gone by, during the war—and I challenge anyone to deny it—that they were so ashamed of themselves because of the things they were compelled to do—and did—in order to maintain favoritism or a favorable opinion with those who were over them that they did not dare to look a dog in the face.

They were compelled to hire men whom they did not need, to pay them wages that were outrageous, to buy material at fabulous prices, to buy more material than was required and of kinds which they did not need. And yet we talk about the necessity and the importance of continuing a corps under a separate organization in the Army, under whose jurisdiction this kind of iniquity was perpetrated on the American people.

They say we have $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year to spend, that we can spend it more judiciously if it is expended under a single command. My judgment is that we have no such sum to spend during time of peace for construction in the Army. But my further judgment is that if you organize a separate construction corps you will organize a corps for the purpose of devoting its time to finding ways and means to force the expenditure of money out of the Public Treasury. The policy of the Government now should be economy and a systematic effort to rehabilitate the country, and to give some evidence of our desire to bring back confidence to the minds and hearts of the American people, to encourage them with the hope that some day, somewhere, even in the House of Representatives, they will have a sufficient number of friends to protect them against the lobby whose only purpose is to add to the already heavy burdens of taxation on the backs of the American people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to insert as a part of my remarks a letter from the Secretary of War on this subject.

Tht CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert as a part of his remarks a letter from the Secretary of War. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

FEBRUARY 28, 1920.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: This is in acknowledgment of yours of the 28th, signed by Gen. March as Acting Secretary, in response to mine of the 22d instant. Thank you for same.

It contains the memorandum or order deferred, but does not give us the full information we wish. You say:

"This memorandum was never signed.

"Action in signing the order transferring the construction activities to the Corps of Engineers was deferred because of the fact that there existed a large number of unfinished contracts, which would be settled in approximately eight months, and a postponement of the transfer for that period would avoid embarrassment to both the Government and the contractors."

What this committee desires to know is:

First. Was the memorandum and proposed order based thereon approved by you?

Second. Who caused its publication to be deferred? What we desire to know specifically is whether, the order having been approved by you, its deferment was caused during your absence by the then Acting Secretary, Mr. Crowell.

Third. Wherein would the transfer of authority from one division to another embarrass either the Government or the contractors in settlements? This committee is at loss to see any reason for such embarrassment.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. MCKENZIE,
Chairman Subcommittee No. 2 of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 10, 1920.

Hon. JOHN C. MCKENZIE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your communication of February 28, 1920, in which you acknowledge receipt of letter from the War Department of same date, upon the subject of the assignment of construction activities to the Corps of Engineers.

In response to the questions which you have submitted, you are advised as follows:

First. The general plan for the transfer of the construction activities to the Corps of Engineers was approved by me, but the actual time of the transfer was not fixed.

Second. During the absence of the Chief of Staff and myself from Washington the draft of the completed order, a copy of which was furnished you, was taken to Mr. Crowell, who declined to approve it, and on my return to Washington the matter was brought to my attention. I had a conference with Mr. Crowell, and on his statement, that if the merger were made many officers of the construction division would resign, I suspended authorizing the issue of the order pending legislation by Congress which should determine where the construction activities would go.

Third. As there was on hand in the construction division a large number of unfinished contracts, with the details of which the personnel of that division were thoroughly familiar from their inception, and as the transfer of the construction activities to the Corps of Engineers contemplated less personnel than would be required for a separate construction service, thus providing fewer vacancies for such officers as might desire to remain in the service permanently, and since I had been informed that many officers of the construction division would resign if a transfer to the Corps of Engineers was accomplished, it was believed, in view of the short time remaining until the pending contracts were completed, that to effect a change on March 31, which would not merely involve the placing of the Chief of Engineers over the chief of the construction division but might involve placing officers in charge of important work with which they were unfamiliar in order to relieve officers desiring to resign, would cause embarrassment and delay to both the Government and contractors which might easily be avoided by permitting the construction division to finish the work in hand.

You are doubtless aware of the fact that the War Department bill proposes placing construction under the Corps of Engineers, and it is my belief that this is the proper solution.

Trusting that the above information is satisfactory to you, I am,
Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. SANFORD. In connection with the insertion of that letter I call the attention of the gentleman to the latest letter from the Secretary of War, in which he pleads for a separate construction corps. That letter is inserted in the RECORD on page 4034. [Applause.]

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not hope to add anything to the luminous and very convincing statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] in presenting this amendment last evening, and I rise largely for the purpose of correcting what seems to me to be something of a misapprehension as to the functions and the activities of a construction corps.

I listened with a good deal of interest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], as I always do, but the gentleman from Illinois devoted most of his time to criticisms of lobbying and lobbyists, but without approaching the merits of the amendment that is now before this committee.

The thought seems to be prevalent in the committee that the duties and activities of a construction corps are the building of cantonments. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], not intentionally I know, left the impression that if we organized a separate construction corps its activities in large measure would be devoted to the construction of camps and cantonments, which, of course, could not be true in times of peace, and argued because the record in the construction of cantonments in this country had not been good, although he absolved the construction corps of any responsibility for that, that it was unwise to organize this corps as a separate bureau within the Army.

Now, gentlemen, a construction corps, under orders of October 5, 1917, and April 10, 1918, will have within the purview of its activities about the following: The construction of hospitals, munition-storage depots, ammunition-loading plants, post terminals, Army proving grounds, arsenals, chemical plants, together with all the utilities pertaining thereto, such as water supply, sewerage, heating, lighting, fire prevention, highways, roads, docks, and so forth.

When the war came on the very urgent necessity for service of this kind produced the construction corps. It was born of the necessities of the war. I do not desire anything I say to reflect on the Engineering Corps. There is no higher type of men in the Army than those in that service. They are the very cream of the graduates of West Point ordinarily. But the Army engineers in our Army, as in most armies, had not been instructed along the lines of modern warfare. The great monuments of the Army engineers of the past withered before the march of the Germans in the first Battle of the Marne. The fortifications and forts of Belgium and France were of no service, and we awakened to the proposition that the modern engineer had to be a man equipped along the line of mobile armies, of good roads, of bridges, of transportation; that he had to be able to add something toward sending an army from one place to a distant place with the least possible loss of time.

Now, what happened? Among the very great Army Engineers that we had in the Army when that sort of situation came up was Gen. Hartz, a very great engineer. He was made provost marshal in Paris. Gen. Seibert, to whom the world will always be indebted for his services in the Panama Canal construction [applause], was put in charge of chemical warfare in Washington. Gen. Biddle was put in charge of our troops in England, and in their places we put on the work at the front and behind the front civilian engineers, who knew road building, who knew railroads, who knew the building of bridges, who knew water supply, and sanitation; we put them in a construction corps, and their work in France is among the marvelous things that America did in that country during this war. This thing was born of a war necessity. It is one of the greatest products of this war, and the lessons that we have learned from it, I hope, will prompt the passage of this amendment.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] talks about a lobby. I have not seen it. It has not reached me. But, knowing the gentleman from Illinois as well as I do, I am sure that there is such a lobby or he would not have made the statement. There may be bad men interested in this amendment, but I have never been afraid to cooperate with a bad man to accomplish a good purpose. [Applause.] The question is not whether lobbyists are connected with this matter. The question is not whether bad men are interested in its enactment. The question is, Is it a meritorious proposition, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] did not reach that proposition during his debate on this amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield just there?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not know that the question of the lobby is material, but I should like to state that the telegrams I have seen from contractors ask to have the construction kept under the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. REAVIS. I am quite sure that that is so, but I have received nothing of either kind. Let me tell you where the lobby is coming from that will not only be for this amendment, but will be for legislation of a similar character. It is coming from the people back home. [Applause.] For years we have raised the revenues of this Government by a system of indirect taxation, a protective tariff, an excise tax on intoxicating liquors.

The people were not conscious of who bore the running expenses of this Government. But conditions have changed. By reason of the increased expenses of this Government and a system of direct taxation the people have become conscious of who is paying the bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. ANTHONY. With the understanding that the members of the committee can get a little time.

Mr. REAVIS. I will state to the gentleman from Kansas that I did not ask for recognition until I thought that all the committee had spoken who cared to.

Mr. ANTHONY. No member of the committee has spoken in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. REAVIS. I have no desire on my part to prevent them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. REAVIS. Every year under the system of taxation that now obtains in this country the man back home is ascertaining who is paying the expenses of the Government. He has commenced to inquire what we are doing with the money. Let me tell you what you would do with the money under the provisions of this bill. Every bureau in the War Department that has construction has its own independent construction organization. It has its own independent overhead, it has its own designs, and has its own specifications. It makes no difference whether that organization is active or not, the anticipation of work in the future keeps the organization within the bureau.

We propose to change this so that instead of having an organization working for a bureau, we will have an organization working for the Government, with its own specifications that apply to all the bureaus, so that any bureau within the War Department that wants construction work will turn to the centralized corps that does construction work. In that way you do away with the repeating of the overhead, with repeating designs, with repeating standards, and the endless multiplicity and duplication of work. It is my candid judgment, after a study of more than six months, not particularly of the construction corps but of some plan to make the business of the Government more efficient, that the business of the Government of the United States is not only the world's biggest business, but it is the world's worst managed business. There are more millions wasted by duplication of effort and duplication of organization than in any other one item of governmental expense. Here you have a proposition that does away with duplication, with its multiplicity of organizations. Here you have a single bureau doing all the work for all the departments, and the argument to defeat it is the story that some one is lobbying for it. The proposition is not whether anyone is lobbying for it; the question is, is it meritorious? I feel earnestly that it is, and I ask for the adoption of this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is not this amendment directly in line with the suggestion the gentleman has made in a bill that is pending here which designs to consolidate into one agency all the construction activities of the Government?

Mr. REAVIS. It is in line with that bill in more particulars than one. The bill I have introduced, and which I hope the House will give me an opportunity to speak on before long, will take the same construction corps by detail out to the States of this country and assist in building these roads that are being built with Federal aid, and we will make these officers serviceable not only in peace times but will by so doing equip them for service during war.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a well-known fact to all men who have taken any interest in this matter that this movement to make a separate construction corps in the Army is the entering wedge for the proposition set out in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. REAVIS. I sincerely hope that that is true [laughter], because it will save more money to the Government than anything else that I know of. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Does the gentleman mean to advocate the construction of State roads under the military arm of the Government?

Mr. REAVIS. I do not. I advocate this, and if the gentleman has paid any attention to it he knows this, that they are short of road-building engineers in this country. There is not a State engaged in the construction of highways that is not troubled by a shortage of engineers. I believe if we have a board of public works and a lot of civilian engineers in the War Department, well equipped by education and experience to assist the States, they had better be sent out there than to be kept in swivel chairs over here, for by so doing they are contributing in times of peace something to those who pay the bills and by their activity are equipping themselves for service in times of war. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if you will be kind enough to cast your eyes on the following section of the bill, section 9, making provision for the Quartermaster Corps, you will find that the head of the Quartermaster Corps is the Quartermaster General, with the rank of a major general, and with 3 assistants, with the rank of brigadier general, 1,050 officers, and 20,000 enlisted men.

Now, all this amendment will do is to take from that corps 1 brigadier general, 250 officers, 8,000 men, and set them apart in a construction corps, leaving 1 major general, 2 brigadier generals, 800 officers, and 12,000 men in the Quartermaster Corps. The cost to the Government is practically the same whether it be separated or not.

One of the experiences of the war has been the functioning of these separate corps. If there is one lesson we have learned, it is to keep the most important of these corps permanently separate, so that in an emergency they can expand.

There is no disposition on the part of the members of this committee or of anybody else to injure the service, and, as shown on the floor of this House, there are three thoughts with the committee. One of those is that this corps of construction can best function as a separate and independent corps. Another thought is that it should be a part of the Quartermaster Corps, where the bill puts it. A third proposition is that it shall be a part of the Engineer Corps. There is no insurging here. Some members of the committee from the first have advocated a separate and individual corps, to be known as the construction corps. There is no fight here against the Quartermaster General, neither is there any fight in favor of any one particular man in the construction corps; but out of human experience born out of the war it is the opinion of several of us—and, I think, of the majority of the personnel of the House—that the best way to get results is to place this corps on its own footing, the same as other corps of the Army. There is no inherent kinship in the world between construction and the quartermaster's duties. The principal duty of the quartermaster is the purchase, the reception, and distribution of the supplies for the Army. There is a little distant kinship, I will admit, between construction and engineering, but there is no thought in the membership of this House to put the construction corps under the Engineering Corps. The best thing to do, in my judgment, is to continue the construction department as a separate and independent corps, where it can function to the best interests of the Army and the best interests of the people generally. [Applause.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I make my motion to strike out the last word to offer on the floor of this House a protest against the demagogic speech made by the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the words of the gentleman from Ohio be taken down.

Mr. MURPHY. It seems to me that the time has come when those leaders, those men in high places——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will suspend. The gentleman from Illinois demands that the words of the gentleman from Ohio be taken down.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the word "demagogic."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw the word "demagogic." Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the word the gentleman desires to withdraw?

Mr. MURPHY. Demagogic.

Mr. GARD. Then the gentleman no longer accuses the leader of the steering committee of being demagogic?

Mr. MURPHY. Not in that expression, though I may a little later. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will take his seat until he has been given leave to proceed in order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, did anyone object to the words being withdrawn?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no objection to the words being withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his demand?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his demand, and the gentleman from Ohio will proceed in order.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you for this courtesy in giving me a chance on the floor of this House to protest against such speeches as were uttered on this floor by the gentleman from Illinois.

He used the new ugly word which has been coined, which carries the ugly features of all the ugly words of the language, and it is being applied to-day by one of the great leaders of the Republican Party, if you please, being applied to men who by reason of their sagacity, skill, and industry have become great in the affairs of this country, and because they dare to come to their Congressmen. Because of that they are called lobbyists. Great goodness, what will it come to if they can not come to the men they send down to Congress to represent them? [Applause.] I will say to you, my friends, that the gentlemen who represent the districts down here do represent men who employ thousands and thousands of men in industry in the various districts, and they have a right to come to their Congressmen and ask them to use their best judgment to protect this Nation in the forming of this magnificent bill that is now in process of construction in this House. The time has come when a different attitude must be taken toward the business interests of this country. What would have happened to our country if we had not had these business men in the Army during the war? After me there will appear a speaker on this floor who will tell you that money has been wasted. Of course it was. We wasted lives, we wasted treasure, we wasted everything, but that was not it. We wanted to win this war, so that that flag might still float [applause], and I say to you the only purpose for which I have taken this floor is to protest against such speeches as the one uttered by our splendid friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], for whom I have the very highest personal respect. It pains me much to hear a man who has made his own great fortune in the marts of industry condemn others because they, forsooth, come to their Congressmen and ask them to use their best judgment for the good of this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to come to some agreement about closing debate on this amendment. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, about 1 hour and 40 minutes already have been consumed in debate upon this amendment, of which about 1 hour and 25 minutes have been consumed by those in favor of the amendment. The members of the committee and other members of the House who have facts and figures that the House ought to know before it votes on this amendment should have sufficient time in which to present them to the House, so that the House may not vote blindly.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the right to object, I find that on this side quite a number of men would like to be heard upon this question, and I notice that quite a number were standing seeking recognition when the Chair recognized the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to submit this request. I fear that 40 minutes will not be enough. That would be only 20 minutes on a side.

Mr. KAHN. Let us see if we can determine who wants to speak on this amendment.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, for the present I withdraw my request.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. ANTHONY. To make a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield for that purpose?

Mr. FISHER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent that the chairman equalize the time in this debate between the proponents and the opponents of this amendment. I do not think it is fair that all the time for debate should be monopolized by one side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know on which side gentlemen wish to speak.

Mr. ANTHONY. There have been 10 speeches for the amendment and two against it, and I think it is up to the Chair to determine——

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair does not know unless a gentleman announces on which side he desires to speak.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object——

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Chair ascertain from the gentlemen who rise for recognition on which side of the question they are on and that the Chair divide the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman means from now on?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; and equalize that with the past debate.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded, and the gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if one thing has been said more than anything else in this debate it is that we should profit from the experience of the war. Now, I approach what little I have to say relating to the statements which have been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in order, because I have the greatest respect for his judgment and his ability as a Member of this House and a very great affection for him as a man; but I want to say that I fear that the statements made by him on this floor might be the cause of improper inferences being drawn by Members of this House who are not familiar with the facts. He indicated that a lobby was working for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and that lobby was probably composed of contractors who had gotten contracts during the war and who had been made rich thereby. But if my memory serves me correctly, during the war the construction division, after it was organized and was a separate unit, did not let the contracts. There was in the War Industries Board, if you remember, a separate committee, of which Col. Starrett was chairman, and that committee decided who should have the contracts. You will remember that favorite expression of "allocation" of contracts as well as of materials. The War Industries Board was trying to marshal the forces of our Nation along the lines which would most help win the war. The contractors were picked out by that committee and not by the construction corps. The construction corps looked after the work that was done by the contractors. I do not think it fair for anybody to draw that sort of an inference against the construction corps, for the contracts had been handled by another body.

This amendment has the recommendation of the Secretary of War, and I hope this committee will follow his recommendation. I have the very greatest respect for his judgment and like to follow it on matters which relate to the War Department.

It, however, might be said that the Secretary of War is a lawyer; then I want to call your attention to the statements which have been made by his very distinguished assistant, Mr. Crowell. He is a successful business man and not a lawyer. His views on this question I know will be helpful in reaching a sound conclusion on this question. He stated before the Committee on Military Affairs the reasons why there ought to be a separate construction division. He said:

> Mr. CROWELL. The work of the construction division is so large in merely letting contracts and supervising the work that I believe it warrants its maintenance as a separate department in time of war. I think the record during the past war proves that. That being so, I feel it should be maintained in time of peace so that when the next war comes we will not have all this reorganization work on our hands. Let us do it now. I see economy in maintaining it a separate unit, because I am going to show you that the records of the past indicate that there is going to be a considerable amount of construction work to be done in the future.

Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISHER. I do.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under the term "lobby," then, the Assistant Secretary of War would be regarded as the chief lobbyist under that construction, if this statement was put in the RECORD?

Mr. FISHER. From the hearings which were had by the Committee on Military Affairs I do not know of a stronger advocate for a separate unit for the construction division than the Assistant Secretary of War. Now, much has been said, and will be said, about consolidation making for economy. It is claimed that for economy this corps should be a part of the Quartermaster Corps. I want to call your attention to the statement of this same splendid business man relative to that proposition. He said:

> Mr. CROWELL. In a general way let me say this regarding consolidations. It is easy to say that by this consolidation we can save a lot of money. I have heard that many times.
> You may have a few men out here digging a ditch and over in another place you may have a few men sawing wood. But by the consolidation of the men digging the ditch and the men sawing the wood you would not make any saving. Many of the consolidations proposed in the War Department are on a parallel with that. Before we will allow them we must, of course, have a fair estimate made as to the results.

The construction corps as now organized is composed of efficient officers; most of them came as emergency officers from civilian life. They know, as former builders and civilian engineers, from a practical viewpoint, the kind of work that must be done in the construction work of the Army, and I say that it does not mean efficiency to destroy that organization, and the amendment should be adopted and the corps retained. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] is recognized.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] will not be adopted. If it is adopted it will mean that the House is settling a very important question, a question about which the Military Affairs Committee was unable to come to a conclusion; and I believe that each Member who has heard the debate here will agree, if we settle it to-day, we will be acting after very scant consideration.

As a member of Subcommittee No. 2 of the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, which committee has for months been investigating expenditures in connection with camps and cantonments and how the construction division functioned during the war, I believe that our committee is in a better position to know—or, at least, they should be in a better position to know—what happened and how this department functioned than any other Members of this House. That committee is now preparing a report, which will be in due course submitted to the House, that will set forth facts which I believe the House should have when it comes to settle this very important question of how and under what authority construction work is to be carried on in the future. And I believe I would be derelict in my duty if I sat mute here to-day and permitted the House to go ahead and take action without my saying that in a very few days our committee will present to the House facts which, I believe, will discredit absolutely the construction division as it functioned during the war. I do not want to anticipate what may be contained in our report, but I do want to say to the committee to-day that I believe it would be foolhardy in the extreme to settle with such scant consideration a question that the Military Affairs Committee can not agree upon, a question that is so far-reaching in its import, a question that involved the expenditures of hundreds of millions of dollars during the war, and which will involve the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars if we get into another emergency.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield for just a word?

Mr. McCULLOCH. In a moment. In view of the importance of the question, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is imposing upon the House to ask the House to settle that queston now with but a few moments' consideration, and I trust the amendment of the gentleman will be voted down for that reason if for no other.

Mr. SANFORD. Following the very good logic of the gentleman's statement—and I think it is very logical—would it not be better, then, awaiting that report, to leave the matter where it is; that is, with a separate construction corps?

Mr. McCULLOCH. I feel that the House, if it takes this action, will be committing itself to a course which, if the Members knew the facts, they would not be willing to take.

I believe the Members of the House are entitled to have the facts before them which have been developed during months of investigation before being called upon to settle this important question. They should know what happened during the emergency and then, after careful consideration, act in the light of our past experience, in order that the errors and mistakes made in the past may not recur. Any action you take to-day must necessarily be without due consideration under pressure from the sources which it is charged on this floor to-day have their personal interests to serve.

There is no immediate hurry about this, and I would suggest that the whole matter be left in status quo until such time as the House can be advised fully as to the necessities and requirements and the best thing to do in the light of all the facts. I believe that when the House is informed of all the facts it will not create this new construction division, but will utilize the Corps of Engineers for construction purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House on this amendment is whether the House will follow the careful investigation and determination of the Military Committee in the carefully worked out plans for an economy of $50,000,000 annually in the administration of the Army, or whether it will yield to the importunities of Army officers and of contractors who are interested or have been interested in perpetuating these war-time organizations as separate corps, and continuing all of the enormous overhead cost that has characterized the conduct of the war. The issue squarely is whether you will maintain all of these separate organizations created by the necessity of the war during times of peace, at a cost which we can show you will be $50,000,000 more per annum than the same organizations when consolidated, or whether you will yield to facts and figures which we hope will be able to influence you, as they did us, along the lines of consolidation and of economy.

First, I want to call the attention of the committee to figures submitted by officers of the War Department, figures which are the result of the investigation of the Bureau of Efficiency of the United States Government, as to the sums that can be saved by the consolidated operation of these bureaus, instead of permitting them to function as separate bodies, as now proposed in this amendment. Here are the figures drawn up by experts, covering the cost of the operation of the Motor Transport Corps, of the Construction Corps, of Purchase and Storage, and of Finance, as compared with the cost when consolidated as we are proposing in this bill, all except Finance, and I believe Finance, too, should be consolidated. The result of that investigation, which has been verified, I understand, by investigations by the Committee on Appropriations under the leadership of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], whose figures absolutely verify those which have been furnished to me and to the Committee on Military Affairs, shows that on the cost based on the conduct of these bureaus in the city of Washington alone, with their horde of civilian clerks, with their immense number of commissioned officers, there will be a saving in annual expense of $6,585,082 by this consolidation.

Does this committee want to put the stamp of its approval on the continuation of the hiring of thousands of useless clerks that are standing in each other's way down here in all these bureaus of the War Department? You men know it is a disgrace to our Government to permit these conditions to continue in time of peace. Yet a number of Members of this House, whom I consider ordinarily sane and sensible on business propositions, are standing upon this floor and advocating a continuance of that war-time expense in time of peace. I want to ask those men right now, whom do you represent? Do you represent the people at home, who sent you here, the taxpayers, or do you represent the selfish interests that are trying to keep this immense establishment for which there is no necessity in time of peace?

Mr. SANFORD. If the gentleman means that directly, I will say that I represent the people at large, and I think very intelligently, on this question.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want the committee to know that the Committee on Military Affairs, in determining this line of procedure, consolidating the construction corps, has followed the recommendations of Gen. Pershing in this matter. Allusion has been made to the effect that the Secretary of War has recommended a separate construction corps. I call your attention to the fact that the Secretary of War has made two recommendations on this subject. He has recommended, first, that it go to the Corps of Engineers, and then that it be separate. We prefer to follow that experienced soldier, Gen. Pershing, who says in his hearing:

> There has been some discussion as to the construction corps as organized after war began. I believe that it has been recently operating here at home as a separate corps. It seems to me that it might very well be placed for the future, in view of the fact that we shall not have very much construction, comparatively speaking, under the Quartermaster Corps; I believe that is where it belongs.
> Senator FLETCHER. General, have you had occasion to confer with Gen. Marshall about the amount of construction work?
> Gen. PERSHING. Yes. I discussed this whole subject with Gen. Marshall, and read a very interesting report that he had made on the work that he has done, and I consider that it has been done very efficiently.
> But it seems to me that it might be done under the same management, practically as efficiently, even though it be placed under the Quartermaster Corps.
> Gen. Marshall, if you will remember, was in charge of the construction department, or, at least, had a prominent position in the construction department under the Quartermaster General; and, for administrative reasons, or for whatever reasons came up—I suppose on account of the enormity of the work that the department had under its control—it was given an independence during the war, which seemed to be necessary.
> But in order to avoid the permanent establishment of so many different bureaus, it seems to me that from now on it should be under the Quartermaster Corps.

That is the advice that we have followed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. ANTHONY. In a moment.

Let me say that before the war all this construction was done under the Quartermaster Corps. Most of these officers belong to the Quartermaster Corps. We do not propose to destroy the entity of the construction corps. We simply take them and reduce their number, reduce the number of civilian clerks from a thousand to two or three hundred, and place them under the Quartermaster General's Corps and get rid of all this extra expense and all this overhead administrative cost.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I wish to ask a question for information. I notice that the amendment authorizes the chief to acquire real estate. Does that authorize him to go out and contract for new real estate?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. He would have to have an act of Congress before he could acquire a foot of new real estate.

Mr. JONES of Texas. This amendment so provides.

Mr. ANTHONY. No. The Quartermaster General looked after real estate before the war. There is no reason why he should not do it now. We had voluminous arguments before the committee as to why the real estate department of the Army should be perpetuated as a separate corps. There may be gentlemen on the floor here who may propose that, but I hope they will not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Under this amendment would the work of the Engineer Corps on the rivers and harbors be transferred to the new construction corps?

Mr. ANTHONY. It would not.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Under the amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. Under the language of the amendment it is open to a little dubious construction, but we propose to offer an amendment so that there will be absolutely a straight line of cleavage between the river and harbor work and the construction work of the Army.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I regret I can not.

Mr. SMALL. I want to correct the gentleman, if I may.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would rather not, if the gentleman will permit.

Now, let me present the figures presented by the Bureau of Efficiency on the cost of separate maintenance of the construction corps in Washington alone. There are now about 300 officers in the construction corps. There are 1,054 civilian employees. These civilian employees cost $1,926,000. It is proposed under this bill, on the recommendation of this bureau and of the officers who have investigated it, to reduce the construction corps to 39 officers, including one brigadier. It takes care of Gen. Marshall; it takes care of his principal officer; it takes care of all the brains that there may be in the construction corps, and there is a good deal of ability there; and we transplant them under the jurisdiction of the other corps. We cut down the civilian clerks and employees to 240, and make a saving of $1,700,000 a year in the Washington office alone.

Now, the only argument for the perpetuation of a separate construction corps that can possibly be made is that we are about to embark on another era of construction of great magnitude. Gen. Marshall stated to the committee that it was planned by the War Department to spend $300,000,000 in rehabilitating and refitting the cantonments, to make them fit for training purposes during the next year, and therefore it was necessary to maintain this great organization as a separate corps. I want to say to the House that it is my opinion, and I believe it is your opinion, that there will be no such sum expended and no such necessity for the creation of this organization to spend any such amount as that.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have some very important matters that I want to bring out, and I will have only a few minutes, and I would rather not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. ANTHONY. What is the situation that presents itself, gentlemen, if you permit all these separate corps to maintain a separate organization? It will mean that you will perpetuate the conditions that prevail now at every Army post in the country. Before the war one quartermaster officer at each post was able to look after all the business activities of the utilities that were there conducted. He was able to do it, and did it well. He superintended the construction, which was let by contract to the lowest bidder, and he bossed the job. He performed all the business activities of the place. What do you find now under the creation of these separate corps, that were perhaps necessary during the war, with an Army of 5,000,000 men? You will find seven or eight commissioned officers provided, with their clerks and with large details of enlisted men beyond what we had before. You find a finance officer, a utilities officer, a quartermaster officer, a construction officer, and so on in every single station all over the country, in each other's way, stepping on each other's toes, and bringing about a situation of absolute confusion in the administration of the Army.

Now, let me read to you reports from the Inspector General, received from the direct inspection of these camps and posts, which will show you the exact condition at the present time. Let me read to you the report of an inspector general who made an investigation of conditions at Camp Jackson, S. C., on December 17 last. It is an extract from the report of the inspection at Camp Jackson made by Col. R. C. Humber, assisted by Lieut. Col. John B. Clapham, and then follows the details. He says, under the head of "Consolidation of operating activities":

The civilian pay roll for the month of November amounted to $81,571.03.

This heavy expense is largely due to the size of this plant, the temporary nature of its construction, and its separate activities. It is believed that more efficiency, greater economy, and less friction would result if the camp supply, including salvage and laundry, utilities, transportation, finance, motor transportation, and camp ordnance were consolidated under one head.

Conclusions of this official report:

All operating activities within the camp should be consolidated and placed under one head.

That is what we are trying to do in this bill, if the House will permit us to do it, and we are trying to save you from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year.

Now, let me read you what the commanding officer at Camp Sherman, Ohio, says:

Synopsis of a report submitted by camp supply officer, Camp Sherman, Ohio, regarding the consolidation of the several services coincident with the supply and care of troops:

1. The following are the several separate organizations now in operation at Camp Sherman:
Camp supply organization.
Motor Transport Corps.
Finance service.
Transportation service.
Camp utilities division.

And that is typical of practically every other camp in the country.

2. Wages of civilians alone under above organizations, $46,963.34 per month.

3. The proper businesslike organization producing increased efficiency and saving money to the Government should be:
A camp quartermaster, with assistants, as follows:
One officer in charge of utilities, salvage, and laundry.
One property officer in charge of procurement, distribution, and storage.
One transportation officer in charge of motor, wheel, and rail transportation.
One finance officer.

4. The suggested consolidation will eliminate certain civilian clerks now engaged in administrative duties in the several independent organizations, and will reduce the pay roll to $34,243.34 per month.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman give the date of that letter, please?

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not the date of it. It is a recent report, a couple of months old.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have such time as he may desire, to even up the aggregate time that the other side have had.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think probably five minutes will do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. This letter further says:

A saving of $12,270 per month in the hire of civilian employees alone at this one camp.
This means $147,240 per annum.
In addition the consolidation would eliminate the following officers:
Two majors.
One captain.
One first lieutenant.
One second lieutenant.
The total monthly basic salary for the officers is $1,408,34, a total monthly saving of $14,128.34 in pay of officers and civilians.
Multiply this by 12, for one year, and we have a saving at Camp Sherman on salaries alone of $169,540.

5. Multiply the above by the total number of camps and other places that would be affected by this consolidation and we can readily see what an immense yearly saving would be effected—approximately $15,000,000.

6. This added to savings in zone supply offices and the main offices at Washington that would obtain if a similar consolidation was made would swell the annual savings to more than $30,000,000.

7. Further savings in the number of civilian employees can be made after the consolidation has been in operation for a time by a close observation, intelligent and systematic assignments, and the elimination of employees who may be duplicating each other's work.

8. Summing up, what do we find due to the present system of supply?
First. An annual expenditure of $169,540 more than is necessary or warranted at one camp alone.
Second. A wastage of $30,000,000 per annum when all depots, posts, and camps are considered.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman state whose summary that is that he has read?

Mr. ANTHONY. I dislike to give names.

Mr. JUUL. It is a military official?

Mr. ANTHONY. This is an official military document, and it is largely confirmed by the former major general commanding the camp.

Here is a report from Camp Bennings, Ga., which we hope to make one of the great basic training schools in the Army, one of our largest military establishments. The Inspector General's office reports on an inspection of that camp—

CONCLUSIONS.

5. That the present method of supply is slow, complicated, confusing, expensive, and does not satisfactorily meet the requirements of this camp.

6. That the present system of property accountability requires an excessive amount of paper work, is complicated, and requires an overhead of clerks. It does not properly protect the Government.

7. That the use of memorandum receipts expedites the issue of property to the students, reduces paper work, and protects the Government. (P. 22.)

RECOMMENDATIONS.

3. That in the interest of efficiency and economy the Camp Supply, Utilities, Motor Transport Corps, Transportation, and Finance be consolidated under the camp supply officer. Unity of control is an essential to success in administration as in combat.

4. That the most efficient supply system for operations in war be ascertained and adopted, and that this system be used in time of peace without any alteration in basic principles, but only modified to the extent of the addition of necessary accountability for proper protection of the Government.

5. That a simple and effective system of property accountability be adopted.

That is our argument for this bill. We are trying to consolidate, to give a unit of control in the Quartermaster General of all these various separate bureaus. They are going back practically to where they were before the war, but they are going back with their present heads, with their present organization, with practically all of their most efficient men, so when an emergency comes they can readily be expanded into separate bureaus, if need be, and the Government saves this enormous unnecessary overhead of approximately $50,000,000 a year. I hope the committee will decide to stand by these facts and figures and the business logic of the situation and not be led astray by the importunity of officers who seek to be favored and by what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] truly says is an organized lobby of contractors who have profited by contracts at the expense of the Government and whose activities now I consider a scandal and disgrace.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SANFORD. To speak on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has already spoken once on the amendment.

Mr. SANFORD. I offered my amendment and explained it at that time, and gentlemen have spoken in opposition to it, and I should like to reply to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think he can recognize the gentleman again at this time. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRISON. I am a member of the committee, and I was on the floor seeking recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has attempted to be entirely fair with the committee in recognizing members of the committee, and he thinks that in all fairness he ought to recognize some other Member. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] is recognized.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up the time of the committee. I ask to have read a telegram which was sent to me with the request that it be read and published in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the reading of the telegram?

Mr. GARLAND. It is in favor of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., March 8, 1920.

Hon. M. M. GARLAND,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

House bill for Army reorganization, No. 12775, which will come up early next week, does not provide that commercial construction be done by one bureau which the war demonstrated to be true economy. Instead, its effect is to provide that six bureaus have construction divisions with all attendant evils of interdepartmental competition, lack of standards, duplication of official supervision, maintenance, and cost, which is basically uneconomical. Please voice protest on floor of House and vote for amendment placing all construction work in one separate bureau.

PITTSBURGH BUILDING TRADES COUNCIL,
J. H. DUTY, President.
WILLIAM H. LYONS, Secretary.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I find nothing in this bill that provides against cost-plus plans, and I want to say that whether this amendment is adopted or whether the bill goes through in the form in which it was reported, I am opposed to that un-American system of cost plus being used in the Army or anywhere else. [Applause.] It fosters favoritism; it places incompetents at the head of departments; it puts a premium on extravagance; and has done more to load the shoulders of the people of this country with tax burdens than anything else that has occurred within the last 50 years in this country. That is all I want to say on the subject, but I hope there will be some provision enacted that will do away forever with the cost-plus plan and bring us back again to the American system of competitive bidding. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] desires to call my attention to some matters, and I desire that he may do so in my time.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object to that. If the gentleman wants to speak, of course he can be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that what the gentleman from Virginia asks can not be done in the face of objections.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the gentleman from New York desires to ask me a question, and to make a statement.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HARRISON. Is not that in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield my time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON], a member of the committee. If he does not desire to use his time, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FULLER], a member of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I will use my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield a moment?

Mr. SEARS. I make the point of order that debate on this subject has been exhausted.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not wish to resort to any subterfuge to get this before the committee, but it seems to me that the committee ought to have its attention called to a certain paragraph in the testimony——

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is not entitled to the last word on this subject.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, debate has been going on along this line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a question.

Mr. SANFORD. My question will be very brief. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] made the point that this consolidation would be very cheap, and that it would be in the interest of economy to put these under the Quartermaster General. In that connection I think the House ought to know what was said by Assistant Secretary of War Crowell, who, in my judgment, is the best business man in the War Department. He said:

My attention has been directed to a statement made by Gen. Rogers before your committee to the effect that if the Construction Division, the Transportation Service, the Motor Transport Corps, the Finance Service, and the Purchase and Storage Service were concentrated into one organization a reduction in personnel, figured as of August 1, 1919, could have been effected under which 1,155 officers and 12,929 civilian employees of those five services could have been dispensed with at an estimated annual saving of $18,104,864.48.

In other words, they want twice as many officers and men as are called for by the bill, and that is the department the gentleman refers to that would accomplish this saving. I wish the gentleman from Virginia would call attention of the committee to the other part of Gen. Crowell's testimony.

Mr. McKENZIE. From what was the gentleman reading?

Mr. SANFORD. From the testimony of Gen. Crowell in the hearings.

Mr. HARRISON. Let me say that Gen. Crowell goes on to say:

By August 1 the Army, which in December had numbered 3,623,000, had been reduced by demobilization to 451,000 men; but, in the process of demobilization, reduction of commissioned personnel and civilian employees in the staff bureaus progressed slowly, and it was necessary for the Secretary of War to constantly direct the heads of the various services to make reductions in their personnel. On August 1 there was in the service of the Director of Purchase and Storage a commissioned personnel in the United States aggregating 4,419. Between August 1 and October 8, the date upon which Gen. Rogers testified before your committee, he had been required to discharge 663 officers and 18,748 civilian employees, resulting in an annual saving of over $24,000,000.

Again I call attention to the letter of the Secretary of War that is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 4034 in criticism of the bill that is now before the House. He says:

This contemplates a return to the prewar conditions when each service and bureau of the War Department carried out its own construction, maintenance, and repair work. Each bureau, therefore, will be called upon to create within itself a distinct construction department, thereby giving encouragement to interdepartmental duplication and loss of economy.

It is therefore my respectful recommendation that in due consideration of this subject provision be made for a separate transportation service and a separate construction service in the proposed bill.

The prewar conditions were those wherein each bureau had its construction. The Ordnance Bureau had its construction, the Quartermaster's Department had its construction, the Air Service had its construction, and all these departments would go out into the market and bid against each other for material and for labor for such amount of work as was necessary.

The object of the amendment of the gentleman from New York is to consolidate all the construction work under one head, which necessarily means economy. There has been just as much lobbying on one side of this proposition as on the other. There have been officers as much interested in getting control of the construction corps in their department as there are officers who desire to have it in a separate corps. We have had just as much of so-called lobbying on the one side as there has been on the other. If you take the advice of men who have studied this situation you will find that the proposition to create a separate construction corps is entirely in the interest of economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a situation that I think has not been considered. Before the Committee on Appropriations, during the consideration of the legislative bill, it was discovered that during the war there were created in the War Department six or seven independent bureaus thought to be necessary for war emergency, and that when the war was over they would lapse back into the old plan. Without a single exception every one of those independent bureaus was before the committee trying to impress us with the necessity of continuing them during peace times. There was the transportation corps, the chemical warfare corps, the finance corps——

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, as this is a very important matter, and as the gentleman from Texas is not here, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and ten Members present, a quorum, and the gentleman from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think it is important that we understand the relation of these corps and find out what they are doing and what they intend to do to us. I was about to say there were seven or eight different bureaus created within the War Department to function merely as emergency bureaus and that would cease to function when the war was over. We were led to believe that and gave our sanction to it. One was the transportation corps, another the chemical warfare corps, another the finance corps, the air service corps, the motor transport corps, the construction division which they are now trying to insert in this bill, the real estate corps, and the purchase, storage, and traffic service. Without exception, each independent bureau is trying to convince the Congress that it is essential to keep them as a separate bureau for peace-time operation. Even the real estate bureau was before the committee asking that they be continued as a separate and independent branch of the Government.

Now, by creating this separate corps you are creating a necessity for additional officers and you are going to compel additional appropriations for its maintenance. Every one of the bureaus will grow and grow and create an additional expense through an increase of clerical force. It is just as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] said, that if you create these additional bureaus that are insisting that they shall be created, and for which there is just as much use as there is for this, it would mean an additional expenditure of over $50,000,000 to maintain them.

By reason of close paring your Appropriations Committee on the legislative bill was able to reduce the estimates $18,000,000. Put back this item and you will find that you have added by reason of the necessities that will accrue, and for which appropriation must be made, a clerical expense account amounting to millions of dollars a year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why should this cost any more as a separate unit than it would under the Quartermaster Corps?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Because every independent bureau has an overhead peculiarly its own, and because of its expansion and its wants, and its new establishment, which all go to increase the cost everywhere. I want to give you a concrete example. For the purpose of lowering the expense of this Government, when the present Quartermaster General came back from Europe, he observed that there was not only inefficiency, but duplication and overlapping. He tried to consolidate the purchase, storage, and traffic divisions into one division, by means of which he could immediately dispense with the services of 72 officers and 525 civilian clerks, which would have saved the Government $4,000,000 a year. He entered upon that plan. It was permitted to stand for 10 days, and then the General Staff countermanded it, and put these pets of theirs back where they were and continued all of the civil service roll of 525 clerks, whose services could have been dispensed with to the advantage of the Government. This is another one of the beautiful examples of the never satisfied maw of the General Staff, which is trying to reach out and get more and more and more under its domination and control. This is a General Staff proposition pure and simple. I want to say to you that the most of the scandal to the Government during the war came by reason of abuse, by reason of extravagance, and by reason of graft through this construction division.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It has been because of the fact that this construction division created if you please this cost-plus system of contracts, and in addition to that gave bonuses. It is no wonder that every contractor in the country is down here or sending telegrams trying to bring about a continuation of this division. It is the greatest plum that ever fell in their basket, and as a pure business propositon they can well afford to urge its continuance. I want to say to gentlemen of this House, irrespective of that dividing line, that we would better begin to pay a little bit of attention to the taxpayer who has to bear these burdens. [Applause.]

It is most discouraging when you find one committee of this Congress trying its best to reduce expenditures, to reduce inefficiency, and then come in here and find the champions of some particular bureau endeavoring to have it continued, and finding behind it some particular forces and influences, selfish, if you please, some desirous of promotions of officers and some desirous of continuing favorite contractors. Who is paying the cost? Who but the people pays $1 for 50 cents' worth of value in the construction of these cantonments? Who but the public pays the surplus when they let these cost-plus contracts and give these extravagant and unwarranted bonuses? It is that kind of business under your construction bureau that is an open scandal and a reflection upon the reputation of this country and upon those who made it possible for such things to be.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does not the gentleman recognize that these conditions complained of were necessary in war time and that they are not contemplated in the future in this consolidation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely not. It was due entirely to want of foresight, to want of good business judgment, to lack of common sense. If you had put business men at the head of this construction department, it would have been a different story. If I were going to organize a construction department, I would not have a military man in it, so far as management is concerned. I would have business men who know something about the business, and I hope the time will come when this Congress will awaken to the business interests of this country, and to the transaction of our business in a business way, when these departments that are business will be organized by business men. If you are going to organize a construction division, you ought to get the best business men in the country and never put a uniform on one of them, so that they could be entirely independent and so that they could not be dictated to by the General Staff.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman this question: He complains of the high prices paid for teams. Was not that largely caused by the fact that part of this work was under the Quartermaster and part under the Ordnance Division? These prices were established before this construction division took hold of it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But they continued afterward, and that has been the shame of the whole thing, together with the Government going out and competing in the open market with private individuals, demoralizing labor; we are suffering from the result of it to-day because of the fact that there was not concentration of action, because there were no business principles applied in doing the work at hand.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMALL: Mr. SMALL moves to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, Mr. SANFORD, in line 6, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4203, after the words "other than fortifications" and adding the following words: "and buildings in connection with river and harbor improvements, and miscellaneous activities imposed by law upon the Corps of Engineers."

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would say that I have an opinion that the correction is not necessary; but I see it is very wise, and I am very glad to favor it.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, that will enable me to curtail my remarks. This amendment is intended to except from this construction service all of the building activities of the Corps of Engineers. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] states that he has an opinion that these activities would not be included, but I am very clear that the amendment will be construed to include all of the activities of the Corps of Engineers, except fortifications.

Mr. Chairman, under the Corps of Engineers at present there are not only river and harbor improvements, but the Alaska Road Commission, public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, the Washington Aqueduct, the Potomac River bridges, the Mississippi Commission, the California Débris Commission, and other activities. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] stated that it was proposed under this amendment to confer upon this division of construction the construction of highways, railroads, docks, and so forth. As a matter of fact, judging from expressions of the distinguished chief of the committee on construction, his purpose is so to enlarge that division to take over all the construction activities or public works of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. SMALL. Evidently the friends of this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York are not in accord as to the comprehensiveness of this proposed amendment. Under the language I think any good lawyer would interpret it and so construe it as to embrace all the activities of every corps or bureau of the War Department and every activity of the Corps of Engineers, except the particular one of fortifications excepted by the amendment of the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from New York concedes this amendment will only make clear what in his opinion is the proper interpretation of the amendment as it stands. I shall not take up the time of the committee in giving reasons why his amendment should be amended in the manner presented by the amendment which I have offered. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, speaking generally, that those who have opposed this amendment creating a construction service have the better of the argument. It seems to me that it is uneconomical and unnecessary.

I was particularly impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], a member of the committee, who has evidently given this matter much study, and I agree with him that if this construction activity is not to remain in the Quartermaster Corps, where it was prior to the war, that it ought to go to the Corps of Engineers of the Army, who, by their organization, with engineers scattered all over the country, are prepared by means of their organization and with a minimum of additional overhead expense to perform all the construction work of the War Department, and I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York for these reasons will not prevail, and that subsequently the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] will offer an amendment to transfer these construction activities to the Corps of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, when the proposition advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] was first called to my attention, I thought it a very good one, and did until I had heard it read and had an opportunity to study it. It is a significant fact that whenever a proposition is advanced on the floor of this House to make a raid on the Public Treasury through the creation of new bureaus and new offices the proposal creates vociferous applause on the minority side. I waited in vain the other day to hear one of you cheer during the reading of the Farewell Address of the immortal Washington. [Cries of "Oh" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I presume their proclivities for new offices and bureaus accounts for the fact that you are now in the minority, because you can not fool the people all the time. No; I have only five minutes, and I can not yield to the gentleman, I am sorry to say.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Did a Democrat offer this amendment?

Mr. KNUTSON. Construction work is essentially the function of the Engineer Corps, and while I am not in favor of leaving it where the committee has proposed I think the committee should vote this amendment down, and then when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] presents his amendment to allow all the construction work to be placed in the hands of the Engineers, which will be offered in section 11, page 20, that it should receive the favorable consideration of this House.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I would like to yield, but I have only a few minutes. Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH], and a number of other speakers, have presented what in my opinion is unanswerable evidence in favor of turning this amendment down. The matter of construction does not belong in the Quartermaster Corps, but why create a new department? Let us get down to economy. I know it is hard, especially when we have got a healthy minority who does everything that it can to leave the door of the Treasury wide open and joins in every attempt to make a raid upon the money chest. But let us be Americans first. Gentlemen, this Government is going to run behind this year something like $3,500,000,000.

Mr. MCKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I can not yield. That is $3.50 for every minute since the dawn of the Christian era. I believe that when Mr. MCCULLOCH presents the figures that his committee has gathered in connection with the construction of camps and cantonments in this country the cost-plus plan adopted by the War Department in letting contracts will stand as one of the blackest spots in American history, and I do not marvel at the fact that messenger boys come running into my office every 5 or 10 minutes with telegrams from profiteering contractors out in my section of the country asking me to support this proposition. Gentlemen, I appeal to all of you, not as Democrats or Republicans, but as Americans; let us work together in harmony and put this country back on a business basis where it will be possible to serve the people's interests and not have to add further burdens on the taxpayers by continually increasing the load they now carry. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. To move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order. That would be an amendment in the third degree. No other amendment is now in order.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ascertain. [After counting.] One hundred and ten gentlemen are present, a quorum. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 20.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I favor the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD]. I believe it will result in substantial economy. I am quite sure that it will result in efficiency, and I think it will avoid a reflection upon those great men who have performed a wonderfully efficient and economical service for the country in the time of war.

In regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] that the construction division be placed under the Engineers, I have only to refer to the figures—although I do not have them in mind or at hand, but they are available—of the cost of construction in the various branches of the Army during the war. Construction was performed by the Air Service, by the Engineers, by the Quartermaster, and, subsequently, construction was performed by the construction corps that was created during the war. And a comparison of figures shows beyond doubt that the economy that was effected by the construction corps more than justified the idea of having a construction corps of our own. The construction was cheaper under the construction corps than it was under any of the other branches of the Army.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. SANFORD. It has been stated here that the construction by this corps was done on the cost-plus basis, and that has misled a great many Members. Will not the gentleman make it clear that all the construction done by this construction corps was on the cost-plus fee basis, and not on the cost-plus plan, and that the average fee for the building of cantonments was 2.96 per cent, a remarkably small fee?

Mr. MADDEN. And 600 or 700 per cent more than it ought to have cost.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is exactly right upon the subject.

Now then, something has been said concerning the methods that have been adopted by these people in the Army and by those from the general public who have favored this proposition, but little has been said of the methods of the men in the Army who have not favored this proposition. Now, there would not be such a great call for a construction corps if it had not been that during the war the Quartermaster Corps found itself unable to perform all the functions that the law had placed upon it. It had too many things to do; and it may be now, that you have a quartermaster with a sufficient breadth of mind, that in the time of peace he might be able to handle this gigantic enterprise along with the other things he is called upon to do, but I doubt very seriously if there is a man living who has a mind big enough and who has energy great enough to enable him to perform this function along with the increased duties that will come upon the quartermaster in the time of war. Therefore there is no reason at this time to build up a system which must be cast aside when we we get into a situation where we are going to need effective work, not in two months afterwards, but immediately after the declaration of war.

Now, I have been importuned on this thing. I have been visited by men in the Army and out of the Army on this proposition, and I have been struck with the fact that the present Quartermaster General, a man in whom I have the greatest confidence, and for whom I have the highest respect, has an encompassing personality, enabling him to dominate the average man.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask for two minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, unless we can get an agreement as to the length of debate, I shall object to any request for extension.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am just discussing this famous officer, and I do not want my remarks to be cut half in two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] reserves the right to object.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let us see if we can not reach an agreement. We have been discussing this matter now for three or four hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit any request that is made.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. KAHN. I modify my request by asking that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time be equally divided between those for and those against.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate be closed on this amendment and amendments thereto in 30 minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. To be divided equally between those for and those against.

Mr. KAHN. The Chair has the apportionment of the time.

Mr. TAGUE. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KAHN. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment and any amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Can we not agree upon it? The gentleman is willing to give 30 minutes, but I do not believe 30 minutes is asked for here.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] having two additional minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like first to finish the sentence which I started.

Now, when I make these remarks concerning the present Quartermaster General I do not desire to reflect upon his character, but, on the other hand, to compliment him, because it shows that he is a man of energy and of ambition, and we desire to see that things are done. But I do not believe that the Members of this House should permit that kind of overenthusiasm to induce us to destroy the great construction corps of the Army.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman said a while ago that he did not believe in building up a service under the department that would have to be separated from the department in case of war. I fully agree with the gentleman on that. Does not the gentleman think that that same logic ought to apply to the Air Service as to the Chemical Warfare Service?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes, sir; and I understand that the bill so provides.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the committee.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I assume that we all want to do that which will make for economy and efficiency and be guided in our future policy by practical experience rather than theory. Therefore it has seemed to me that it would interest you to hear the testimony of Gen. Marshall, an acknowledged authority on construction work, before the committee of which I am a member:

Gen. MARSHALL. The economy is that men who have technical knowledge and who know how these things should be operated should determine those policies, put them into effect, and carry them out without the intervention of an authority between them and the final authority in the War Department, the idea being not to put those policies under a bureau head and subject to the policies of a bureau chief who has a great many other unrelated things to determine.

* * * * * * *

The independent set-up for construction was made because it was manifest that work of such magnitude and importance to the Nation could not be done unless the officer in charge of the same had direct access to the final authority in the War Department. It seems to me that this lesson that the war has taught us is fast being lost sight of; that is, the experience of the past war has left us with the lesson that a distinct field of operation in the War Department must be under the control of distinct organizations. The war developed distinct classifications of activities not theretofore provided for in the Army organization. Before being called upon to exercise its distinct function in the past war, instances might be cited in which certain activities or branches of the service were included under the jurisdiction and authority of a corps or bureau merely because there was some apparent relation to that corps or bureau.

* * * * * * *

When it became necessary to house the new Army the construction division was separated from the Quartermaster Corps and given a separate entity because of the distinct nature of its work. Another instance of this character was the separation of the Chemical Warfare Service from the Ordnance. There had been other similar instances, but the main thought associated with these divisions of the work is that when put to a supreme test of emergency, former theories of organization were not effective. Practice and experience have developed the various units or organizations that we now find in the War Department.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. MERRITT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on March 12, 1920, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 12160. An act authorizing the construction of a bridge and approaches thereto across Red River at a point a little east of north of Nocona, in Montague County, Tex.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be recognized for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I favor the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], and I favor it because I have had 30 years' experience in building and in construction in a general way; and it seems to me that the only sensible plan to carry out in Army construction is the same plan that we would carry out in general business, and that is to put certain kinds of work under certain heads and hold those heads responsible.

The Army was very much criticized during the war. Probably they could not help it. Probably it was the fault of the plan. When I was over in France I went to see a young man whom I knew—a Regular Army officer—who had had a splendid education and had served as instructor in languages, and went from there into the Army, and had an experience there in training men in the Infantry; and yet over in France he had 600 men in his charge building roads.

I think we have had too much of that in the past. I think we should profit by that experience and now get construction under one head, and hold that head responsible. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKENZIE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] for one minute.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I take this one minute simply to say that I agree with my colleague [Mr. McKINLEY] on business principles. I believe that we ought to have the utmost economy exercised in the War Department, but I can not conceive of the business end of it, when we have now in the Military Establishment a Corps of Engineers needed for this work, to put upon the Government the expense of carrying along another parallel organization to do exactly the same character of work.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this amendment it seems to me that some extraordinary arguments are used, and one of them has just recently been used by the distinguished economist from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW]. His argument was that in order to avoid unnecessary public expenditures we ought not to scatter the activities of the various departments, and in that argument I thoroughly agree with him, but to my amazement, after making it, he began arguing for an amendment that begins right away a scattering process.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Just wait a minute until I finish. Now, what is the situation in the Quartermaster's Department? We have a major general at the head of it, Maj. Gen. Rogers, and we have provided in this reorganization plan for three separate divisions of the Quartermaster General's Department. One of them is for the purchase of supplies for our Army. Over that we will have one brigadier general. Another is the transportation department of the Army, and over that we will have one brigadier general. The third is the construction corps, with a brigadier general in charge. Now, those are the three contemplated divisions of the Quartermaster's Department, namely, the transportation of supplies, the construction needs of the Army, and the transportation.

Now, what is the argument used by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW] and other gentlemen who argue for the pending amendment? It is that in order to bring about economy we should split up this Quartermaster's Department into three separate divisions—one of them the purchase department; second, the transportation department, and the third, the construction corps.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I have only five minutes, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UPSHAW. The gentleman is talking about me, remember.

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the gentleman. I talked about the gentleman because of his well-known record for economy.

Mr. UPSHAW. I thank the gentleman. Then does not the gentleman in his protest against scatteration recognize that the bill proposes to take the construction department, dismember it, and scatter it into six different departments?

Mr. BLACK. No; it does not contemplate anything of the sort. This reorganization bill contemplates that we shall centralize in the Quartermaster's Department these three great facilities, namely, transportation, construction, and purchase.

I am confident that most of the Members of the House read the very able letter that Secretary Lane wrote to the President just before his retirement from the Cabinet. He made a correct diagnosis of what is the matter with the Government to-day. He said that the thing that is the matter is this, that there are plenty of brains in Washington, but that they are too badly scattered; they are not coordinated. He says that a few great men with organizing and directing ability could do vastly better than is done by our method of scattering these activities over so many departments; and those of us who have not read that letter of Secretary Lane would do well to read it and ponder the truth which it emphasizes.

Now, what is the situation? In my limited experience here in Congress I have seen many new bureaus urged. And what is the invariable argument? The argument is "It will not increase the expenses of the Government. We will transfer a certain number of clerks that are already in one department and put them in the new bureau. They will be paid the same salaries. Their expenses will be the same, and there will be no additional expenditure." Well, that does happen the first year, and probably the expenditures of the bureau the first year will be only $25,000. But the bureau immediately begins to grow. It begins to exaggerate the importance of its activities, and we have seen these $25,000 bureaus grow into bureaus that expend from $500,000 to $1,000,000 a year. Might as well argue to me that you can keep more molasses in a barrel by boring more bungholes as that you can promote economy in the Government service by establishing new departments and new bureaus. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I should hesitate to speak upon this amendment proposed for the establishment of a bureau to be known as the construction corps, which has been thrashed out so extensively, were it not for the fact that I feel that my location in Baltimore, the very center of war activities, enables me to say a few things which may be of interest to the membership.

Baltimore had north of it the proving ground at Aberdeen, now the greatest test ground in the country. It had to its southeast the munitions stores warehouse being built at Curtis Bay. To the south was that great cantonment known as Camp Meade. I believe that there never has been a greater conglomeration of business affairs than there was in the competition between these separate Government constructions. Aberdeen competed with Curtis Bay and Camp Meade for labor, transportation, and material. Camp Meade and Curtis Bay, which grew to be so great and so necessary, competed for material, transportation, and labor. These great activities under the construction divisions of different bureaus competed with one another. The consequence was that prices began to rise, and the gentleman from Indiana who told us that we paid $6 a day for water carriers and $16 a day for teams is not far from correct. Why was that? Because these separate Government construction enterprises were under separate organizations and they competed with one another until the prices rose to these high figures. Then all work was consolidated under this construction corps, but the wages and prices had already been established by governmental competition and it was impossible to lower them. The consequence was that this country was mulcted for many millions of dollars by virtue of the fact that we had not consolidated those enterprises in the very beginning. Not alone was the Government affected but every farmer, businessman, and merchant was injured by this ruinous system. It was a crying shame.

It, of course, made those prices soar, but at the same time raised the price of food, clothing, and other necessaries of life. It made it difficult to live even upon the increased salaries, retarded the production of food on the farms by drawing all men and boys therefrom, not only cost the taxpayers millions more but did the wage earner no especial good. I charge that old ruinous system with many of our ills.

The pending amendment is sound in principle and it enables us to take advantage of the experience of the past three years. Three years ago, as I have said, the construction work of the Army was scattered throughout the respective services and represented a minor function. The experience of this country in the Spanish War in the matter of housing its troops taught a bitter lesson. Vastly more men were swept away by disease in our own camps in the United States than fell in battle facing the enemy.

The Russo-Japanese War proved that sanitation and hygiene were just as important as modern rifles and ordnance.

To meet this situation a new division was created, called the cantonment division, which has since grown into the construction division of the Army. That division from a cold start in 90 days provided housing for more than 1,000,000 men. Not only was housing provided, but the highest possible type of sanitation and every comfort and facility was ready for the men as soon as the men were ready to go to the camps. Almost as if by magic cities of from forty to sixty thousand capacity were brought into being. The result was that the death rate from disease in our Army camps and cantonments was lower than the civilian death rate for the same period throughout the United States. So vast a work can only be done by a centralized organization. Since the plan worked well in war it certainly should be carried in a reduced form in times of peace. It should at all times be capable of expansion and it should not again be necessary to create a division of this kind after an emergency arises.

The pending amendment is more than a step in the line of preparedness; it is a step in the line of good business administration and of economy.

The amendment does not add a single commissioned officer, but it does require certain of them under the construction division to do more work, and this will certainly result in reduced expenditures for personnel.

This amendment does not take from any other division any function which it is now performing. At present all of the construction work is being done by the construction division.

I believe it thoroughly unwise to scatter this work and still more unwise to divide the responsibility for doing the work. Under the present bill several of the services, notably the Air Service and the Ordnance Department, will be required to maintain draftsmen, engineers, architects, supervisors of construction, and other commissioned and civilian personnel, which will be entirely unnecessary if this amedment is adopted.

The work performed by the construction division of the Army is generally recognized as one of the brilliant achievements of the war. Not long since, in fact on February 28 of this year, the Secretary of War stated of this division:

When future historians come to read of the things that have been done during the war they will marvel. I have no desire to compare what any group or set of men did during the war. All did their bit. But the building of cantonments in the United States in the space of time in which they were built and the completeness with which they were constructed I think was the greatest achievement of the war next to ferrying 2,000,000 men across the sea through the submarine zone.

The work this construction corps did during the war was the biggest construction program that was ever put through by this or any other country. They built those cantonments, and they built them on time. They built the port terminals, I would have you know, on the cost-plus fee basis. I want to relieve the construction corps from any criticism that may be in the mind of some of you, by telling you they did not operate on the cost-plus basis, as it is generally understood. They operated on the cost-plus fee basis. That is, each contractor was told of the amount of money he could earn by doing the job, and he could not gain anything by increasing the price. His fee was limited. Now, the work of the construction corps was necessarily done in the war by civilians. When the war came on there were no Army engineers that could be spared. The quartermaster could not handle the job, and the call was sent out for civilians to come and enlist in the construction corps. Now, from that work in the war and from the cooperation of the civilians with the War Department, that corps built up an esprit de corps of its own. Men who did that work are very proud of it, and they are willing and anxious to organize in reserves all over the country to come back, if the emergency should arise again, and render a similar service.

Much has been said about a lobby here. I have not heard anyone say how many telegrams he received from anybody, nor how many officers called to see him, but I want to say that I have not received even one telegram from any construction company or any big business firm that ever did business with the Government, in relation to this amendment.

Mr. UPSHAW. Neither have I.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have had but one man employed in this service call to see me, and he was a personal friend and a worker with me in much of interest to the public before he went into the Army. One other man who was formerly connected with the Army, who built one of the great cantonments, called to see me. He is no longer connected with the Army, but is building one of the greatest construction works in Baltimore City. He is not now interested in the Army except as a patriotic citizen, but he is interested in economy, and he came to me and laid this whole matter before me, and he said, "It will be a crime against the country, it will be a crime against the taxpayers to separate this construction work and place it back as it was prior to the formation of this construction corps." I tell you, gentlemen, it is a sound business principle to establish one central body for this work. No business man in this House would establish one organization to do a certain construction work and another to do something else in the same line. He would concentrate it all in one office and he would hold the man at the head of it responsible for the result. We can not say that these men have not performed great work.

The corps has done wonderful work and proved its efficiency. I think under all business principles we ought to support this amendment and I am in favor of it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there seems to be a considerable amount of personal feeling over this amendment that I can not account for. I opposed this proposition in committee, and after listening to the arguments in behalf of the amendment I see no reason to change the views which I advocated in the committee.

I shall not go into a detailed discussion of this proposition. Already I think this bill is overloaded with extra officers. I have been trying to convince my friends on the other side that they have too many extra officers in this bill. I hope that sooner or later they will realize it, but I see no reason in the world why this construction corps in time of peace should be perpetuated as a separate and distinct organization.

Now, let us see. Prior to the war the appropriation for construction carried by the bill, as I recollect it, was something like $1,250,000 up to $1,500,000 annually, and in that sum the new construction work that was done by the War Department was limited to $250,000. I can not understand why you should have a separate corps and an independent corps to carry on the new construction work involving only something like a quarter of a million dollars annually.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will not the new construction work cost a great deal more than that from now on?

Mr. DENT. I see no reason why it should unless Congress should adopt universal, compulsory military training and have to provide camps for the boys to go to for that purpose, and I do not think there is any chance of that being done this session.

Mr. LINTHICUM. It has been stated that the new construction work would be about $50,000,000.

Mr. DENT. I can not imagine where the new construction is coming in.

Mr. McKINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. McKINLEY. Is it true that the estimate for the camps for universal training, compulsory military training for 600,000 boys and 100,000 officers, will cost about $300,000,000?

Mr. DENT. Yes; that is my recollection of the estimate made by some officers, but I am going on the theory that that will not be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. SANFORD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I made the statement that the construction work would run to $40,000,000. I had reference to the statement of Secretary Crowell, where he speaks about taking care of the public utilities and 16 cantonments and 16 special camps, there would have to be 200 or 300 men at each camp and cantonment to take care of them, and the estimate I gave included the care of the real estate as well as any construction that might be necessary. The figures that Secretary Crowell gave were $40,000,000 to $70,000,000, and I took the smallest figures, and I think they are too small.

Mr. DENT. I do not remember the statement of Assistant Secretary Crowell as to new construction work.

Mr. SANFORD. The figures include new construction work as well as the care of the cantonments and real estate. Before the war it ran as high as $20,000,000 and prices are twice as high now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. All time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, on a division there were 81 ayes and 47 noes.

Mr. KAHN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. SANFORD and Mr. KAHN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 133 ayes and 74 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 9 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 9. Quartermaster Corps: The Quartermaster Corps shall consist of 1 Quartermaster General with the rank of major general, 3 assistants with the rank of brigadier general, 1,050 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 20,000 enlisted men. The Quartermaster General, under the authority of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with the purchase for the Army of all supplies of standard manufacture and of all supplies common to two or more branches, but not with the purchase of special or technical articles to be used or issued exclusively by other supply departments; with the direction of all work pertaining to the construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities connected with housing the officers and enlisted men of the Army and with the storage and issue to the Army of Quartermaster supplies; with the operation of all such utilities; with the acquisition of all real estate and the issue of licenses in connection with Government reservations; with the transportation of the Army by land and water, including the transportation of troops and supplies by mechanical or animal means; with the furnishing of means of transportation of all classes and kinds required by the Army; and with such other duties not otherwise assigned by law as the Secretary of War may prescribe: Provided, That special and technical articles used or issued exclusively by other branches of the service may be purchased with the approval of the Assistant Secretary of War by the branches using or issuing such articles, and the chief of each branch shall be charged with the storage and issue of property pertaining thereto.

"SEC. 9a. Finance Department: The Finance Department shall consist of 1 chief of finance with the rank of brigadier general, 90 officers in grades from colonel to captain, inclusive, and 600 enlisted men.

"The chief of finance, under the authority of the Secretary of War, shall be charged with the disbursement of all funds of the War Department, including the pay of the Army and the mileage for officers and the accounting therefor; and with such other fiscal and accounting duties as may be required by law, or assigned to him by the Secretary of War: Provided, That under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, officers of the Finance Department, accountable for public moneys, may intrust moneys to other officers for the purpose of having them make disbursements as their agents, and the officer to whom the moneys are intrusted, as well as the officer who intrusts the moneys to him, shall be held pecuniarily responsible therefor to the United States."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 24, after the word "the," where it is used the first time, strike out the word "purchase" and insert the word "procurement."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 17, line 1, after the word "the," strike out the word "purchase" and insert in lieu thereof the word "procurement."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 17, line 18, at the beginning of the line strike out the word "purchase" and insert in lieu thereof the word "procured."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 20, strike out the words "one thousand and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "eight hundred"; same page, line 22, strike out the word "twenty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve"; same page, line 19, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof; also, on page 17, strike out the following, beginning with the word "with," on line 3, to and including the word "reservations," line 10.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Would it not be proper to divide the amendments so that they could be considered individually?

The CHAIRMAN. It can be divided upon the request of any Member.

Mr. ANTHONY. I request that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, the only purpose of this amendment is to carry out the plan which the House has just adopted in the passage of the amendment. All that this amendment does is to take the officers and enlisted men who are mentioned in the amendment just adopted and subtract that number from the number carried for the Quartermaster Corps in this paragraph.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that practically all of the officers holding commissions in the construction corps to-day are temporary officers, and if we strike out the officers who were in the Quartermaster Corps, we will strike out officers who have been commissioned in the Quartermaster Corps on account of their efficiency. Does the gentleman want to strike them out?

Mr. SANFORD. I would be very glad to have my colleague from Illinois defend the provisions of this paragraph, so far as he may see fit, and keep this number of officers in it if his judgment so directs. It is my opinion from the testimony that I have read that this number of officers is entirely too many if you take away from this corps the duty of construction, which has just been given to the construction corps. I think you can come to no other conclusion if you read the estimates and the testimony given by the Quartermaster General and by the other officers; but I am sure that if the Quartermaster General's Department needs defense I would rather the gentleman would do it than myself. I am only offering this amendment to carry out the purpose of the committee and to act in good faith after the adoption of the other amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is it the intention to have the construction corps charged with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies?

Mr. SANFORD. It is not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman proposes to strike that language out of the bill?

Mr. SANFORD. No. My amendment proposes to strike out the language beginning with the word "with," in line 3, down to "reservations," in line 10.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That includes line 7, does it not?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes; but let us look at the wording of the bill:

With the direction of all work pertaining to the construction and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities connected with housing officers and enlisted men of the Army and with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That may be; I am asking for information.

Mr. SANFORD. That is the meaning of the language as I see it in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It may be otherwise provided in other sections, though I do not recall.

Mr. SANFORD. I think it is otherwise covered in the paragraph—

With the purchase for the Army of all supplies of standard manufacture and of all supplies common to two or more branches—as elsewhere.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I may be mistaken, but I do not think it is provided elsewhere.

Mr. SANFORD. I think it is, but at any rate, I think the obvious meaning of the language that is proposed to be stricken out—at least the committee so considered it—is to give to the Quartermaster Corps the construction of the different utilities mentioned, and among them is the utility connected with the housing of officers and enlisted men of the Army and the storage and issue of quartermaster supplies.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I somewhat take the view of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that it would be well to eliminate from the gentleman's amendment, commencing with the word "and," the language on line 6, page 17, terminating with line 7 on the same page, in order that there may be no confusion.

Mr. SANFORD. Then you want to begin again?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. And omit from all of line 8 down to the word "reservations"?

Mr. MILLER. All of line 8, line 9, and terminating with the word "reservations" in line 10.

Mr. SANFORD. I think it would probably be better to adopt the amendment and then to insert the language that is thought to be necessary.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the Clerk please read the amendment that has been adopted showing the number of officers it is proposed to assign to the construction service?

Mr. SANFORD. I will state that it is 250.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want the number which the gentleman proposes to reduce the entire number of officers in the Quartermaster Corps. That would show the number that he proposes to assign to the construction division.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman?

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to find out the number of officers that the gentleman proposes to assign to this separate construction corps.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not propose to assign them.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman proposes to reduce the Quartermaster Corps by how many?

Mr. SANFORD. Two hundred and fifty.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the substance of the amendment and its effect is to reduce the total number of 1,050 officers assigned to the Quartermaster Corps for these combined purposes by 250, who are to be used for construction activities. I suppose it will be useless to continue further argument along the line of economy to this House, but I call the attention of the House to the fact that we have assigned under the consolidation in the bill a much smaller number of officers to perform these duties, and the Quartermaster General says that the construction activities can be performed by a smaller organization. If the House desires to set aside 250 officers for that purpose, if it wants to commit that extravagance, let it go ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, is not there another amendment offered by the gentleman from New York? Was not the amendment separated?

The CHAIRMAN. No request was made to separate it. The Chair informed the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] that it could be separated upon request.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I asked that the amendment be separated.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas ask unanimous consent that the action be vacated?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I think the committee should intelligently pass upon these amendments, and we can not do that unless we know what they are and to what they apply in the bill, and they should be passed on separately.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that anyone would have the right to demand a separation of the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I demanded a separation of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. I understand the gentleman from Kansas demanded a separation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the amendment be separated. The Chair had already announced the result of the vote.

Mr. REAVIS. Then I object to it, after the Chair has announced it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman certainly will not object. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from Kansas did ask for a separation, but if the Chair did not hear him, I have not any doubt of that, but he did ask for a separation, and under those circumstances certainly no gentleman of the committee, because the Chair did not hear him, would say that the separation should not be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is clearly entitled to a separation.

Mr. REAVIS. There is no doubt about it if anybody did make a request for a separation, but the Chair submitted a unanimous-consent request and I objected to it; did the gentleman from Kansas make a request for a separation?

Mr. ANTHONY. I made a request, but what objection can there be to an amendment being separated so that we can intelligently vote upon it?

Mr. REAVIS. I have no objection if it was made in time, if the gentleman states that he made such a request.

Mr. ANTHONY. I stated it.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I request unanimous consent that the action taken may be vacated and we may vote separately on the amendment, because the gentleman from Kansas did ask that it be separated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the preceding vote be vacated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEARNS. But, Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we certainly voted on something. If we did not vote on all the amendment we certainly voted on the first part of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Chair inadvertently put the amendment altogether without knowing a division had been demanded.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I had no knowledge that the gentleman from Kansas had demanded a separation before the vote was had. I have no objection, of course, to a separation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first division of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 20, strike out the words "one thousand and fifty" and insert "eight hundred."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next part of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 22, strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "twelve" in lieu thereof.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it has authorized 20,000 enlisted men for all of these activities of the Quartermaster Corps. The motion of the gentleman will deduct 8,000 from those 20,000 to be set aside for the use of a construction corps, a preposterously high number of men for that corps. It is absolutely ridiculous to use that number of men for the activities of that corps, and I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it would be necessary further to enlarge the total number authorized for the rest of the activities of the Quartermaster General, if we take that large number of enlisted men for that purpose.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has just been offered illustrates remarkably the lack of basis for the claims which were made in behalf of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. I made no statement during the discussion because it did not occur to me that it was possible that a majority of the committee would vote for the amendment. Of course, I understand how gentlemen on the Democratic side may very well be hilarious over the fact that they have helped overturn a decision of the majority of the committee and added largely to the cost of the Army.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. No one knows just how much this may add to the cost, but it might by increasing demand for construction add as much as thirty to forty million dollars to the cost of the annual upkeep of the military organization. I can understand how gentlemen of the minority without a sense of responsibility might vote that way, but I do not quite understand the attitude of gentlemen on this side. Now, that decision having been arrived at, gentlemen offer what they are pleased to call "perfecting" amendments, such as the amendment offered, which shows, it seems to me, clearly and definitely how extravagant is the plan just voted on.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield right at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield for the present.

Mr. MONDELL. We had an Army of over 4,000,000 men, and we are proposing an Army now of 300,000; and yet there are gentlemen who would maintain in an army of 300,000 men all the separate organizations that may be entirely proper, legitimate, and useful in an army of 4,000,000 of men.

Why, just see the effect of the amendment just adopted. We have, scattered all over the country, military posts, camps, and cantonments, in which there are at times but a handful of men—skeleton organizations. We have scores of posts and camps with at times only a few hundred men. Under the plan of organization that has just been provided for it will be necessary to maintain at each and every one of those camps and cantonments or posts an officer qualified to issue an order every time a pane of glass has to be renewed or reputtied in one of the buildings. Every time it is necessary to put a new shingle on one of the roofs of any camp or cantonment an officer must be available whose duty it is to pass upon that request. Otherwise the roof must remain unrepaired, the wind must continue to blow through the broken pane of glass, and the camp remain in disrepair. And gentlemen have argued the plan as a proposition of economy and concentration. I suppose we will hear the same kind of an argument in favor of a separate transportation corps, in favor of separating the Army further into an infinite number and variety of corps, at the head of each one of which shall be a major general and a full complement of officers pertaining thereto.

Mr. Chairman, we are trying to get on a peace basis. It has been necessary to increase the Regular Establishment, so that, do the best we can, our annual appropriation under it will run from $400,000,000 upwards annually at present costs. The military organization of nearly 600,000 Regulars proposed by the administration would have cost over a billion a year, and the one we are proposing will cost from $400,000,000 upwards. If we further divide this organization into corps and subcorps, at the head of which is an officer of high rank, necessitating officers stationed at every one of the separate camps and cantonments to carry out the work of each particular separate branch, we will have a Military Establishment that will cost half as much as the entire expenditure of the Federal Government at the time of the outbreak of the war. It does not sound very well for our program of economy, this plan of dividing the Army up into many separate corps, increasing the number of officers, necessitating an increased number of details here, there, and everywhere, and adding largely to our bill for military purposes. I trust it will go no further.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SANFORD and Mr. BLANTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is somewhat embarrassing to me to hear the gentleman from Wyoming make the remarks he has just made, and I can not but feel that if he had had the advantage of reading the testimony and if he appreciated the meaning even of the pending amendment he would not have made the statement he has made.

The position that I have taken here is supported by a good, fair proportion of the Military Committee, who are just as much interested in economy as the gentleman from Wyoming. After the committee has passed my amendment by such an overwhelming vote, I think it is somewhat a reflection upon the intelligence of the committee if the gentleman from Wyoming thinks that the statement he has just made can be effective. Xenophon, in his Anabasis, says:

Cyrus was a great general, because, better than any of his soldiers, he knew how to obey.

The gentleman from Wyoming must learn how to obey the will of the majority if he hopes to be a leader.

I think it is up to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to bow to the judgment of the men who day after day are following his leadership with confidence. Mr. Baker, the Secretary of War, who at least has some judgment and discretion, held the same view the gentleman expresses until he studied the question. Then he reversed his judgment. I held the view that he held when I did not know anything about it, and came to my present view only after long study and consideration of the question. One can not examine this question without giving approval to the amendment the committee has just adopted.

The only argument I have heard made against it was that of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], who said that the Quartermaster General and others showed that a great deal of money could be saved, and this statement is not borne out by facts.

On the 1st of August the Quartermaster General stated that if all these bureaus were consolidated in his department he could save for the Government $18,000,000. After that date he was compelled to reduce his own force so as to save $24,000,000. In other words, an improvement in the system has compelled him to save $6,000,000 more than he estimated he could save. His original estimates of his ability to economize are largely the basis of the claims of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption for information?

Mr. SANFORD. This system, let me say, does not add anything that is extravagant or that can not be justified by sound business sense and economy.

I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Was the gentleman from Wyoming correct when he said that the passage of your amendment would add $40,000,000 more to the appropriation?

Mr. SANFORD. My amendment is taking something out of the bill and adding nothing to it. The gentleman from Wyoming did not know that. My present amendment is to take these officers out of the bill. The committee has already transferred these officers to the construction service and the pending amendment takes an equal number from the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I assume the gentleman will not claim that taking officers out of one department and putting them in another results in any saving?

Mr. SANFORD. Of course, I do not contend that. If the gentleman had been listening longer, he would know that I do not contend that. I say that taking them out does not add millions, as the gentleman seemed to contend a few moments ago.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Wyoming further said that a large majority of the Democrats voted for the gentleman's amendment, while a large majority of the Republicans voted against it. The gentleman was one of the tellers that did the counting. Did he notice that a large majority of the Democrats voted with him, while a large majority of the Republicans voted against him?

Mr. SANFORD. I think there were a good many Democrats that were "sound" on this occasion, and I think a majority of the Republicans were also "sound." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we all admire the unprecedented courage of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] in answering the curtain lecture to his Republican colleagues, publicly delivered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], by giving him a counter curtain lecture, likewise publicly made.

The gentleman from Wyoming is certainly doing the Democrats a great honor in asserting that by the vote just had of 133 to 74 any kind of action was put over on the Republican committee by Democrats. If the gentleman from Wyoming is absolutely without power on a vote of 133 to 74 to change the result just had in the committee, then the good Lord deliver his colleagues from his kind of leadership. [Laughter.]

I am sure he can change it if he wants to. I am sure that if the gentleman from Wyoming means what he says, that the action of the committee recently taken was an action against economy that may cost us $40,000,000. I am sure if, to effect economy, it requires a change about from the action just taken by the committee, the gentleman from Wyoming has the power to change it, and that he will change it. He can call his men in here from over in the House Office Building and elsewhere. He can surely get enough votes to override a vote of only 133 to 74. That is all the vote they had by which that amendment was passed, and that was a tellers' vote. The vote which was had before the tellers' vote was only 86 for the amendment.

Why did not the great majority leader of this great Republican Party, who says he is for economy, have more men in here on the floor when this vote was taken? All he would have had to do was to have taken my friend from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] over here and given him orders, and the gentleman from Minnesota would have done the work; he would have had the "boys" here.

It does not do the gentleman from Wyoming or his party any credit to get up here and say, "Oh, the country is ruined," because 133 Members happened to be here and passed an amendment; that because 133 Members so voted, business is going to stop, and that it is going to cost the Government, as he says, $40,000,000, and that it is going to provide our special friends who now sit up in the gallery with special jobs, where they can be put, and that it is going to cost the Government $40,000,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman that the gentleman who represents the brains and leadership of that side of the House stated just what would happen, and the House did not follow him. The gentleman from Texas must not have been in here when the speech was delivered.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am talking about action now and not words. When the action was being taken, when the vote was on, and the Members were passing through the tellers, we did not have the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming here to tell the boys what he wanted them to do and to whip them into line. He comes in here after it is all over, after the country is "ruined," after the distinguished gentlemen who are sitting in the gallery have gotten what they want, and then lambasts his colleagues for voting to ruin the country. After they have gotten in the positions for the high officers at every one of these camps and cantonments, after they are in a position where they can have a major general put in charge of each one of these special corps that he speaks of, after the horse has been stolen and after the stable door has been left unlocked, then he comes in here and bemeans his colleagues for letting 133 Democrats put something over them. [Laughter.] It was not 133 Democrats, I am glad to say. If the gentleman from Wyoming had been here when the membership of the House passed through those tellers, he would have seen more Republicans pass through than he would have seen Democrats. The "boys" voted wrong when the gentleman from Wyoming was absent and was not here to keep them straight. But if he really wants to, the gentleman from Wyoming can rectify the error by forcing a roll-call vote on this amendment when we get back into the House, and if he wants to save the country from "ruin," he will know how to get sufficient votes to overturn this 133 to 74 decree in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, of course the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] ought to carry if we are going to be consistent and make this bill balance.

I rise, however, to correct a slightly erroneous impression that has been given to the House, that the gentlemen wearing the uniform of the United States Army who are sitting in the gallery are wasting their time. It has so happened in the last few weeks, on account of the enormous amount of sickness that has come into the department, through the "flu" and otherwise, that an order has been issued directing the officers on duty in the War Department to be absent one afternoon each week, and two hours of that time shall be spent in recreation and the other two hours shall be spent as they please. These men are not the same men that were sitting in the galleries up there yesterday or the day before. Many of them are replacements. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] subtracts 8,000 men from the total of 20,000 authorized for the combined Quartermaster Corps, presumably for the activities of the construction corps. The House ought to know that there are now assigned to duty in the construction corps 270 officers and only 4,000 enlisted men; just half the number of enlisted men are on duty there now that the gentleman from New York would place there. The allocation of the enlisted men, of the 20,000 authorized for the combined corps, as made by the General Staff officers who have studied this bill, was 8,320 for the combined purposes of construction, storage, and purchase. It is obviously out of all reason to assign 8,000 alone for this construction corps. The proper figures, if you want to make it as it is now, are 4,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANTHONY. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 40.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. SANFORD and Mr. ANTHONY.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 47.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 19, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next paragraph of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 17, strike out, beginning with the word "with," in line 3, down to and including the word "reservations," in line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask to have the words read which it is proposed to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the lines proposed to be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following language:

"With the direction of all work pertaining to the construction, maintenance, and repair of buildings, structures, and utilities connected with housing the officers and enlisted men of the Army and with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies; with the operation of all such utilities; with the acquisition of all real estate and the issue of licenses in connection with Government reservations."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that even the gentleman from New York does not want to do what he proposes to do by this amendment. He would strike out the authority of the Quartermaster General to store and issue supplies, which is his primary function.

Mr. SANFORD. I have no such purpose.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why does the gentleman use that language?

Mr. SANFORD. I think I do not. This says—

Utilities connected with housing the officers and enlisted men of the Army and with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies.

I mean to take away from him the control of buliding operations in utilities connected with housing and storage. I think that is the clear sense of my amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman find in there other language which authorizes the Quartermaster General to store and issue supplies?

Mr. SANFORD. Perhaps the paragraph has omitted that language.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman has made his amendment too broad.

Mr. SANFORD. I ask to omit from my amendment the words—

with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he modify it still further by taking out the word "and."

Mr. SANFORD. I am leaving out the words—

with the storage and issue to the Army of quartermaster supplies.

Mr. KAHN. I know, but the word "and" will be left in.

Mr. SANFORD. If it should not be there I promise the gentleman that when it gets to conference I will take care of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. KEARNS: On page 16, line 19, after the word "General," strike out "three" and insert "two"; on page 16, line 20, after the word "General," strike out the words "one thousand and fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "six hundred and twelve"; in line 22 strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "twelve thousand five hundred"; on page 17, in line 10, after the word "reservations," strike out the rest of the line; and also strike out all of lines 11, 12, 13, and line 14 up to and including the word "Army" and the semicolon; and at the end of section 9 insert a new section to be known as section 9–b, as follows:

"SEC. 9–b. The transportation service: There is hereby established a transportation service which, under regulations to be established by the President and in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall have the duty of transporting the personnel, material, and supplies of the Army of the United States by rail, water, motor, and animal transport, and with the procurement and operation of such means of transportation as the President may direct.

"The permanent personnel of the transportation service shall consist of one chief of transportation, with the rank of brigadier general, and 437 officers, in grades from second lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, a total of 438 officers and 7,500 enlisted men, in their appropriate grades, all of whom shall be detailed or assigned from the permanent personnel under the provisions of this act. The reserve personnel of the transportation service shall consist of all reserve officers and reservists assigned thereto as provided for in this act."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understood the first part of this amendment was hung on something in order to make it germane, but the things on which it seems to have been hung have been stricken from the bill, and it seems to me the amendment is up in the air.

Mr. KEARNS. They have not been stricken from the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman's amendment strikes out words that are not in the bill at all.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have a perfecting amendment in line 22 of the bill, and I want to know whether my amendment would be in order before the gentleman's motion to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. If the portion of the bill which the gentleman seeks to amend is stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment seeks to have adopted a new section of the bill before we have concluded consideration of the section that we are now on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will examine the amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the Chair hear argument on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will receive information on it first as to what the facts are.

Mr. CALDWELL. I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman if necessary.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I ask to withdraw that part of the amendment down to the part beginning with section 9–b.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can ask to withdraw his amendment, and can then offer such amendment as he desires to offer.

Mr. KEARNS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Now, I offer the latter part of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEARNS: At the end of section 9 insert a new section to be known as section 9–b, as follows——

Mr. CALDWELL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think the gentleman from Ohio wants his amendment to come in after line 16, on page 18, after the word "States."

Mr. KEARNS. That is where it comes in.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If that is the intention I make the point of order that the reading of the section has not been completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the section has been read.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Have we got to that part of the bill where in the regular order the Clerk would begin to read at page 18, line 17?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, as modified.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. It occurs to me that yesterday an amendment was offered, providing for separate transportation service. If this amendment provides for the same thing the committee has already passed upon that.

Mr. CALDWELL. No; it has not.

Mr. ANTHONY. I make the point of order that it is substantially the same amendment that the House rejected yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule that; it would have to be identically the same amendment, and this is not the identical amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 16, page 18, insert a new section to be known as section 9–b, as follows:

"SEC. 9–b. The transportation service: There is hereby established a transportation service which, under regulations to be established by the President and in accordance with the provisions of this act, shall have the duty of transporting the personnel, material, and supplies of the Army of the United States by rail, water, motor, and animal transport, and with the procurement and operation of such means of transportation as the President may direct.

"The permanent personnel of the transportation service shall consist of 1 chief of transportation, with the rank of brigadier general, and 437 officers, in grades from second lieutenant to colonel, inclusive, a total of 438 officers, and 7,500 enlisted men, in their appropriate grades, all of whom shall be detailed or assigned from the permanent personnel under the provisions of this act. The reserve personnel of the Transportation Service shall consist of all reserve officers and reservists assigned thereto as provided for in this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that it is germane and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the Chair if it is germane to the preceding paragraph. It must be not only germane to the paragraph but germane to the paragraph which it follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph contains the provisions for the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. BLANTON. But it does not contain a separate transportation corps.

The CHAIRMAN. It does not; but it provides for other departments in the Quartermaster Corps.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, on page 17 of the bill in a part of this section it provides for a Quartermaster Corps. In lines 12, 13, 14 this language is found:

with the furnishing of means of transportation of all classes and kinds required by the Army; and with such other duties not—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is clearly of the opinion that it is germane and overrules the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that the mere provision that the Quartermaster's Department may provide transportation does not bring into the bill the subject of a separate transportation corps of the Army. The amendment of the gentleman seeks to establish a separate transportation corps in addition to the ordinary service provided in the Quartermaster's Department.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not for the Chairman to determine what form the legislation will take. The Chair is perfectly clear that it is germane to the bill at this point, and the gentleman from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, it is well known to the membership of the House that at the beginning of this war the Transportation Corps was a part of the Quartermaster's Department; that for many months at least after the United States had entered into the European conflict the War Department absolutely failed to function. I do not believe there is anyone on either side of the aisle who will not agree with me in this statement. I do not believe any man or set of men ought to be held to strict accountability for that condition of affairs. Transportation had more to do with the failure of the War Department to function than any other one branch of the service. My home is located near Camp Sherman. In the fall of the year 1917 there were thousands of boys brought into that cantonment. They were there without blankets when cold weather began, without proper clothing, either outer or under clothing. Many of them contracted colds which developed into pneumonia, and thousands died because our transportation system failed. Within 200 miles of Camp Sherman, crowded on sidetracks of the railroads, were carload after carload of equipment for the various cantonments that did not reach in time to save the lives of those boys, for the reason that there was no one in charge of the transportation system of this country that knew anything about it connected with the War Department.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. For a short question.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think that we ought to establish a separate corps, a special laundry corps?

Mr. KEARNS. I thought the gentleman had a serious question to propound.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a serious question. The washing has to be done; they have to have clean clothes.

Mr. KEARNS. This amendment, if carried, will create no extra office, no extra officers. It will not create one additional enlisted man, and it will not cost one dollar more of expense to the Government of the United States, because every one of these men and officers under this amendment are to be taken from the Quartermaster Corps and transferred to the Transportation Corps. I can not help but recall the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] at this moment in which he assaulted the membership of this House because they had voted for a separate corps in this bill.

In his remarks he also included this amendment, which seeks to create a separate transportation corps. He said that it will cost millions of dollars more money and that the extravagance of this House in voting in the other amendment and in the proposed proposition of voting in the second amendment will create a cost to the people of the United States of millions of dollars and that the taxpayers will never stand for it. I want to say to him that when he made that statement he assaulted two Republicans who are now seeking the Republican nomination for the Presidency of the United States. Gen. Wood is on record as saying that a separate transportation system is absolutely necessary to make the War Department function. Gen. Pershing, who is at least a receptive candidate for the Presidency of the United States—and I believe he would accept the nomination from the Republican Party—is on record for what the gentleman from Wyoming calls this wild bit of extravagance; and I want to read you what Gen. Pershing has said on this very important question, to find out if his opinion is going to be as controlling in your minds as is the opinion of the membership on either side of this aisle. Gen. Pershing testified before the Committee on Military Affairs. The Committee on Military Affairs consumed several months in taking the testimony of various officers of the War Department——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have on several occasions since this bill came before the House undertaken to express my opinion concerning the transportation service of the Army. It is useless to repeat all that I have said in the past, but I want to repeat one thing that I did say, and that is that this House only a few days ago passed the railroad bill and turned over to the War Department the matter of the control and operation of the boats that we have on the inland waters of the country, which the Government acquired during the war, and that these boats were turned over to the War Department by us deliberately, knowing that the War Department had the transportation service organized, prepared to handle that service, and if you destroy that service you will have no means in the War Department for handling that inland transportation.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I have not the time. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] was about to read the expression of opinion by Gen. Pershing on this service, but did not have time, and that I propose now to read. He said:

In reference to the Transportation Corps and the Motor Transport Corps, from our experience in France it is believed to be in the interest of efficiency, and it would also avoid duplication of overhead expenses, to have a transportation corps which will include all classes of transportation, rail, water, motor transport, and animal-drawn transport. There is objection to having it function under any one of the ordinary departments, because it must view the problem in the interest of all departments alike.

The argument that I have been trying to make here for the past two days has been that the Quartermaster Corps has interests of its own, and that it has not the time nor the facility nor the inclination to give to the transportation of the Army, its men, its supplies, and its matériel that ought to be given to it, and that can be obtained only by putting this in a separate corps. I therefore urge that this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be agreed to. In support of my contention I call attention to the following memorandum:

THE TRANSPORTATION SERVICE.

WHAT IT IS.

1. The transportation service, United States Army, is organized into four divisions, under the Chief of Transportation, as follows:

Administrative division
Rail transportation division.
Water transportation division.
Animal-drawn transportation division.

It combines the embarkation service, established in August, 1917, and the inland traffic service, established a little later, when it was found that, in order to enforce the priorities of the embarkation service, it was necessary not only to have jurisdiction over shipments but over carriers as well.

The further logical development was the coalescence of the two services into one, the transportation service, which thus became the fourth of the four fundamental services which have developed as the centralized supply system of the Army, reporting to and under the supervision of the director of purchase, storage and traffic. Its duties consist of:

All that pertains to the routing, inland and coastwise, of troops and property of the War Department, by rail, ship, or animal-drawn transportation, and the conduct of all negotiations with inland carriers with respect to questions affecting such transportation; the movement of all property of the War Department, to prevent congestion, and to obtain preferential movements thereof; coordination of rail movements required in the handling of supplies destined for shipment overseas with shipments by the Allies.

The transportation of troops and supplies overseas, embarkation and overseas service relating to the Army program, including the employment of all Army transports, harbor floating equipment, and new construction in connection therewith, except the construction and control of floating equipment operated by the Corps of Engineers for river, harbor, and fortification work, and the control of the Army mine-planter service; such commercial shipping as may be used to supplement that service, including all arrangements with the Navy Department for convoy service; all primary ports of embarkation, expeditionary ports, and concentration camps connected therewith; courier service between the War Department and general headquarters American Expeditionary Forces.

To this it is the desire and the unprejudiced judgment of officers of long experience, headed by Gen. John J. Pershing, to combine the Motor Transport Service, which was the outgrowth of war conditions, and which experience shows should be part of a single consolidated transportation corps.

WHAT IT HAS ACCOMPLISHED.

By organizing and placing in operation a system of traffic control the embarkation service and inland traffic service were able to clear up the congestion at the seaboard which threatened to block all Atlantic ports and paralyze the overseas movements of troops and supplies.

With the establishment of the release system for the control of cargo shipments the embarkation service was able to control shipments to seaboard and thence overseas in such a manner as fully to establish priorities in the movement, permitting supplies urgently needed to be given first priority. This, in connection with a follow-up system, resulted in efficient movement of cargo overseas.

From May 1, 1917, to June 30, 1919, the Transportation Service routed 13,890,691 men to camp and ports over the several railroad lines in the United States.

Within a period of 18 months a transport fleet of 616 vessels was built up from the small beginning of seven permanent transports in the service at the commencement of our overseas operations. The fleet, on November 11, 1918, when it reached its height, had a total dead-weight of 3,557,000 tons. Practically this entire fleet has been returned to the Shipping Board or to the commercial companies at this time.

Within 18 months after the declaration of war 2,086,000 men were transported to France. The greatest number of men transported in any one month to France was 306,000, including all classes of personnel, 313,000, during the month of July, 1918.

Of the total American forces in France on November 11, 1918, 2,086,000, there were embarked from France for the United States between November 11, 1918, and June 30, 1919, 1,606,074 men. Of this number 1,338,620 men, or 84 per cent of the total, were returned in American-flag ships; 134,445, or 8 per cent of the total, in British or British-controlled tonnage; 40,418, or 2 per cent, in French-flag ships; 45,466, or 3 per cent, in Italian-flag ships; and 46,125 in ships of other countries, including Dutch and Spanish.

German tonnage taken over at the outbreak of the war transported to France an army of over half a million men, and up to June, 1919, had returned 409,516 of that number to the United States. In all, they transported both ways 931,619 American troops, and of this number the transport Leviathan alone carried 175,571.

Unquestionably, the successful movement of men and war materials throughout the United States and overseas was made possible only by reason of a centrally controlled transportation system. Centralized transportation control also enabled the War Department to maintain a secrecy in regard to movement of personnel and supplies so essential in war times. This secrecy would have been difficult if the several bureaus had been handling transportation matters.

By the readjustment of transportation rates with the British Government there was saved to the United States $67,753,698.79.

Approximately $66,000,000 was saved by returning to the United States 300,000 men in two months, and an additional 300,000 men one month sooner than the original schedule contemplated.

The calculations are based on the cost of maintaining a man in the service, which approximately is $73 per man per month. In addition to that amount, the indirect saving was considerable, in that we were able to reduce our cargo and troop fleet rapidly after the quick return of the men, thereby saving charter hire.

Rail transportation for 8,500,000 men was provided from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1919; approximately 40,000,000 tons of freight were moved, and 11,225,000 tons of this freight was handled by transportation orders issued in the United States.

During the year 1918–19, 1,512 consolidation locomotives of the 107-ton type were shipped from New York to France; of these 497 were shipped set up on their own wheels, so they could be unloaded on the track in France, thus greatly relieving the French assembling plants. It took 24 hours to bring a locomotive from the shop where it was built to the New Jersey terminals; it took six hours to transfer the locomotive from the rail to the car float; six hours later the locomotive had reached the ship's side; in one hour it had been swung to the ship's hold; nine days later and the locomotive had been carried from New York to France. When the armistice was signed the Army was prepared to ship set-up locomotives at the rate of 200 a month.

Between July 1, 1918, and June 30, 1919, 5,185,000 tons of Army cargo were shipped to the American Expeditionary Forces, including shipments to the French. The cargo returned to the United States from the American Expeditionary Forces during the fiscal year 1919 totaled 533,797 short tons.

When the armistice was signed the total troop capacity of American flag transports, under the control of the United States, was 111,783 men. It was quite evident that the War Department could not expect from the allied governments the same assistance in the return of American forces that we had received in transporting them overseas, so it was necessary to devise other means of promptly bringing the American Army home. With all the shipping that the Allies could muster during the emergency in the spring and summer of 1918, it was possible to transport only a little over 306,000 American troops in any one month. In spite of the fact that at the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918, the American flag transports of all kinds had a capacity of barely 110,000 troops per month, operated at maximum efficiency, yet it will be noted that during the month of April, 1919, there were transported on American-flag ships alone 246,209, and by June of the same year United States tonnage returned 327,645 American troops.

Up to June 30, 1919, the War Department had redelivered to the United States Shipping Board, since the signing of the armistice, 372 vessels, with a total dead-weight of 2,569,692 tons. These vessels have been returned to their owners after careful survey by a joint board consisting of a representative of the owners, the Shipping Board, and the Navy and War Departments. In very few cases has the matter of redelivery been disputed by the owners, the policy of the War Department being to deal fairly with the owners in returning their vessels in as near as possible the same condition as when received, fair wear and tear excepted.

Out of a total of over 616 vessels in Army service between the declaration of war and the present only 33 vessels have been lost. Many vessels have experienced accident, but the injuries, in the overwhelming majority, have been reparable.

An Army transport reserve has been established and there has been recommended to the Secretary of War for his approval a policy which will insure to the United States a nucleus of a transport fleet and at the same time result in building up and training a transport reserve force, stimulate the extension of our commerce by assigning to such service every available vessel under the American flag not needed strictly for military naval needs, and in no way hamper or interfere with commercial operation of these vessels, an only requirement being that the vessels are properly maintained.

HOW IT CAME INTO EXISTENCE.

1. Prior to the outbreak of the war and during the first three months of hostilities the movement of troops and supplies was handled through the land and water branches of the Transportation Division of the Quartermaster Corps and through transportation officers of the various corps. The Quartermaster Corps was highly decentralized and transacted local business at any point through the nearest depot quartermaster. There was also at each important port a general superintendent of Army Transport Service charged with handling the operations of transports and responsible to the local depot quartermaster.

2. It was soon foreseen that peace-time machinery and methods would be inadequate to handle the problems of transportation which would develop. The first necessity appeared to be for the establishment of administrative organization at the ports along the seaboard through which the greater part of the stores of supply must pass on their way to Europe.

3. The port of embarkation at New York was ordered organized June 6, 1917, and Newport News by a port commander designated on July 7, 1917.

4. By virtue of paragraph g, Field Service Regulations 257, the superintendent of Army Transport Service at the port was placed under the jurisdiction of the commanding general of the port. Prior to the establishment of the embarkation service on August 4, 1917, only 25,000 troops had been shipped to France.

5. By virtue of the order of August 4, 1917, the chief of embarkation had direct supervision of all movements of supplies from points of origin to ports of embarkation and was charged with the duty of arranging that all supplies for our forces in Europe should be forwarded in the most expeditious and convenient manner.

6. The functions which the embarkation service performed at the beginning, either directly or through the commanding general of the ports, were:

(a) To allocate the troops and freight to the various transport vessels.

(b) To supervise the loading of the troops and freight.

(c) To prevent the shipment of freight to the port before the port was ready to handle it.

(d) To trace the movement of freight which was urgently needed for shipment.

7. The water transportation branch of the Quartermaster Corps was merged with the embarkation service and became an integral part of it. All troops and supplies destined for the war zone were moved under the jurisdiction of the embarkation service. All other movements of troops and supplies were made independently by the Quartermaster Corps or the supply bureaus, the others of which were the Ordnance, Engineer, Signal, and Medical Departments.

8. The result of this was that at the end of the fall, 1917, due to the bureau system of procurement, a system of uncoordinated purchase, of many premature and unnecessary shipments, of competition for transportation facilities in which shipments of supplies were not in any way synchronized or coordinated with the developing Army program, there was inefficient utilization of cargo, the clogging of port and storage facilities, and the jamming of traffic far inland from the seaboard.

9. The proper principle of control was struck in the establishment of the release system. The procuring bureaus were put under obligation to initiate shipments by rail for embarkation only upon release by the embarkation service, the release signifying that the supplies concerned could or would be adequately handled at the port. Unfortunately, the obligations imposed were not always observed by the procuring bureaus and the embarkation service was at first without power to make its control mandatory.

10. This control became possible later, however, when the division of inland transportation was established, which was not only an agency of the War Department but of the Railroad Administration and was able, through its transportation orders, to make the principle of control of shipments at points of origin mandatory upon the carriers. With the organization of the storage and traffic service, the chief of embarkation was ordered to report to its director, and the appointment of the director of storage and traffic brought under one jurisdiction the whole problem of the movement and handling of Army supplies from the time they left the factories to their landing in France or delivery to camps in the United States.

11. The director of storage and traffic was charged with—

(a) All movements of troops, as well as of munitions and of supplies of every kind, including raw materials and finished products, both during manufacture and after assembly, to points of embarkation, interior points and overseas points, and in and out of all storage.

(b) All inland traffic, embarkation service, and overseas services relating to the Army program, including the employment of all Army transports engaged in the trans-Atlantic service, and such commercial shipping as might be used to supplement that service, including all arrangements with the Navy Department for convoy service.

(c) Direct correspondence between the chief of embarkation and the commanding officers of ports of embarkation was authorized * * *. In general, this officer was charged with the duty of arranging that all supplies for our forces in this country and in Europe should be forwarded in the most expeditious and convenient manner, and to that end he was authorized to exercise control of Army shipments, both within the territory of the United States and as the same related to the overseas haul.

12. The embarkation service was already a going concern and the creation of the storage and traffic service made no immediate change in its organization, functions, or relationship. To carry out more completely, however, the broad powers of the director of storage and traffic, the division of inland transportation was created as coordinate with the embarkation service.

13. The embarkation service maintained a singular continuity of organization and existence in a period when constant adjustment and readjustment was the rule. When the storage and traffic service developed into the Purchase, Storage, and Traffic Division in April, 1918, the embarkation service became one of the four main subdivisions of that organization. When the latter organization was reorganized during the latter part of August, the embarkation service continued as one of the main operating departments. Its internal administration also met with little change. The organization as given by the chief of the embarkation service in a report to the Director of Purchase, Storage, and Traffic included four subdivisions or sections. No provision was made in any of these sections for financing, chartering, or constructing and altering vessels. These functions were originally carried on by the water transportation branch during the greater part of the war period as a separate entity. In November, 1918, however, the water transportation branch was assimilated into the structure of the embarkation service, whose organization was altered somewhat in the process.

14. The embarkation service, as has already been pointed out, had developed a fairly permanent organization as early as December, 1917. From this time on it built up the tremendous working agencies at the two primary ports and the expeditionary depots at the other ports, which made possible that never-faltering procession of men and munitions, so heartening to the Allies and so disconcerting to the enemy across the Atlantic. It followed the movement of these troops and supplies from point of origin in this county to port in France.

15. Troop priorities, as laid down by the operations division, were handled by the embarkation service. Overseas orders of casual officers obtained the approval and release of the director of embarkation. Every ship that possibly could be spared was negotiated for by the director of embarkation. His efforts brought forth ships from all nations and ports of the world. All were pressed into our service in the least possible time.

16. The system of releasing freight by the embarkation service assisted tremendously in cleaning up the freight congestion which occurred in the winter of 1917–18. The outstanding achievement of the embarkation service was the bringing of order out of chaos in the situation which existed at the ports. In so doing it eliminated all congestion, made proper provision for the equipment of troops as they were sent overseas, brought into the service of the Army a very large increase in tonnage, whereby the monthly number of troops transported was brought up to approximately 300,000, directed the transportation of all of the subsistence and supplies required for the overseas army, and in so doing apportioned the available cargo space to the various goods to be transported, so that, in so far as supplies were available, shipments were substantially in accordance with cable requirements. Such accomplishments would have been outside the range of possibility had arrangements for shipping been left to be worked out along independent bureau lines.

TRANSPORT FLEETS.

17. At the outbreak of the war our transport service consisted of few vessels; as a matter of fact, there were seven actually under the control of the War Department. Most of these were then operating in the Pacific. A start was made by chartering a few of the American merchant steamers immediately at hand, and by the end of June, 1917, there was in the service troopships with a dead-weight of 46,000 tons and six cargo ships with a dead-weight of 48,000 tons. From this small beginning there was developed the trans-Atlantic fleet, which on November 1 aggregated 512 vessels, with a total dead-weight of 3,251,000 tons. In addition to this, a cross-channel fleet was built up numbering 104 vessels, with an aggregate tonnage of 311,000, making a total fleet of 616 vessels.

18. In building up this fleet, the first great increment in the matter of troop transports came by the seizure and taking over of German interned vessels, which entered the service during the fall of 1917, aggregating 460,000 dead-weight tons. In the spring of 1918 the taking over of the Dutch vessels gave the Army an additional 300,000 dead-weight tons.

19. Troop movement: On June 30, 1918, 100 British and allied vessels were finally engaged in the transportation of the great American Army overseas. The embarkation service sent overseas more than 2,000,000 men and approximately 9,000,000 tons of cargo over a line of communication 3,500 miles long, subject to constant attack by enemy submarines. Such a performance has not been excelled in any war.

20. Return troop movements: When the armistice was signed the total troop capacity of American-flag transport under the control of the United States was 111,783 men. It was quite evident that the War Department could not expect from the allied Governments the same assistance in the return of American forces that had been received in transporting them overseas, so it was necessary to devise other means of promptly bringing the American Army home.

21. Immediately following the signing of the armistice steps were taken by the director of embarkation to increase the American transport fleet as rapidly as possible. The work of converting some 58 cargo transports was promptly undertaken; the Navy assigned battleships and cruisers for transport service; 10 German passenger ships were obtained and equipped for carrying American troops; and the War Department negotiated successfully with the Italian, French, Spanish, and Dutch for the utilization of suitable passenger vessels for the return of the American forces. These steps increased the troop fleet operating in the return of the American forces to a maximum of 173 vessels in service on June 23, 1919. This was made up as follows:

	Number.	Capacity.
American	141	364,069
British	4	5,621
Italian	13	27,572
French	8	10,954
Spanish	4	4,185
Dutch	3	6,850
Total	173	419,251

22. The return movement reached its maximum during the month of June, when all records heretofore established were broken by the embarkation in French ports of 364,166 and the landing in American ports of 343,786.

23. With all the shipping that the Allies could muster during the emergency in the spring and summer of 1918, it was possible to transport only a little over 306,000 American troops in any one month. In spite of the fact that at the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918, the American-flag transports of all kinds had a capacity barely 110,000 troops per month, operated at maximum efficiency, yet it will be noted that during the month of April, 1919, there were transported on American-flag ships alone 246,209, and in June of the same year United States tonnage returned 327,654 American troops.

WHAT THE GERMANS FIGURED THE UNITED STATES COULD DO.

1. In a statement issued by German great headquarters the Germans were assured that the United States could not transport and furnish with equipment 500,000 men in one year.

WHAT OUR GENERAL STAFF FIGURED THE UNITED STATES COULD DO.

1. No studies made by the General Staff in this country prior to the war or during the early period of the war had contemplated the practicability of transporting more than 100,000 men a month across the Atlantic. A War Department estimate of December, 1917, contemplated 1,030,000 men in France by October 1, 1918. An estimate of March 1, 1918, gave us 1,088,000 by the same time. General Headquarters, France, estimated 771,000 for the same period.

2. On July 1, 1918, the transportation service had embarked 1,000,000 men, and it embarked another 1,000,000 in the next four months. On November 11, 1918, the strength of the American forces in France exceeded that of the English, and would have exceeded that of the French in two more months.

[Extract from a study by the American General Staff, Dec. 9, 1916, estimating what the Germans could have done after 44 years of planning.]

PREPAREDNESS OF GERMANY FOR OVERSEAS EXPEDITION.

Strength of army, 5,000,000; tonnage available of ships with capactiy over 3,000 tons, 3,569,962; over 2,000 tons, 4,018,185.

First expedition, using 50 per cent of tonnage given over 3,000 tons, 387,000 men, 81,250 animals. Time needed to load and cross ocean with first expedition, 15.8 days.

Second expedition, using 75 per cent of tonnage given, 440,000 men, 94,600 horses. Time needed to return, load, and recross with the second expedition, 30.8 days.

This is allowing Germany a mobilized army, the undisputed master of the seas, taking no account of submarine losses, sinking by raiders, etc. Allowing 3 tons per man and 8 tons per animal for all ships over 3,000 tons, the General Staff figured that in about 31 days she could have transported and landed under such conditions: First expedition, 15.8 days, 387,000 men, 81,250 animals. Second expedition, 30.8 days, 440,000 men, 94,600 animals. (If the second expedition could do this, then logically the third, fourth, etc., could do the same, and we would have for the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth:) Third expedition, 30.8 days, 440,000 men, 94,600 animals. Fourth expedition, 30.8 days, 440,000 men, 94,600 animals. Fifth expedition, 30.8 days, 440,000 men, 94,600 animals. Sixth expedition, 30.8 days, 440,000 men, 94,600 animals. Totals, 169.8 days, 2,587,000 men, 554,250 animals.

This would give the total proportion of 1 animal to 4.6 men.

Our peace total strength allows to a division of 16,989 men 4,799 animals, or 1 animal to 3.5 men.

It will be observed that this table was prepared in 1916, and the developments of the war introduced factors hitherto undeterminable but which have assumed a definite form, to wit, the time necessary to turn around, i. e., to refit, recoal, etc., the various types of vessels, troop, cargo, and animal.

The calculations assumed that those 5,000,000 men were assembled, equipped, and ready to embark; that animal ships were prepared; that ports of embarkation were in excellent running order; and that everything would move without a hitch, the vessels being recoaled simultaneously by some miraculous means requiring a minimum of time; that arms and munitions were assembled already to load without loss of time; and that there was absolute control of the seas (submarines were not then regarded as a factor). In other words, the assumption was made that "the number of thoroughly trained and organized troops an enemy can bring in the first and succeeding expeditions is a function of—

"(b) The size of the enemy's army.

"(c) The number, size, and speed of the vessels of the enemy's merchant marine that can be used as transports," and neglected many of the above-quoted considerations.

As a matter of fact, Gen. March, Chief of Staff United States Army, states that by the addition of improved methods of loading and embarkation the American Transportation Service reduced both the time of turn around and the amount of cargo carried.

The quickest cycle, i. e., crossing, landing, unloading, reloading, and return of Army ship in the United States service is the Great Northern, which required 12 days, 43 minutes. This is the best record ever made by any transport.

Taking the operation of the fleet and selecting the last 10 ships sailing in any weekly period, the average turn around of troop ships for November, December, 1918, January, February, and March, 1919, was 37 days, or an average of 3.7 days per ship.

For the same number of cargo ships it was 8.5 days per ship.

The United States purchased abroad a tremendous tonnage. In addition, the amount of tonnage necessary to be transported abroad for our service ranged from 80 pounds per man per day, at the beginning, to 30 pounds per man per day at its lowest ebb (when troops were moving faster) to the final required average of 50 pounds per man per day. Therefore in the calculation of the number of men (Palmer's figures) to be transported, due allowance must be made for cargo.

So it will easily be seen that the calculations of our General Staff were considerably out; in fact, the estimate made by the Germans that the United States could only transport 500,000 men in a year was based upon German experience in transporting troops through the Baltic, and, according to their calculations, they themselves (considering that at the time their calculations were made, in the middle of 1916, our total tonnage available was scarcely 2,000,000 tons, as compared to their 3,569,962, or about 4/7) could only see their way clear to transporting 7/4 of 500,000 men, or 875,000 men in a year.

In four months—July, August, September, and October, 1918—the Transportation Service sent over more than 1,000,000 men, and was operating a continuous stream of cargo ships in addition.

So much for the facts, now let us see what competent authorities think of these facts.

Secretary of War Baker, testimony before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs:

"We had the whole transportation end at this side, and it was our job. The work Gen. Hines has done as chief of the transportation section is a work of conspicuous brilliancy, probably as brilliant as any officer in the Army.

"The CHAIRMAN. Ordinarily the railroad transportation is much the larger job of the Chief of Transportation?

"Secretary BAKER. Yes; in times of peace it certainly is.

"The CHAIRMAN. And some of us have been wondering whether the railroad transportation could not be combined with motor transport.

"Secretary BAKER. I do not see why they could not be, although they are entirely different; but in a peace-time establishment undoubtedly one person could do both."

Gen. John J. Pershing, commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces, before the Senate committee: "The Army should have one transportation corps to supervise all transportation."

Gen. Peyton C. March, Chief of Staff, annual report for 1919: "At the time the armistice with Germany was signed on November 11, 1918, the United States had sent across 3,000 miles of ocean more than 2,000,000 men and a vast quantity of supplies for their support and use. This American activity had been a positive factor in the concluding military actions of the war, culminating in the splendid drive through the Argonne Forest to Sedan.

"Considering the distance over which the United States had to operate and the relatively short period of its participation in the war, the achievement is without parallel in the many great performances of the war. Moreover, the organization which made this achievement possible had been developed to such a point that the flow of men and supplies overseas in the ensuing six months would have been a still more impressive accomplishment.

"Upon the signing of the armistice there was both the time and the opportunity for a clearer definition of the functions and organization of the existing agencies than had been practicable during the active continuation of the war. This work was promptly undertaken, and by June 30, 1919, the end of the period covered by this report, substantial progress has been made in this direction by a reorganization of the Purchase, Storage and Traffic Division, which, in effect, established as four separate and distinct administrative and operating services the Purchase and Storage Service (a development of the Quartermaster Department), the Transportation Service, the Financial Service, and the Real Estate Service, which, like all other operating bureaus and services of the War Department, are under the control and supervision of the Director of Purchase, Storage and Traffic, as assistant to the Chief of Staff, in all matters which pertain to the supply, transportation, and financial operations of the Army. Such control is essential to the accomplishment of any military program. That should all be included in one transportation department, and I think that would be better than to have it separated in several departments. I would not have transportation a part of any supply department, because if there are several supply departments, and one of them has control of transportation, human nature is so made that a man who might be in charge of one of those departments having transportation could send his own supplies first."

"Mr. CALDWELL. In other words, you would take it out of the Quartermaster Corps?

"Gen. HAAN. Yes."

Maj. Gen. William M. Black, Chief of Engineers, before the House Military Affairs Committee: "Where Government owned and operated agencies are used these should be consolidated and placed under the jurisdiction of transportation corps in so far as the requirements of the service will permit. There seems to be no reason why wagon transportation and water transportation should not be operated as distinct branches of the Transportation Corps; similarly where water transportation is Government owned and operated this should be another branch, or where railways are so used in the service of supply in rear of areas of operations."

Maj. Gen. Henry Jervey, Chief of Operation, General Staff, before Military Committee of the House: "It does seem logical to me to put all transportation together as one operating service."

Maj. Gen. George A. Goethals, before House Military Committee: "I am not in accord with a separate independent Motor Transport Corps. I think that ought to be under the Transportation Corps. Let us take a condition which exists in New York: Ships were being loaded at Hoboken; our supplies came in from the Bush terminals in south Brooklyn and from Newark base. We could ship things to the steamer by water and rail and wagons, all under our own control, but if we wanted to ship things by motor trucks we had to get the permission of somebody else to do it, which was bad."

Maj. Gen. George W. Burr, Assistant Chief of Staff, before House Military Committee: "In the fall of 1917 and the winter of 1917–18 there was tremendous congestion of all our ports where supplies had to be shipped from forces across the sea. The railroad situation had become impossible. * * * Senator CHAMBERLAIN said substantially that the War Department had ceased to function. I will not go that far, but I will say that the wires were badly crossed about that time, and the task that was upon the supply bureaus of the War Department was beyond their reach at that time. * * * In the course of the year, through necessity, Gen. Goethals set up certain services. * * * A department of inland traffic was created. He set up an independent service called the embarkation service. Under my jurisdiction, inland traffic and embarkation were combined into what was called the transportation service. * * *"

Maj. Gen. W. L. Sibert, Chief of Chemical Warfare Service, before the House Military Committee: "The supply problem of the Army naturally divides itself into three phases:

"1. The determination of the kind and quantity of equipment. * * *

"2. Manufacture and storage of this material.

"3. The movement of the equipment from storage to the troops, and that, again, is a military proposition."

Maj. Gen. Henry A. Sharpe, formerly Quartermaster General, before the House Military Committee: "I also contemplated forming in the same way that Secretary Root, when he made his proposition in 1902 for a consolidation, provided for a 'transportation department' with a general officer at the head of it, all in this combined corps (a supply corps).

"The law of 1885 required the Quartermaster Department to act as the shipping agent for all the executive departments of the Government, and they had so functioned. I think it was an oversight at the time of the passage of these laws, for it did create embarrassment and did create congestion in various places because they had various people functioning on the matter of transportation."

Maj. Gen. Coe, Chief of Coast Artillery, before the House Military Committee: "I do not feel qualified to express a very direct opinion on question of transportation; but from all that I have seen and from conversations that I have had with various people it is my impression that all transportation should be consolidated."

Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, chief of transportation, before the House Military Committee: "In 1917, when we started our overseas operations and the embarkation service attempted to exercise that control which was given it in the movement of supplies, we soon found that that control was not sufficient to prevent the congestion of our ports. In other words, the embarkation service at that time had only the control of shipments, and regulation of these shipments pertained to supplies and troops going overseas; that control did not cover the movement of supplies inland, such as the movement of supplies to the port of New York by the depot quartermaster, nor did it in any way have control over the movement of supplies for the Allies or commercial interests. The lack of that control resulted in exactly what could have been expected, practically the blocking of all our ports in the late fall of 1917.

"One of the first duties that Gen. Goethals had to perform when he came in as Acting Quartermaster General and started the organization of the purchase, storage and traffic division of the General Staff was to take immediate measures to establish some agency to control entirely all movement of troops and supplies from the initial point oversea. That resulted in bringing into the War Department what was then known as another section of the purchase, storage and traffic division, or the inland traffic service; Gen. Goethals appointed as the head of that service Mr. Adams.

"Approximately 30,000 carloads of Government freight, including that of the War Department and that of the Allies, were on hand at the ports of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Newport News, and Norfolk. There were approximately 2,000 cars under load with War Department property, more than 300 carloads on piers, and approximately 1,100 on the ground. These figures are exclusive of coal and grain in bulk.

"On March 30, 1918, there was a total of 22,118 cars of Government property, including that of the Allies, at the same ports, but the War Department property had been reduced to a total of 1,938 carloads, including that on wheels, on piers, and on the ground. This reflects, during the period of great difficulty in railway operation, something of the result accomplished. In other words, within a short period the congestion started to clear up.

"The bureaus—Quartermaster, Ordnance, Engineers, Signal Corps, Medical Department—quite naturally at the outset of the war had the greatest desire that their supplies would reach the front on time and ahead of some other bureaus. It was quite natural. It resulted in competition, which was as great in the transportation problem as in the purchase problem, and unless it was controlled it was quite to be expected that we would have what did result—the congestion of the fall of 1917. I have been a strong advocate of combining in the War Department all the activities for transportation in one corps. I believe and our experience during this emergency justifies me in stating that transportation headed up to one agency to handle all forms of transportation can render efficient service either for the War Department or for any other business concern. Logically, a transportation service should be organized into four main divisions—rail, water, motorized, and animal-drawn transportation.

"A skeleton organization which is provided for in the Transportation Corps in this bill in time of peace will permit in the event of an emergency of expanding these divisions to cover, I believe, any transportation problem. It offers the advantage to the Secretary of War, or the Chief of Staff, or the commanding general of our forces in the field of having one hand to deal with on transportation matters.

"As a matter of economy, the combining of all transportation, so far as this bill is concerned, would result in a material reduction in overhead. I believe that reduction can be safely made without in any way endangering the efficiency of the transportation service for the War Department. It is quite true that prior to the establishment of the embarkation service all transportation, so far as the law was concerned, was supposed to be handled in the Quartermaster Corps, and that was a division in that office. I know that that is correct, because I had an opportunity in 1912 of serving for a short time as head of that division.

"While the Quartermaster Corps was charged under the law and had appropriations to cover water, rail, wagon, and motor transportation, it was quite evident from the activities of the several bureaus immediately after we entered the war that that office was not controlling all transportation, and that the bureaus were setting up in their own organizations transportation divisions to handle transportation for their supplies. That was particularly true of the Ordnance Department, and they went so far as to provide an organization in the field which was charged with that duty. That matter led up, Mr. Chairman, necessarily to the point as to whether a division in the Quartermaster General's office could handle all the transportation.

"It was quite evident at the outset that the designation of that division of the Quartermaster General's office to handle water transportation alone would result in an organization almost as large as the Quartermaster Corps in time of peace. It is my opinion that the transportation organization for an emergency is an activity and a service which is large enough to justify it being independent.

"I think it should be closely coordinated with all other activities of supply in whatever means that coordination may be brought about, either by heading it up into a permanent supply corps or by having the coordination exercised by the General Staff. When we have a water-transportation problem which we had, a problem of rail transportation, and of motor transportation, and wagon transportation, you have an organization which, in my opinion, in time of an emergency such as the one we have just passed through which would justify having a major general at its head and a brigadier general at the head of each of the main divisions of that organization, and that in itself would be practicaly as large as the Quartermaster Corps.

"The water transportation division alone, at its height, had an organization with 5 major generals and 54,000 men engaged in its work, not counting Navy crews operating for us.

"I would not attach any function of transportation to any of the bureaus. I believe, no matter what bureau had transportation, all the bureaus would try to be fair in the handling of that transportation, but I feel if we assigned it to one bureau, some of the other bureaus at some time during the operations would question whether the supplies of that bureau would not be getting priority over the supplies of some other bureau.

"The matter of priority, Mr. Chairman, was a very important one, not only in transportation but in every thing; in the obtaining of material and everything that went with it. The priorities on transportation, so far as movements by rail in the United States were concerned, was established and operated through the Railroad Administration under Judge Lovett, who handled priorities in movements and the release system, which was established in the inland transportation service of the War Department Transportation Service.

"If we had one supply corps, as a business house, for instance, in the War Department, it might be possible, then, for transportation to be a division of that supply corps. As long as we have, as we have now, many agencies of supply, I believe that greater service for all agencies of the War Department will be obtained by having a man who is handling transportation have a separate organization of transportation, whose whole interest is to serve those agencies and follow whatever priority is set up, and that provides responsibility for the final operations.

"Mr. GREENE. For the benefit of the record and to refresh our own recollection, what five sources of supply would be concerned in that transportation?

"Gen. HINES. They would handle the supplies for the Quartermaster Corps, or from what is now known as the Quartermaster General's office, purchase and storage, the Ordnance Corps, the Engineer Corps, and the Signal Corps.

"Now, we have other new services which, during the war at least, had supplies, like the gas service and the air service, which would make more than five.

"I believe that even though supplies are going overseas, the responsibility should never be divided from the time they start until they land, and that can be accomplished by having the transportation service put supplies temporarily in storage, just as much as having ordnance supplies in storage. When it comes to taking supplies from the storehouse to the ship, there is no necessity for having two accounts.

"When I was appointed Chief of the Transportation Service in the early days the demurrage account of the War Department amounted to approximately $100,000 a month. Demurrage, in my opinion, is nothing more than neglect. It means that you make a shipment when you are not sure that the shipment can be taken care of and the cars can not promptly be unloaded. I gave instructions that we would follow up energetically every demurrage account and try to fix the responsibility, and for the month of July the demurrage account was $3,000. I contend the Quartermaster Corps is only interested in its supplies, and the Chief of Ordnance is only interested in his, and there was no one agency that was particularly interested in the whole transportation problem. Some of these matters will certainly be overlooked, and it will cost the Government a great deal of money if we return to the old system."

WHAT ARE THE ARGUMENTS AGAINST THE TRANSPORTATION CORPS?

Now, let us examine any arguments which have been or may be advanced against the permanent organization of a transportation service.

Brig. Gen. Charles Drake, Chief of Motor Transport Service, thinks that motor transportation should be separate.

Maj. Gen. Harry L. Rogers, Quartermaster General, contends that all the separate organizations that were made at the beginning of the war are simply branches or divisions of the old Quartermaster Corps organization, that they are run by the same officers who ran them as divisions of the Quartermaster Corps, and by the same organizations that they had. Each organization operates as a separate organization instead of operating as a division of the Quartermaster Corps office.

He contends that the various offshoots of the Quartermaster Department have resulted in vastly increased personnel and overhead expenses; a lack of coordination resulting in inefficiency.

The criticisms of Maj. Gen. C. C. Williams, Chief of Ordnance, are not particularly leveled at the Transportation Service, but rather at the purchase and inspection divisions of the General Staff. As far as his objections to the General Staff "operating" are concerned, there seems to be no opposition to his position. Gen. Hines, Chief of Transportation, is on record as being radically opposed to the General Staff doing any operating and it is not the intention of those who are in favor of a separate transportation service to have anything but an operating department functioning in accordance with a coordinated plan of operations for the whole Army.

Gen. Drake's proposition to have a separate transportation corps has received no support from any other source, and would result in increased personnel and overhead expenses.

Gen. Rogers's statements and opinions are directly opposed by those of Gen. Burr.

This is natural. Gen. Burr looks at the matter from the viewpoint of what was actually accomplished by the present organization and Gen. Rogers from the viewpoint of what might have been accomplished in the past or could be accomplished in the future.

It is interesting to note, however, that both these general officers are in favor of a transportation service embodying all classes of transportation—water, rail, motor, and animal-drawn transportation. Gen. Rogers would have it embodied as a service under the Quartermaster General. Gen. Burr would have it separate from the Quartermaster Department and a part of the Purchase, Storage and Traffic.

So that the vital point at issue with them is not that they disagree as to the necessity of one transportation service, but simply whether it should be an independent agency or a dependent branch of a bureau.

Unquestionably it should be an operating service by itself, and from the opinions of all the eminent men quoted let us get back to Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S remark that in the winter of 1917–18 "the War Department had ceased to function."

Shipping was tied up; docks crowded, railways congested, competition for transportation rife, unsuitable cargoes loaded, valuable space wasted, supplies urgently needed in France tied up to accommodate some shrewd bureau.

Look at the situation after the embarkation service and inland traffic service began to function and the wheels to go around.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have felt rather constrained to be somewhat passive while recent details have been before the House, because I was more particularly and earnestly concerned in the ground plan. I have felt that perhaps the greater concern of the Committee on Military Affairs should be to get its bill through with the proposed changes that are of vital importance to a reorganized and reconstituted Army, and that if we got our foundation laid and the walls up and the roof over it, I would not waste much time of this House to try to influence it to move a partition this way or that way or put a window here or a window there. I think most of this interior bureau matter amounts to very little for our present purposes in the last analysis, because we are now trying to lay some new permanent foundation.

I think it is very unwise for anybody to try to reckon a normal peace-time basis exclusively upon what we did in the emergency and the tremendous crush and press of war. In war it is necessary most minutely to specialize at times, because any one department under which you sought to centralize many functions would grow so expansive, so overwhelmingly large, that no one mind could finally administer it. That is obvious. But in peace time it would seem to me to be the wiser way to establish bureaus that were sufficiently coordinated in their details, and establish those details on such a good foundation inside of that bureau that if an emergency arose, that nucleus for a special service, there already made, might be detached and set up on an independent foundation and made to operate in the larger way that the war or necessities demanded.

There is danger in carrying this decentralization too far. I remember very well when we were in the midst of the war that some of the people who are strong on blue-print diagrams about system and method and efficiency were showing me what they proposed to do with the Ordnance Department. They had a beautiful genealogical table that led to no particular descent, all laid out before me, and in splendidly artistic diagrams I found there was a place where I could get a pommel, a place where I could get a cantle, a place where I could get a seat, a place where I could get a cinch, a place where I could get the stirrups, but there was no one place where I could get a whole saddle when I wanted it. And that is a situation we must always expect in this matter of too much decentralization.

What does the Quartermaster Corps do? It is a supply corps. It is like a man who gets the thing you want and gives it to you. But if you ask for something from the Quartermaster Corps and there is an intervening link of transportation before he gets it and that intervening link is under another authority, the Quartermaster Corps has to give it to another fellow to give to you. That is what it comes to. So if he puts it on a means of transportation to bring to you and he does not control that transportation he does not supply. He is getting it for you, to be sure, but he trusts to Divine Providence to inspire the other man, who is to give it to you, finally to deliver it to you.

That is, to my mind, the plain force of the whole argument when you get all through with it. To supply means to put it into the other man's possession, and it does not mean simply to get it for somebody and trust to somebody else to supply that somebody with it. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], in proposing this amendment, tells us that it will not cost the Government of the United States a single cent additional if this independent corps is created. Now, that is just the trouble in considering these measures and not knowing their correlation to the other committees and the work of the other committees. I have reason to know, through the investigation before the Committee on Appropriations in providing for the clerical force of this independent department, that they are estimating for this independent corps $337,000 out of the military bill, and have an estimate, if you please, in the legislative appropriation bill of $38,780, a total of $375,000 for clerical force in the District of Columbia alone. That will give you a little idea of what it means every time you attempt to create a separate bureau.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not yield now. My experience has been, and I think it is the observation of every man who has followed these appropriations, that these new bureaus are endeavoring constantly to expand. There is no one who cares to be at the head of a little bureau. The man who has 50 or 75 men on his staff in the clerical force in the city of Washington thinks he is but a small potato and he dare not even attempt to associate with the higher class until he has 500 or 1,000 under him, and he is constantly working to that end. Now, there are seven of these different departments, I dare say, that some time along in the consideration of this Army bill will ask to have a separate bureau created for them that was created for a war emergency, and there is apparently no end to their demands. I want to say if we are honest in our promises to the people that we are going to retrench in expenditures, if we are honest in promising the people that we are not going to enlarge this Army expenditure, we had better be keeping faith with them now when we have the opportunity. [Applause.] So, when gentlemen say this is just simply a shift of the service and will not cost the United States Government any more by reason of the creation of any one of these independent departments, why, he is absolutely mistaken, and I think if he would be informed he would not insist upon the reiteration of such a statement. But I wish again to call attention to the fact that when this independent transportation corps is created that the overhead expense in additional clerk hire in the District of Columbia alone amounts to an expenditure of probably $400,000, and what it will be the next year or the year from that I do not know. If we make permanent every one of these bureaus that have been created in connection with the War Department and give them all they are asking for, it will double the appropriations for the next ensuing Congress.

I think we should stop and think for a moment that instead of retrenching we are building higher and making it necessary for taxes to mount still higher in this country, thereby increasing the burden that is now resting heavily upon the taxpayers of the land. There is absolutely no use for this thing in time of peace. I do not think that there is an intelligent man who will contend there is a necessity for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Should there not be a deduction from the clerical force in the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Now, there is another thing we have to contend with each time with reference to the creation of a new bureau, and that is if you do not create the new bureau it is going to take some additional expense to run it where it now is; but you might as well say that you can take and divide a storehouse in the city of Washington into 10 different parts and contend that the 10 different parts can be conducted more cheaply than when consolidated under one overhead management. There is the trouble with reference to the business of the Government of the United States. There is not a single business house in this country that could live for one year conducted in that way.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. And is it not true that in all European armies they have this separate transportation bureau?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know anything about their methods.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. And that is the only way they got efficiency in time of war.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is absolutely unbusinesslike, and if we want to safeguard and control responsibility instead of dividing these expenses we had better be getting them under one head. That is our trouble and it always has been under this system of divided responsibility.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. What new activities does this bill as originally drawn seek to confer on the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As I understand by the bill as originally drawn it seeks to consolidate——

Mr. OLIVER. But what new activities other than those the Quartermaster's Department was engaged in prior to the war does this bill we are considering seek to confer on that department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know of any.

Mr. OLIVER. Can the gentleman state to the committee the increase in personnel in the bill as drawn to what it was before the war?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Under this bill?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I can not.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it not a fact that we have largely increased both the officer and enlisted personnel of the Quartermaster's Department, but have given it no new activities?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be true, and there may be a necessity for that for this reason, that there has never been in all the history of the Government of the United States a time when immediately following a war there has not been a material increase in the peace-time strength of all these departments.

Mr. OLIVER. What number of enlisted men does the bill as originally drawn give the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know about those things. This is not my bill.

Mr. OLIVER. How can the gentleman then argue to this House that it would not be economical to separate these corps, if he is unable to give that information?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Upon the general proposition that ought to appeal to any business man, that a house divided against itself is absolutely and of necessity more expensive than a house combined within itself.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The bill as drawn gives to the Quartermaster's Department 20,000 enlisted men.

Mr. OLIVER. And you had only 5,000 before the war? In other words, you have quadrupled the number without giving the department any new activities?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The bill as originally drawn had 20,000, and they drew 8,000 out of that number, leaving 12,000.

Mr. OLIVER. I was speaking of the bill as you drew it.

Mr. ANTHONY. If they agree to all of these amendments for all these activities, it will be 50,000, to take the place of 15,000 or 20,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say to the gentleman that there were created eight independent bureaus that did not exist prior to the war. In addition to these there were some 16 side shoots from these bureaus, spreading out their tentacles in every direction, and I can not for the life of me see how anyone from an economical standpoint can contend it would be more economical to conduct these as independent factors than if they were all consolidated under one management and under one control.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BEE. I wanted to ask unanimous consent, in view of the fact that I was compelled to be absent yesterday, that I might address the House for five minutes with reference to the court-martial proposition of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I happened to be absent on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on a different proposition in the bill from that under consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Reserving the right to object, can not the gentleman print it?

Mr. BEE. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Can not the gentleman print it?

Mr. BEE. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that since I have been in the House I have neither printed nor do I undertake to print.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman wants to commence a good reformation, because Members should print more and talk less.

Mr. BEE. If the gentleman from Illinois objects, I shall not take the time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I shall not object. But I do not think it is a reasonable request to make in the midst of the consideration of another amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I make this pro forma motion for the purpose of directing an interrogatory to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], if he will give me his attention.

The gentleman made some reference to the security of the foundation of this bill, and it called to my mind that I ought to ask him if he is quite sure that his foundation is secure, in view of the statements made yesterday by Senator WADSWORTH that enlisted men and officers are deserting? I believe that is the word he used, although it may be presumed that he meant dropping out of the service. He said that they were going out by droves, in accordance with an article published in this morning's Washington Post.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It depends altogether on conditions how I should answer that. This bill is not yet law. So it can not correct any evils as to why they are deserting.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What do you think suggested the statement by him?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I happen to remember, by reading the RECORD, that he was addressing his remarks to the Senate on the subject of Army pay.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It occurred to me in connection with that statement of Senator WADSWORTH, and the further statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, that if our Army is to be composed from the enlisted standpoint of men who are brokenhearted, who have lost hope in human existence, who are derelict, we are going to have a mighty poor Army. If men are dropping out by droves, to use the expression of the distinguished gentleman from New York in the other Chamber, because they can not make both ends meet——

Mr. BLANTON. They are not dropping out in droves, because the galleries are full right now.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is a facetious remark by the gentleman from Texas that I do not believe affects the value of the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from New York. I am assuming that the Senator from New York is in a position to make statements that are correct and that ought to have some value in the Congress of the United States. I do not think that he would lightly make a statement with reference to our Army and have that statement go out to the people of this country if it had not a true foundation. [Applause.] And if he be correct, then I say that the foundation is not secure, and that it requires better pay in order that men who join the Army, who enter the service, may do so with the knowledge that they may look into the future decently and be soldiers of a country that we might well be proud of. This Congress ought to take into consideration the suggestion thrown out, and increase the pay. I do not think we want an Army in this country to fall into the position suggested by the immortal "Tommy Atkins" of Kipling. We need an Army composed of decent, fearless men, who can live in accordance with American standards and who will seek the Army with high hopes of being able to make both ends meet while working for promotion. An Army composed of men who remain in it when they can not make ends meet, an Army composed of such enlisted men is spiritless and without the brave hearts that should make up an American Army.

We must stop the desertions or "droppings out," or the remainder will not inspire great confidence. Better to have no Army at all than an Army of underpaid men who remain in the service because they have neither the courage nor capacity to do better for themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the pending amendment has the indorsement of Gen. Pershing, Gen. Wood, the Secretary of War, and the Assistant Secretary of War, Mr. Crowell. This should in itself be sufficient to authorize the House to vote for the amendment.

The fact that the railroad bill placed new and important duties in the hands of the Secretary of War, which he has assigned to the Transportation Corps, emphasizes the importance of retaining it as a separate corps.

After the passage of the railroad bill, which conferred on the Secretary of War the duty of operating Government barges and towboats on the Black Warrior and Mississippi Rivers, and on the Erie Canal, a committee, interested in inland waterway development, called on the Secretary to request that this important work be placed in the hands of Army Engineers. The committee was informed that careful study had been given to the matter, and that the Secretary had already designated the Transportation Corps for this purpose. We found the Secretary greatly interested in the success of inland waterway transportation, and he paid a high, and, I feel sure, a deserving compliment to Gen. Hines, now in charge of the Transportation Corps. Among other things, the Secretary stated that he was one of the great finds of the war [applause], and the Senate, after studying his remarkable record, very promptly confirmed him in the advanced rank to which he was appointed by the President. The Senate evidently had in mind the efficiency of the Transportation Corps in the preparation of the Army bill and, my information is, has provided for this as a separate corps of the Army. No good reasons have been assigned why it should not remain as a separate corps. Testimony before the committee shows that the Quartermaster Department was wholly unable to carry on this important work, and the organization of a separate Transportation Corps became imperative. Since its organization no complaint has been heard, but all agree that under the administration of Gen. Hines it was one of the real contributing causes to the victory of our Army overseas.

Gen. Hines is keenly alive to the importance of inland waterway transportation, now in the hands of this corps, and has made a comprehensive study of this subject and is well prepared to continue, enlarge, and carry on this work with efficiency and success. In my opinion, it would be a serious mistake to place this important matter under the Quartermaster of the Army. The Quartermaster has many duties to perform, and I am anxious that the corps charged with the operation of the boats and barges on our inland waterways be specially qualified and designated for this work.

No economy can result from the attempt made in the bill, as originally prepared, to place so many activities in the Quartermaster Department, and the business and military reasons which prompted the Secretary of War, Gen. Pershing, Gen. Wood, and others to recommend that the Army Transport Service be kept as a separate corps should be approved by the House. Certainly it is much more important to continue this as a separate corps than it would be to create a separate Construction Corps. The work of the Transportation Corps will largely increase, whereas that of the Construction Corps will in future be materially lessened. Nothing is more important to the Army than to have a thoroughly well organized, well equipped, and efficient transportation system, and those who have given it serious thought and study feel that this can only be accomplished by maintaining a separate corps for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may have five minutes more to finish.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do not see the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] here, but I think we ought to limit the time for the debate on this paragraph.

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think it will last more than for three or four more speeches.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Kansas a request to propound?

Mr. ANTHONY. I suggest that there should be a time limit on the debate. What does the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] suggest?

Mr. CALDWELL. I think there will be only two or three more speeches on this side.

Mr. KAHN. I suggest that we close the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto at 4 o'clock, or in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California move or ask unanimous consent?

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. With the understanding that the Chair will recognize the members of the committee for at least 10 minutes of that time in defense of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. KING. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. KAHN. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does that exclude the five minutes that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has already asked for?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that time to be computed by this clock or the other one? They are about five minutes apart.

The CHAIRMAN. By the one above the Speaker's desk.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does that exclude amendments that will be offered to the preceding paragraphs?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not include any amendments except this amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is the amendment that is now pending an amendment to section 8 of the bill or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It was not so offered.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; it was.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is not so offered. I think we might as well straighten it up now.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will yield, I may say that we had quite some discussion about the matter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; I heard it from the gallery, and I noticed you were pretty well mixed up. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDWELL. It will be straightened up by the stenographer.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It will not be straightened up by the stenographer. The reading clerk straightens it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 25 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. It is the question that I wanted to ask a while ago. If this amendment is not adopted, and this service remains under the Quartermaster General's Department, will not Gen. Hines still continue to be the director of transportation? I do not know, and I just wanted to ascertain.

Mr. OLIVER. No one knows.

Mr. BLACK. I was under the impression that he would be.

Mr. OLIVER. Unquestionably the party having this matter in charge would be the Quartermaster, and I feel you would be making a serious mistake to now add largely to the duties of the Quartermaster. The officer in the Navy who corresponds to the Quartermaster in the Army has no multiplied duties of this character. The Secretary of War is deeply anxious to see that this new work now delegated to this Transportation Corps is efficiently done, and you can not have it efficiently done unless some one corps is responsible for it. [Applause.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I know somewhat in a general way about the proposition as to these several corps, and if I had known that I was to have anything to say and had tried to prepare myself, the words just pronounced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] would encompass my thoughts, and I subscribe to them heartily and particularly in reference to Gen. Hines. I believe he is a most efficient man, perhaps the best trained specialist in this country to-day on water and rail transportation in the Army.

I want at this time also to take occasion to record myself as not subscribing to the views of the gentleman from Texas in reference to the men of the Army now in the gallery. When the other proposed amendment for the creation of a construction corps was up for discussion we who favored it were met with the charge that there was a lobby, sinister or otherwise. Now we are referred to the fact that we now have Army officers in the galleries. I suppose, before the debate concludes, there may be those here who will have the temerity to say that the officers whom they admitted saw them in their offices in relation to the former referred to amendment have now transferred their activities to the galleries. I believe these men of the Army have every right to be here, as other citizens have, to listen to the discussion, and I think it ill becomes any of us here to make references of that kind, and I do not subscribe to them. [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DONOVAN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEE. In view of the fact that this is an Army reorganization bill affecting the life of the Army, I want to ask if it is not entirely natural and proper that officers of the Army in their leisure time should come to hear the debate?

Mr. DONOVAN. Absolutely.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, so far as I know, there can be no doubt as to the distinguished qualifications either of the general who presides over the division of transportation or of the general who presides over the division of construction, and if this amendment is to be determined by the qualifications of the officers in command of the division of transportation, presumably it will have the sanction of the committee.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the perpetuation of this division, which was created as an exigency of war, is necessary or in the interest of Army reorganization in peace times or in preparation for other wars. I desire, however, particularly to say something with reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] as to the action of the Secretary of War in placing under the division of transportation the activities continued by the railroad-control bill of the operation of Government-owned boats. There was, in my opinion, no good reason why the Secretary of War should have placed that activity under the division of transportation.

The division of transportation had to do not with the operation of our boats during the war, but simply with designating the movements of troops and supplies—from what ports ships should start and their ports of destination. The operation of the boats was entirely under officers of the Navy. In addition to that the movement of transports under the division of transportation during the war and up to this time has been entirely upon the ocean. The operation of these Government-owned boats is upon our interior waterways, so that of necessity in the division of transportation there can be no officers or men who have knowledge or experience or training in the operation of boats upon our interior waterways.

When the railroad-control bill was pending in the House and the question of whether Government-owned boats should be transferred to the Department of Commerce or the Department of War was under discussion, whenever the Department of War was mentioned it was always intended, and so expressed, that the operation of the boats should be under the Corps of Engineers, and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the House and the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce both agreed that it was the intention of the conferees that the operation of these Government-owned boats should be with the Corps of Engineers. I do not say that it was the purpose to give the operation of these Government-owned boats upon our interior waterways to the division of transportation in order to give them something to do, but if that was the purpose it has been accomplished. The volume of transportation in time of peace is light. The movement of troops and the distribution of supplies are so small in time of peace that it could well be administered with more efficiency and economy in the office of the Quartermaster Corps, which procures the supplies, than it could be under an independent division of transportation.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, according to my view the committee committed a very grave blunder earlier in the day when it separated the construction division from the Quartermaster Corps, and I believe it will commit another blunder if it adopts this amendment and establishes a separate transportation corps. Now, the object of transportation, whether by motor transport, by rail, or by water, is to deliver supplies at points where they are needed and to transport troops. The Quartermaster General's office handles practically all character of supplies, with the exception of ordnance supplies. If you divide the activities of the Quartermaster General's office into two branches, you will not be able to fix the responsibility for placing supplies. If a requisition is made on the Quartermaster General for a certain number of articles, clothing or food, to be delivered at a certain camp at a certain time, and he has jurisdiction over the transportation his responsibility is then fixed, and if the supplies are not delivered at the proper time or place it is through his failure and his dereliction. If you have two corps established, one for transportation and one for supplies, they will be continually passing the buck from one to the other. The Quartermaster General will give as the reason why he could not deliver the supplies the claim that the transportation corps did not properly function, did not respond to his request to furnish transportation. On the other hand, the transportation corps will say that the Quartermaster General did not inform it in time, did not tell it early enough, and it had no opportunity to provide for the transportation in advance.

Gentlemen of the House, there is no reason on earth why in this bill you should adopt this policy of extravagance by having two corps, two branches, when the same officers if they care to do so can perform the functions of transportation under the Quartermaster General with the same rank, the same duties, except to be responsible to the Quartermaster General instead of being responsible to the Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. KEARNS. If there is no necessity for this, why should it be favored by the Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of War and Gen. Pershing?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the only thing about which I ever heard the gentleman agree with the Secretary of War. I have heard him criticize the Secretary of War on this floor repeatedly, but now because the Secretary of War recommends the establishment of the transportation corps, because his view happens to coincide with the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio in that particular, the Secretary of War is a very wise and sagacious official.

I want to say in reference to what has been said as to the man at the head of this corps, Gen. Hines, being a very efficient man, that I am sure that he is, but Gen. Hines can perform his duty as efficiently under the Quartermaster General as he can at the head of an independent department. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, if we create this separate and distinct organization of a transportation corps you will add 415 officers to the list.

Is it possible that they want to go out and create a separate and distinct organization which, with all these other organizations, will take all the officers of the Army and leave nobody to do any fighting? Is it possible that you are going to reach down into the pockets of the people any more than the bill itself does? Why, when you put on this separate construction corps you reached down into the pockets of the people and took out money by the scoopful. [Laughter.] These gentlemen know nothing about economy or efficiency of the Military Establishment. They propose every kind of a wild scheme that anybody suggests and that can be conjured up by the imagination. By the time we have raised an Army under the schemes that these gentlemen propose you will not have any fighting officers left. When you create a separate bureau you provide for a lot of typewriters, a big drove of messengers, and every kind of expense that you can imagine. If you are going to have an efficient Military Establishment you must have it compact without having it spread all over creation with a thousand bases. A man in private business would not stand 30 minutes for what the amendment proposes to do. Whenever war comes you need not be uneasy, for we will get there. The American people do not want to be loaded down with taxes in peace times for great preparation for imaginary wars. I know this bill is going to be enacted into law over my opposition and protest, but let us make it as decent as possible. Let us kill the proposed amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the only argument I can see for this amendment is the personal aggrandizement of the officers directly affected.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I understood from the Chair that this time was going to be divided equally between the pros and the antis, and in this case there has been only one speech for the proposition and four against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has endeavored to divide the time equitably.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], and the gentleman from Kansas have spoken against it, and also the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama had nine minutes and the gentleman from South Dakota had two minutes, and other members of the committee have spoken.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, ever since the Army was organized over 100 years ago the transportation has been under the Quartermaster General. It is absolutely necessary for efficiency that the organization for the purchase of stores and supplies and the issuance of them should have charge of their transportation to insure accurate and efficient work. The bill simply places the transportation where it was before the war and where it has always been ever since we had an Army in this country.

There is an economy which we are trying to work out in this branch of the service, as in all other staff forces. I want the committee to know that as present organized in Washington the transportation service has 92 officers and to-day they have over 1,000 clerks. The Bureau of Efficiency, which has investigated the matter, has given us the statement along the line of the statement of the Quartermaster General, that he can operate the transportation with 22 officers instead of 92, with 320 civilian clerks instead of 1,100, and that there will be a saving of $1,079,000 without impairing the efficiency and operation of the corps in the slightest.

I hope the committee will see fit to adopt the recommendations which the Committee on Military Affairs, which has considered this bill, have made, which restores the transportation to the place where it has always been in the Army and where it will always operate best from the standpoint of efficiency and service.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Is it not a fact that if you take 438 men in addition to the 250 taken by the construction corps from the Quartermaster Department you will have left only 362 officers in that corps, with 4,500 men, and will you not so weaken it that you will either have to increase the number of men or have the Quartermaster Corps inefficient?

Mr. ANTHONY. It is very obvious that if the House finally passes the bill as they are amending it it will be almost necessary to wholly change it in conference to make it workable. The House has amended it to a point now where it has absolutely destroyed the balance of the bill. If there is one other additional corps established with a great allowance of officers like that you will not leave any officers for the Quartermaster's office at all. I hope the House will not go any further in wrecking this bill, as it has been written after months of careful work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that five minutes be given to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] to talk on this question. There were more speakers on the other side than on this, and the gentleman from Missouri is anxious to be heard.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I object to any further time.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out that part which provides that it shall be inserted as a new section, to be known as section 9–1, so that it will provide "that the following be inserted as an amendment after line 16, page 18, commencing with '9–b,'" to make it conform to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 18, line 16, insert a new section to be known as section 9b.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CALDWELL) there were—ayes 30, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 22, page 16, after the word "men," strike out the period and add the following: "and the Quartermaster General shall detail such officers of the corps as he deems necessary from time to time to study the subjects of transportation and the commercial methods of manufacture and distribution of supplies common to the use of the Army."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, if there is any one thing that this war has taught us, it is this: That under the conditions existing in the War Department prior to the war the business men of this country and the Army officers could not readily get together on a business transaction. It was pitiful to see the American business men at the outbreak of the war attempting to get in touch with somebody with authority in the War Department to supply the wants and the needs of the Army that was being called into existence. They chased around from office to office in Washington, and they could find no one that would assume authority to enter into a contract. Yet after the war is over, when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asked them to send up the contracts that had been entered into, in order to prepare the levy on the excess profits and the war-tax profits, you could not haul them up here with a wheelbarrow, there were so many that had been made by lieutenants and captains and every grade of officer. The purpose of this amendment is to not permit the Army to dry-rot during peace times. The purpose of the amendment is to allow the quartermaster to detail men into the different manufacturing industries of the country, and train our own officers so that when war comes and the emergency is upon us we will not have to depend upon dollar-a-year men to come down to Washington to tell us how to run our transportation system or what kind of goods to buy for the Army. If we have expert officers trained during peace times, then we do not need to go out and bring in employees of manufacturers and subject them to the temptation to make contracts with their employers. If you give the quartermaster power to make the detail, express it in legislative language. You will not then have the detailing of officers questioned nor insinuations made that a man, because he wears a uniform, is not an honorable gentleman. As to the officers of the Army appearing in the gallery of this House during the deliberations of this body, in so far as I am concerned, when the men who wear the uniform of our Army and fight the battles of this Republic can not sit in the galleries of this House of Representatives, I am ready to quit the House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KAHN) there were—ayes 38, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 10 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 10. Medical Department.—The Medical Department shall consist of 1 Surgeon General with the rank of major general, 2 assistants with the rank of brigadier general, the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, the Veterinary Corps, the Medical Administrative Corps, a number of enlisted men not exceeding 5 per cent of the total enlisted strength of the Regular Army, the Army Nurse Corps as now constituted by law, and such contract surgeons as are now authorized by law: Provided, That hereafter the members of the Army Nurse Corps shall have relative rank as follows: The superintendent shall have the relative rank of major; the assistant superintendents, director, and assistant directors, the relative rank of captain; chief nurses, the relative rank of first lieutenant; and nurses, the relative rank of second lieutenant; and as regards medical and sanitary matters and all other work within the line of their professional duties shall have and shall be regarded as having authority in and about military hospitals next after the medical officers of the Army. Whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the Surgeon General or assistant to the Surgeon General, it shall be filled by appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a four-year period of an officer of the Medical Corps not below the grade of colonel, and such appointment shall not create a vacancy. The number of officers of the Medical Corps shall be 6½ for every thousand, of the Dental Corps, 1 for every thousand, and of the Medical Administrative Corps, 1 for every 2,000, of the enlisted men of the Regular Army, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts and the unassigned recruits, authorized from time to time and within the peace strength authorized by this act: Provided, That the Medical Administrative Corps shall consist of officers in grades from captain to second lieutenant, inclusive. The Veterinary Corps shall consist of 140 officers, in grade from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 20, after the word "for," strike out the word "thousand" and insert the words "five hundred."

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the committee to this section with special reference to the Dental Corps. Under the existing law there is one Dental Corps officer authorized to every thousand of the total strength of the Army. That is the act of Congress of October 6, 1917. This bill would change that law and provide for one dental officer for every thousand enlisted men of the Army. In other words, it reduces the number of dental officers now provided by law, whereas it has been demonstrated that one dental officer is not sufficient now even for 1,000 of the total strength of the Army. During the war, under authority granted by Congress to the President of the United States to appoint such additional officers as he saw fit and proper, he appointed one dental officer to every 500 men of the whole Army. In other words, the General Staff ascertained that the work of the Dental Corps had become so necessary and so important that they needed one dental officer to every 500 of the strength of the Army. That was during the war. That existed all of that time——

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I do.

Mr. McKEOWN. Was not that due to the fact that recruits were sent into the Army who required more attention?

Mr. DYER. And that is the same now, I will say to the gentleman, that recruits are coming in now every day. I have a big recruiting depot near my city, Jefferson Barracks, and men are coming in there; and I will say to the gentleman, candidly and without any doubt, that it is impossible now for a dental officer of the Army, with the number now permitted by law, to do much more for the enlisted men of the Army than to extract teeth. They have not the time to do all the work that is ordinarily known as dental work. The dental profession has advanced to such a stage that dental surgeons are doing many kinds of work that is new, but highly beneficial——

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that a great many of them have been neglected because of the fact that they have not the dental officers?

Mr. DYER. Not only that, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Texas, but the advertisements that are going out to get men to enlist in the Army say that dental work will be furnished completely to the men.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understood the gentleman to say that these dental surgeons have no time now except to extract teeth?

Mr. DYER. Well, practically so.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How long would it take them to pull all the teeth in the Army so as to get around to bridge work? [Laughter.]

Mr. DYER. Let me say to the gentleman from Vermont that under existing regulations a dental officer is required to give treatment not only to every thousand of the strength of the Army but he is required to give attention to the families of the men and of the officers, the Nurse Corps, and the employees who are at these posts, and for that reason it is now nearer 1,500 than 1,000 that each dental officer has to look after.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Does the gentleman think the ordinary dentist can take care of from 15 to 20 patients a day?

Mr. DYER. I do not.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman has been fortunate; he has not had to go to a dentist often.

Mr. DYER. Well, the dentists of the country now who are engaged in general practice do not on the average give attention to more than 500 patients a year.

Present laws provide one dental officer for each 1,000 officers and enlisted men of the Army. It was evidently the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs to not reduce the number of dental officers now authorized by law, although the proposed bill provides for one dental officer for each 1,000 enlisted men only. The bill gives the impression that there shall be one dental officer to furnish dental treatment to each 1,000 enlisted men, but this is not a fact, for the reason that dental officers are required to furnish treatment to the families of officers and enlisted men, contract surgeons, members of the Nurse Corps, prisoners of war and other persons in military custody and confinement, applicants for enlistment while under observation, officers and enlisted men on the retired list, and at stations or in the field where other medical attendance can not be procured, civilian employees. It is estimated that not less than 1,500 persons are placed under the care of one dental officer.

The regulations provide that officers and enlisted men shall be entitled to priority in receiving dental treatment, but a great deal of time is required with families and others coming under the provisions of Army regulations, and, in effect, denies officers and enlisted men the attention which rightly belongs to them and limits the grade of dentistry performed to typical emergency treatment; that is, the relief of pain and such other operations as may be absolutely required. It has never been possible with one dental officer per thousand to provide other than emergency treatment at all stations of the Army; and in view of the increased demands for dental service, due to the influence which conditions of the mouth have on the health in general, Congress must provide an additional number of dental officers to satisfy this demand.

The provision of one dental officer per thousand does not provide a sufficient number to assign an adequate number to hospitals, where the necessity for dental treatment in the treatment of cases with heart lesion, stomach and kidney disorders, and many other conditions which are but the result of a primary focus of infection in the mouth. To illustrate the importance of dental treatment in the treatment of systemic diseases it may be of interest to know that at all large modern civilian hospitals a dental man is a member of the staff. At the Mayo clinic, Rochester, Minn., one of the first members of the staff to examine and treat patients admitted to the hospital is the dentist. Certainly if a dentist must be called upon to assist in the treatment of cases admitted to hospitals, it would be a measure of economy to provide constructive and preventive dentistry to the personnel of the Army and thus reduce the number admitted to the hospitals. It being the primary object of the entire Medical Department to keep the command fit for active duty, then additional dental officers are required to assist in this work.

The past war resulted in a great number of our Army suffering face and jaw injuries. The treatment of these cases requires a highly specialized branch of surgery, and to enable the plastic surgeon to accomplish the result which has gained the admiration of the world the mechanical appliances used in connection therewith were devised and constructed by dental officers. There is no desire to detract from the ability or skill of our plastic surgeons, but it is only fair to admit that the dental officers provided scaffold work upon which they built their plastic restorations.

The small number of dental officers available under the quota of one per thousand will leave many military stations without dental officers. This is especially true of the smaller commands, such as many of our coast-defense posts, and surely those men are as justly entitled to dental treatment as the members of any other command. These stations are visited periodically by dental officers who are serving in so-called itineraries, but during the absence of the dental officer, dental service must be obtained from civilian sources at greatly increased cost to the Government, whereas the Government now possesses sufficient material to equip these posts but is lacking in dental personnel to utilize the equipment. The time consumed by dental officers in traveling from post to post will result in the loss of a great amount of the dental officer's operating time, and therefore increase the net cost of dental treatment actually rendered, as well as increase the normal cost for transportation charges.

The small number of dental officers available will practically eliminate constructive dentistry and limit the type of service furnished enlisted men to emergency service; so that in case of active campaign enlisted men will be called upon to enter on extended field service unfit for duty, and the loss of combat service of those men from dental disabilities and the expenses incumbent thereto will be a distinct loss to the Government, both from a financial standpoint and military effectiveness.

The Government offers an inducement for enlistment in the Army expert medical attention and excellent dental work, and if that promise is to be kept, additional dental officers must be provided.

The number of years required to complete a course in the study of dentistry has been increased from three years to four years, and the amount of expense of a dental education, which in addition to the ordinary expenses of a college education is further increased by the purchase of personal equipment, makes the attainment of the degree of doctor of dental surgery more and more difficult. The number of graduates has been approximately 2,200 annually, and with the increase in demand for dental service throughout the country the number of civilian dentists will be below the requirements. It will be difficult to induce dentists with high professional skill and professional pride to enter the Army when they will be restricted to merely the emergency type of dentistry and be compelled to accept an original appointment in the grade of second lieutenant.

There should be not less than two dentists to each 1,000 officers and enlisted men in the Army. It is believed this number will be sufficient to render enough constructive dentistry to permit the dentist in the Army to keep pace with his profession and to conserve the teeth of officers and enlisted men in a manner to keep them fit for performance of military duties and to prevent prosthetic replacements (plates) for teeth lost by ineffectual treatment.

The War Department recognized the importance of dental treatment during the past emergency when the quota of dental officers was increased from one per thousand to two per thousand total strength during the latter part of the World War. This may appear to be merely an emergency authorization, but it will be remembered that the War Department presented a bill to Congress during the month of January, 1919, which proposed a peace Army of approximately 500,000, and the number of dental officers provided for in that bill was 1,101, or two dental officers for each 1,000 total strength. It thus appears that the War Department believed two dental officers per thousand are necessary to provide suitable dental treatment to the Army in times of peace.

The provisions of this bill would seem pertinent as an amendment to the national defense act; however, it is evident that the committee has failed to recognize the existing law enacted October 6, 1917, providing for the reorganization of the Dental Corps. This act was not an amendment to the national defense act, but independent and permanent legislation placing the Dental and Medical Corps on an exact status of equality.

Let me repeat:

(a) It modifies the present law by reducing the number of dental officers in changing the ratio from 1 to 1,000 of the total authorized strength of the Army, act of October 6, 1917, to 1 to 1,000 of the enlisted strength. (Page 19, lines 20–22.)

(b) Equality with the Medical Corps is departed from in not granting the same constructive service credits for promotion. (Page 31, lines 12 and 13; page 33, lines 10–14.)

(c) Failure to credit for retirement (page 34, line 22), in addition to "commissioned service," "service as contract dental surgeon or acting dental surgeon," as hereinbefore credited for promotion. (Page 30, lines 15 and 16.)

(d) Original appointment in the grade of second lieutenant (page 37, lines 14 and 15), instead of first lieutenant. This is a radical departure from all previous legislation. (See acts of Feb. 2, 1901; Mar. 3, 1911; June 3, 1916; Oct. 6, 1917.)

Under present increased dental educational requirements this will preclude the possibility of obtaining desirable officers.

(e) The age requirement should harmonize with that of the Medical Corps—23 to 32, instead of 21 to 30. (Page 37, lines 15 and 16.)

(f) Failure to include dental students with medical students, who may be admitted to Reserve Officers' Training Corps. (Page 48, lines 4 and 6.)

Further, it is impossible for officers of the Dental Corps, on a basis of 1 to 1,000, to render the necessary service in order to properly conserve the health and promote the efficiency of the Army. In support of this, the average civil practitioner does not render constructive dental service to 400 persons per year. Also, your table of estimates in House Report No. 680, page 17, clearly recognizes the necessity for increasing the quota of dental officers. (Estimate 420, authorized bill 280.)

During the World War it was clearly demonstrated that 1 to 1,000 was inadequate to meet the urgent requirements and by an Executive order the ratio was increased to 2 per 1,000. This was found necessary in addition to approximately 1,000,000 dental operations rendered the drafted men, without expense to the draftee or the Government, through the organized efforts of the dental surgeons in civil life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"] The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to comply with existing law. On page 19 the bill provides there shall be one dental officer for every thousand of the enlisted men of the Regular Army. The existing law provides that there shall be one dental officer for every thousand of the total strength of the Army. I ask to insert, at page 19, line 20, the words——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DYER: Page 19, line 20, after the word "thousand," insert the words "of the total strength of the Regular Army authorized from time to time by law."

Mr. DYER. That is in the existing law, I will say to the committee. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee what is the function of a contract surgeon as usually understood, and what is the necessity for the continued existence in law of the contract surgeon? I understand in years gone by they performed a very useful function, but I have not heard recently that there was much occasion for a contract surgeon.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a law passed several years ago took most of the contract surgeons who had been attending to officers and enlisted men in the Army into the regular service. But in a few of the smaller posts it is not advisable to have an officer from the Medical Department in constant attendance, and so a contract is made with civilian doctors in the neighborhood to attend to the officers and the men who happen to be stationed there.

Mr. BEE. Is that now construed as a contract surgeon? In other words, what is in my mind is this: As I recall the law in reference to contract surgeons they had no military status.

Mr. KAHN. Quite right.

Mr. BEE. Yet they were a part of the Army. They went with the troops, but, as I said, they had no military status. Now, is it possible that a physician living near a small garrison—and I will say to the gentleman from California there seems to be very few Army garrisons in the United States where that condition exists——

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman that I believe there are 10 or 12 contract surgeons left.

Mr. BEE. Of the old ones?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. When they get out of the way, I suppose it will not be necessary to continue them?

Mr. KAHN. That is quite right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. That has already been adopted in Mr. Dyer's amendment, and I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That section 11 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 11. Corps of Engineers: The Corps of Engineers shall consist of 1 Chief of Engineers with the rank of major general, 1 assistant with the rank of brigadier general, 600 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 12,000 enlisted men, such part of whom as the President may direct being formed into tactical units organized as he may prescribe."

Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. SMALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling to the attention of the House that rank was given to the nurses without objection in the House by the Committee of the Whole. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SMALL: Page 20, line 10, strike out "one assistant" and insert "two assistants."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, this amendment increases the assistants to the Chief Engineer from one to two, of the same rank as carried in the bill. The bill provides a chief engineer with the rank of major general and one assistant with the rank of brigadier general. This amendment provides for two assistants with the same rank, that of brigadier general.

Mr. Chairman, if I may have the attention of the committee, I may say that gentlemen who are familiar with the activities of the Corps of Engineers will readily agree to the wisdom of the amendment. For those who have not had occasion to look into the manifold activities of the corps, I might add just a few words of explanation.

In addition to the large duties of the corps there is a diversity of duties, civilian on the one side and combatant on the other, each separate and distinct. Among the military duties of the Corps of Engineers there is one branch known as the supply staff, and under that comes the engineer supplies, the supplies for fortifications, and a number of incidental departments of supply. The other may be called the operating staff service, which is divided into 9 territorial departments, 6 territorial districts, and 22 territorial divisions. Under that are the construction of fortifications, military roads, and railroads and bridges, and miscellaneous military construction. Now, that is a distinct division of the activities of the Corps of Engineers.

The civilian activities of the corps are very large, of which I may enumerate a few. First, there are the river and harbor works, and under that the country is divided into 10 territorial divisions and 53 territorial districts. I might give some details of the work of the engineers in river and harbor improvements. There are examinations and surveys, estimates, execution of work authorized, maintenance of work, the California Débris Commission, the Mississippi River Commission, the flood control, operating the snag boats, and so forth, and also among the other civil works is a long list of miscellaneous civil works. Among them are leasing of water power, Government dams, establishment and regulation of harbor lines, recommendation for and supervision of the erection of bridges over navigable waters, and 12 or 14 other civil activities which by law or designation of the Secretary of War are paced with the Corps of Engineers.

If anyone shall suggest that the Chief of Engineers would not be adequately occupied if we provide him with two assistants, that thought may be removed by the statement that the chief has supervisory and executive jurisdiction of all the activities of the department. Among them are the combatant engineers, consisting of 900 officers and 12,000 enlisted men, as provided in this bill; the construction and formulation of policies of the Corps of Engineers. So, among the varied activities and the diverse activities of the Corps of Engineers, these two assistants are absolutely indispensable.

We have already provided in this bill, Mr. Chairman, in the Medical Corps for a chief and two assistants, with the rank of brigadier general. In the Quartermaster Corps, which we have just passed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. I ask unanimous consent for five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMALL. In the Quartermaster Corps, which we have just passed, there were originally one chief, with the rank of major general, and three assistants, with the rank of brigadier general. And, having adopted the amendment creating the division of construction, we still leave two assistants.

Now, there is no bureau or division in all the War Department which has more—and that is expressing it very conservatively—activities than that of the Corps of Engineers, and, to repeat, the Corps of Engineers differs from the other bureaus in that it has two diverse and different activities. I do not believe that this amendment will have the opposition of any member of the committee.

Mr. DENT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SMALL. With pleasure.

Mr. DENT. As I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is simply to add one additional brigadier general to the Corps of Engineers in view of the fact that the Corps of Engineers not only does construction and handles river and harbor work, and things of that kind, but it also has a combatant force?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; distinctly combatant and military.

Mr. DENT. Which no other bureau has.

Mr. SMALL. That is correct.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. And this addition of one brigadier general would be in charge of river and harbor construction?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; and I might say that, while I am not in the confidence of the Chief of Engineers, it is understood that one assistant would have jurisdiction of civil works and the other of military activities.

Mr. CALDWELL. And that additional assistant naturally would be the colonel who is now in charge of rivers and harbors?

Mr. SMALL. I have no information as to that, but that is the natural conclusion. I have no information as to the intention of the Chief of Engineers or the Secretary of War. My remarks are impersonal entirely.

Mr. CALDWELL. I brought this out because I think that the chief in charge of river and harbor development performs duties of such a character that the committee would be glad to give him that rank.

Mr. SMALL. I think so, and I thank the gentleman. These two assistants, Mr. Chairman, have such diverse duties that they must of necessity concentrate, each on his special work, the one on civil works and the other on military activities in the Corps of Engineers. It is impossible for one to give his attention to the other.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I was just going to ask the gentleman if it were not true that the expanding work of the Engineer Department on the engineer side did not make it necessary to make the expansion somewhat at the expense of the combatant corps, and we should give them rank in accordance with their responsibility?

Mr. SMALL. Yes. The duties of the Corps of Engineers are increasing all the time. In the railroad-control bill, under section 501, an activity was created, which was imposed on the Secretary of War, to act as a Federal agency in the promotion of water transportation, requiring the collection of data, advice as to water terminals, furnishing plans as to water terminals, and promoting the interchange of traffic between rail carriers and water carriers; and I have had it from the Secretary of War since that act was approved that he intends to place that activity under the Chief of Engineers, and it will be an addition of an exceedingly important duty. I believe that the amendment is distinctly in the public interest.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, there is no gainsaying the fact that the Corps of Engineers is a very important feature of the Army. The request that was made of the Committee on Military Affairs was for a total of 1,055 officers for this corps. The committee, after mature deliberation, after having hearings covering many days, decided that a total of 600 officers for this branch of the Army would be entirely sufficient. The committee also, after mature deliberation, decided that one brigadier general would be sufficient for the work of the corps. Of course, if the Committee of the Whole House had decided to turn construction over to the Engineers, I would have had no objection to the additional brigadier general in that corps. But I believe that the bill as it stands gives the Engineers all the officers that they require, and I hope the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina will not prevail.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield for just one question?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman, of course, with his large knowledge of the War Department activities, does understand that in the Corps of Engineers are two diverse duties, one embracing civil works, of which there are a very large number, and the other combatant or military activities, which are also quite numerous, and that the Chief of Engineers must have assistants, and that one assistant will find it impossible to take jurisdiction under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers of both of these activities. I think the gentleman will agree to that proposition.

Mr. KAHN. The Chief of Engineers can detail a colonel just as well as he can a brigadier general to that particular work. There are a great many civilian engineers employed in the Corps of Engineers, especially on the river and harbor work.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman, I think, will admit that one assistant, a brigadier general, in charge of one class of work, military, I will say, and another, an assistant of the grade of colonel, in charge of another class of work equally important, will not afford that balance such as the gentleman has been attempting to provide in this bill, and which I think he has provided in the main. I think the gentleman will agree that to have one assistant with the rank of brigadier general and another assistant who is not provided for in the bill and who will be independent of the bill, with the rank of colonel, will be a somewhat inconsistent arrangement. I hope the gentleman will agree to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. I can not see the necessity for two brigadier generals in the Corps of Engineers. I say that in all frankness to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMALL) there were—ayes 27, noes 55.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, all of the old guard are here and the insurgents are not. Therefore I make the point of no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Pending the count,

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws the point of order. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. FESS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 170. Joint resolution to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to open certain naval radio stations for the use of the general public.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12a. Chemical Warfare Service: The Chemical Warfare Service shall consist of 1 chief of the Chemical Warfare Service with the rank of brigadier general, 90 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 1,500 enlisted men.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I make that motion simply to call attention to the fact that this bill does not prescribe the duties of the Chemical Warfare Service. It simply fixes the number of officers, without prescribing their functions.

The Chemical Warfare Service was a creature of regulation under the Overman Act, and now you undertake to create a Chemical Warfare Service without prescribing its duties. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Chief of Staff is opposed to a separate Chemical Warfare Service. He insists that it ought to be attached to the Corps of Engineers, which, of course, would destroy it. If you desire to continue the Chemical Warfare Service under this bill, you certainly ought to prescribe its duties by law. You will not have any Chemical Warfare Service under the language of this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the gentleman is squinting along the right path, so far as direct and positive command of law is concerned, but is this altogether new in military legislation? Can the gentleman find anywhere in the statutes of the United States where the duties of the Infantry arm are prescribed and where the duties of the Cavalry arm are prescribed?

Mr. DENT. I can not, but the gentleman from Vermont must realize that when you create a new staff corps which is charged with experimental work, such as the Chemical Warfare, you ought to prescribe its duties. I want to ask my friend from Vermont if this provision is adopted in its present form and the present Chief of Staff continues in his opposition to the Chemical Warfare Service can he not absolutely destroy it by not assigning any duties to it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That all depends, of course, upon whether the Secretary of War is to be influenced, as usual, by the Chief of Staff or not, because after all the Secretary of War is the real lawful head of the department. The gentleman, being in the confidence of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff, probably will be able to answer that question better than I can.

Mr. DENT. That is a presumption that the gentleman has no right to indulge in.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is true that the duties of the Infantry are fixed altogether by regulation. The duties of all arms of the service are prescribed by regulation, and, consequently, the gentleman proposes to change the regulation scheme.

Mr. DENT. I know; but the gentleman does not answer this proposition, and I am sure the gentleman will appreciate it when I state that when you create a new branch of the service and do not prescribe its duties, powers, and functions, you might as well not create it at all.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will not subscribe to that proposition. I concede that there is a weakness in the phrasing of that paragraph, because it is the institution of a new feature in the Army under a statutory provision, but I still maintain that once it is established, once its personnel is in being, it is then subject to regulation, and its duties will be prescribed by regulations which under the statutes of the United States will have the force and effect of law.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman knows, I am sure, that the present Chemical Warfare Service has its duties outlined and defined by a general circular of regulations issued by the War Department.

Mr. DENT. Which may be changed every 24 hours.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; but does not the gentleman think that when we establish this service by law, those same regulations will prevail as to this new service?

Mr. DENT. The gentleman has a great deal of confidence in the General Staff if he thinks they will do it when the Chief of Staff has testified before the committee that he is against chemical warfare as a separate service.

Mr. CRAGO. I have faith enough in the Chief of Staff to believe that once this is established by law he will see that regulations are issued by which it can properly function.

Mr. DENT. In order to bring this to an issue, I ask unanimous consent that this section be passed over until to-morrow morning, when I can offer an amendment that will prescribe the duties of the Chemical Warfare Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this section be passed over with the privilege of returning to it to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of having a letter read. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] asked the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs day before yesterday how many West Point officers had resigned from the service. I took the matter up with The Adjutant General of the Army, who informs me that 125 graduates of West Point have resigned out of a total number of something like 2,337 resignations.

Mr. BEE. During what period of time?

Mr. KAHN. Since the armistice.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will, without objection, read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARCH 11, 1920.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: In reply to your request by telephone this morning for the number of graduates of the United States Military Academy and of nongraduates who have resigned since the signing of the armistice, I beg leave to inform you that up to March 3 a total of 2,337 officers have resigned from the Regular Army, 125 of whom are graduates of the United States Military Academy.

The percentage of the total strength of each arm of the service that have resigned is shown below:

	Per cent.
Field Artillery	29
Coast Artillery	26
Chaplains	26
Infantry	22
Cavalry	21
Engineers	20
Medical Department	17
Veterinary Corps	16
Dental Corps	15
Philippine Scouts	7
Judge Advocate General's Department	6
Quartermaster's Department	4

Very respectfully,

WM. KELLY,
Adjutant General, for
The Adjutant General.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

SEC. 12. That section 13 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 13. Signal Corps: The Signal Corps shall consist of one Chief Signal Officer with the rank of brigadier general, 290 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 5,000 enlisted men, such part of whom as the President may direct being formed into tactical units organized as he may prescribe: Provided, That during the tenure of office of the present Chief Signal Officer he shall have the rank of major general.

"SEC. 13a. Air Service: The Air Service shall consist of one Chief of the Air Service with the rank of major general, 1,514 officers in grades from colonel to second lieutenant, inclusive, and 16,000 enlisted men, including flying cadets, such part of whom as the President may direct being formed into tactical units, organized as he may prescribe. Officers and enlisted men of the Army shall receive an increase of 50 per cent of their pay while on duty requiring them to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights; and hereafter no person shall receive additional pay for aviation duty except as prescribed in this section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as amending existing provisions of law relating to flying cadets."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 19, after the word "general," insert "one brigadier general."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 21, line 23, after the word "prescribe," change the period to a colon and insert "Provided, That not to exceed 10 per cent of the total number of officers in the Air Service shall be nonflyers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 23, after the word "prescribe," insert "flying units shall in all cases be officered by actual flyers."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the amendment just adopted comes in after the word "prescribe" and this amendment is offered in the same place. You can not offer two amendments to come in in the same place.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to have it come in after the committee amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, after the word "nonflyers" in the committee amendment insert "flying units shall in all cases be officered by actual flyers."

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the committee at this hour of the day arguing for this amendment. This applies to flying units that are in the air. I think you all realize that a man who risks his life in the air ought to be commanded by a man who has had experience in the air. I think the desirability of the amendment is so apparent that there should be no question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 15. Chaplains: There shall be one chaplain for every 1,200 officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, exclusive of the Philippine Scouts and the unassigned recruits, authorized from time to time in accordance with law and within the peace strength authorized by this act. Chaplains shall hereafter have pay and allowances, but not rank, according to length of service, as follows: Less than 5 years, first lieutenant; 5 to 14 years, captain; 14 to 20 years, major; over 20 years, lieutenant colonel. Of the vacancies existing on July 1, 1920, such number as the President may direct shall be filled by appointment on that date of persons under the age of 54 years who served as chaplain at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. All vacancies remaining or thereafter occurring shall be filled by the appointment of persons duly accredited by some religious denomination or organization and of good standing therein between the ages of 23 and 45 years. Chaplains shall have the same rights of retirement as other officers of the Army."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that paragraph be passed over until later.

Mr. DENT. That is the paragraph in regard to chaplains?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks that the paragraph be passed until later. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That section 16 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 16. Band leaders: There shall be 157 band leaders, who, until the completion of six years' service as a commissioned band leader, shall have the pay and allowances, but not the rank, of second lieutenants, and thereafter those of first lieutenants, with the same rights to retirement as officers of the Regular Army: Provided, That the persons affected by this section shall be citizens of the United States. Of the vacancies created by this act, such number as the President may direct shall be filled by the appointment, to date from July 1, 1920, of persons under the age of 54 years who served as Army band leaders at some time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. All vacancies remaining or thereafter occurring shall be filled by the appointment of qualified persons between the ages of 23 and 40 years."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting in line 20, page 23, after the word "the," the word "rank," and strike out after the word "allowances" the words "but not the," and in line 21 the word "rank," so that it will read "shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of second lieutenants."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 20, after the word "the," where it occurs the first time, insert the word "rank," and after the word "allowances," in the same line, strike out the words "but not the rank."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment, I call the attention of the committee to the fact that when we got into this war we found that all the allied Governments had as their band leaders commissioned officers, and that it was very embarrassing to our forces, and because of that embarrassment we passed special legislation during the war giving to these men rank not equal to that of the allied forces but rank sufficient to relieve the Expeditionary Forces of that embarrassment. It was not fair to give that rank to the man overseas and not give it to the one on this side until he got over there, because that would not have been a complete and perfect arrangement. The matter was taken up and was discussed with great detail, and the War College made a study of it. After careful examination they found that there was no country in the world that was as negligent of its musicians as was America in respect to the American Army. This amendment seeks to continue the law as it is. The section in the bill seeks to go back to what it was before the war. I do not think it is fair to the men in the service who have had this rank given to them by legislation during the war, not temporary, but permanent, to have it taken away from them at this time. I therefore ask that this amendment be agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The war being over, in order to establish social relations with the people across the water, we do not need that rank over here, do we?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; we do not need it over here to establish social relations; but the embarrassment was not on account of social relations, but it was because our people were not giving the consideration to musicians, to professional men, that all other countries in the world had. We can give a lieutenant's commission to any young man who passes the necessary examination, but Sousa as a band leader must be classed as a private.

Mr. CANNON. We are not going to send them outside of the country, are we?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think it will be very long before we have another war.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is young and he will be in Congress then. I am old and I will be dead.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman has seen a great deal of war in his lifetime and has shouldered a great many of its burdens.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I hope it will not be necessary to make any extended suggestion to the House as to why this paragraph reads as it does. Some of us have clung desperately to the hope that there might be at least one or two privates left in this Army. [Laughter.] And if we could get them into the band that might lead at least to a practical harmony that the rest of the officers could march to.

Mr. KAHN. And might I suggest to my colleague that if he could get them on the band wagon we might be able to get this bill through?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But in that event there might be a row as to who would have the privilege of beating the base drum. The point about the whole thing is simply this, and I think it is a fair conclusion to be drawn by anyone who has given much attention to the history of the development of military organizations: I believe a great number of well-informed military men would to-day, if they could start back with the initial organization of some of the arms of the service, take away all military rank from the officers of those arms. They would be graded by seniority as they ought to be, for their accumulated experience and their extended service. They would be graded in pay, and they might be given a certain estate that would associate them on the same plane with military officers of corresponding seniority of service. But I think you will agree with me that one of the reasons for the popular confusion about having such a tremendous overhead of commissioned officers in the Army is that we have given the old-fashioned militant ranks of lieutenant, captain, major, lieutenant colonel, colonel, and general to men who were not themselves required to have any particular experience or distinction in military science, military administration, and all that goes to make up the militant side of any army.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman recognizes the fact that only a section or two back we gave rank to women?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I did not myself participate——

Mr. CALDWELL. But the gentleman did not object.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; I find it is rather unseemly to object sometimes when you know you are going to get run over anyway, so I do not stand in the way and defy the railroad train. But I think because we have made a mistake, as I think many men are inclined to believe we have, in giving this rank which ought to indicate only the command of combatant troops by combatant officers to people who are auxiliaries of the Army, we ought not to make another mistake and give it to others who ought not to have it. It has caused a great deal of mischief, and we ought not to extend it further.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreement to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. BLANTON. I want permission to ask the chairman of the committee a question as to how long he expects to work this afternoon?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think there will be any objection to reading a few more sections.

Mr. BLANTON. The presiding Chairman is not feeling very well this afternoon and we ought to have some compassion on him.

Mr. KAHN. I hope to move to rise in about 10 or 15 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CALDWELL. I would like to have printed in the RECORD an amendment which I propose to offer, on page 65, when it is reached, for the information of the committee. It is on the question of universal military training and I would like to have unanimous consent to have that printed.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I object to encumbering the RECORD with any such proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That section 21 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 21. Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry: The Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry and the officers and enlisted men of such regiment shall become a part of the Infantry branch herein provided for, and its officers shall, on July 1, 1920, be recommissioned in the Infantry with their present grades and dates of rank, unless promoted on that date in accordance with the provisions of section 23 hereof."

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the chairman—as I understand it, under the present law the Porto Rico regiment is not part of the Army. This law makes the Porto Rico regiment part of the Army of the United States?

Mr. KAHN. It does.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know——

Mr. KAHN. If my colleague will yield——

Mr. DENT. I am inclined to be opposed to it.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, my colleague will remember Porto Rico has been made a Territory, and these men who are in this regiment are citizens of the United States.

Mr. DENT. I understand that; but I am inclined to move to strike this out.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this is an important matter and I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. CALDWELL. I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that while we have been talking about the reduction of expenses here that when the committee authorized one brigadier general for the Air Service it authorizes the payment of the highest salary in the Army of the United States and the highest salary that it has ever paid anybody. Gen. Mitchell, who will hold that, is a flying officer, and because of his length of service he draws more money than Gen. Pershing.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 12775, had come to no resolution thereon.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON TRADE-MARK BILL.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a conference report from the Committee on Patents for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordered printed under the rule.

PORTO RICO (S. DOC. NO. 251).

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 38 of the act approved March 2, 1917 (39 Stat. 951), entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith certified copies of each of 38 franchises granted by the Public Service Commission of Porto Rico. The copies of the franchises inclosed are described in the accompanying letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting them to me.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
12 March, 1920.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs with the accompanying documents and ordered printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAPES, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. GALLIVAN, indefinitely, due to protracted illness.

REFERENCE OF H. R. 10835—COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Is a motion to reconsider an action of the House debatable?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordinarily a motion to reconsider is debatable.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the action of the House yesterday in reference to the bill H. R. 10835, which, by unanimous consent——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. A motion to reconsider a reference of a bill, by action of the House, the Chair will state, is not in order under the rules. The gentleman can make a motion at the proper time for the rereference. This is not the proper time.

Mr. RAYBURN. When is the proper time?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rule sets forth that the time for taking up the matter of correcting the reference of bills is immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RAYBURN. I tried to do that this morning, Mr. Speaker. I ask unanimous consent, then, that the action of the House in giving unanimous consent to the rereference of this bill be vacated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the action of the House yesterday in rereferring the bill which he has referred to be vacated. Is there objection?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas tried to bring this matter up this morning immediately after the reading of the Journal, when it would have been in order, and in order to take up the military bill I objected to its consideration at that time, with the understanding that the gentleman from Texas was going to try to get an opportunity to speak for five minutes on the situation. And I imagine that if the gentleman were to ask unanimous consent for a chance to address the House for five minutes there would be no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, if there is no way for me to get this bill up it would be idiotic for me to make a statement. I thought the Speaker of the House had been done a serious injustice in the RECORD yesterday by some statements that were made, and, of course, it would have been courteous to him to have awaited his return. While I am on my feet, I will say this: The gentleman from Wyoming, of course, made this statement——

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is proceeding entirely by unanimous consent. He has made no request of the House of any sort.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall not object, but I shall ask at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks the privilege of addressing the House for five minutes on the same subject.

Mr. RAYBURN. If that is made the condition, I wish to say I shall never take the time on any objection.

Mr. MONDELL. That is not a condition. I shall not object. I simply made the statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is futile now, as it has been held it is too late to make a motion to reconsider and as there will be objection made to unanimous consent. On yesterday morning I would have objected or the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] would have objected, if we had been here, to this rereference. This bill has nothing whatever to do with anything the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has ever handled.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman states that he or the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] would have objected if they had been here this morning. Did the gentleman and Mr. SWEET give me any notice when they asked the Speaker to rerefer this when it was not brought up in the House?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; we did not.

Mr. STEVENSON. You do not charge me with any discourtesy in not sending for you then?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have told the gentleman that I did not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The present war-risk insurance act carries disability compensation for the same men that are proposed to be compensated in this bill. This raises the rate of that compensation?

Mr. RAYBURN. This puts them in a special class, and it really is a retirement bill and has nothing to do with the compensation act or war-risk insurance act.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not this bill amount to specifying the increase in the present act, now carried in your bill, which these men shall have?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it may be true along that line, but the House has passed upon that long ago and has said that the officers and privates shall be paid the same, and this is to pay these officers that are disabled the same amount a retired officer in the Regular Army is paid.

Now, that is what I wanted to get at. This matter was taken up with the Speaker after the House had passed the resolution here to refer all these matters to the Committee on Ways and Means. This bill was first referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, where it ought to have remained, unless this hopper had been created to unload all this legislation on the Committee on Ways and Means. Of course, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] had a letter from the secretary of this Committee on Ways and Means denying the jurisdiction of this bill after the Speaker of the House had referred it to that committee, after consultation with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], and myself, and it did appear to me that after the Speaker had made that reference, under the resolution passed here, it would have been better if consent had not been asked or that this action had been vacated until the Speaker of the House returned.

Yesterday, as I started to say a moment ago, the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] made the statement that if this bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means it was done through inadvertence. That could not have been, because the Speaker referred it after consultation with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], and myself. This Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce seeks to dodge no responsibility and no jurisdiction whatever; but we do contend that this bill has no place in that committee, and that it is not an amendment to the war-risk insurance act, and is against everything that the war-risk insurance act stands for, as it places a certain class of officers in another category altogether and gives them the pay of retired Army officers—a question that this House has passed upon and to my certain knowledge supported, the proposition that all men in the Army who came under the war-risk insurance act, both generals and captains and lieutenants and privates, should be paid the same for the same injuries.

This is not a question of any "sour grapes." The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, after this resolution was passed here, retained all the jurisdiction it ever had over the war-risk insurance act, but we do not want to have bills thrust upon us simply because somebody else did not happen to want them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, on December 3 the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] introduced a bill—H. R. 10835—to fix compensation of officers of the National Army who had incurred disability in the service. It was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Almost immediately the question of jurisdiction was raised. It was discussed from time to time. A few days ago the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, under the rules of the House, asked unanimous consent for a rereference of that bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was present at that time, and unanimous consent was given for the rereference. During the discussion of the matter the Speaker said that, in his opinion, the bill unquestionably belonged with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which it did beyond question. On the 26th of February a resolution was considered by the House providing that for the remainder of the second session of the Sixty-sixth Congress all proposed legislation relating to those who served in the World War, "excepting, however, legislation based on and relating to disability incurred in the service," should be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The only gentleman in the House who actively and forcefully opposed that resolution was the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], and he did it on the ground that he feared that under the resolution his committee would lose jurisdiction of certain legislation. He referred to the proposition of sending these bills to the Committee on Ways and Means as a plan to send them to a graveyard. He said we were proposing to send them to the Ways and Means Committee as a graveyard, and he was very much exercised lest the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be invaded.

Subsequent to the adoption of that resolution it seems—and I knew nothing about that until the gentleman referred to it to-day—it seems that some members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce suggested to the Speaker that he rerefer the bill introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] to the Committee on Ways and Means under the resolution to which I have referred. I presume that the gentleman from Texas was one of those that made that request. In other words, if he did so, he requested that this particular bill, introduced by the gentleman from South Carolina, should go to what he had designated as a "graveyard," and he favored, as I understand it, the transfer of this bill to what he had been pleased to refer to as a "graveyard."

Let us see what the bill is. The bill proposes that any officer who served with the military forces in the war with Germany and who does not belong to the Regular Army, but who "incurred disabilities while in the service," shall be entitled to the same compensation as officers of the Regular Establishment.

The resolution which I have just read, sending certain bills to the Committee on Ways and Means, specifically, definitely, clearly, unquestionably provides that no bill shall be referred to the Ways and Means Committee under that resolution that relates to or is based upon disability incurred in the service, and this bill that the gentleman from Texas asked to have sent to the Ways and Means Committee under that resolution provides for compensation for disabilities incurred in the service and nothing else. Clearly it could not be referred to the Ways and Means Committee under that resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that I may have one minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks that his time be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know what was said to the Speaker. At the time the gentleman from South Carolina asked unanimous consent to have his bill sent back to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I did not know just what had transpired, and as in my opinion the bill clearly belongs with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce I very naturally said I thought it must have gone to the Ways and Means Committee through inadvertance. It is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Committee to pass on it. I hope they will pass on it adversely, but it is their duty to pass on it. The bill proposes to divide the men of the National Army into two classes for payment of compensation for injuries received in the service, officers and enlisted men, and to grant the officers compensation very much in excess of that granted enlisted men for the same class of injuries. I trust that that will not be done. It is not in harmony with the spirit of the compensation act. It is not in harmony with our national policy. It would not be fair to the men.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a five-minute statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss anything except the situation that has arisen, and I wish to disclaim any intention of discourtesy either to the great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or to the Speaker of this House. After I had all the facts, the first opportunity I had to bring this matter up was yesterday morning.

There are 1,380 of these officers in hospitals liable to be discharged very soon, many of them having families dependent on them with a maximum of $100 a month going to them, and for 90 days and more they have been endeavoring to get some committee to hear them. Now, I conceived that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had the right and were charged with the duty to consider this bill, and when I found it had gone to the Committee on Ways and Means, and when the clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means notified the officers who were interested in the bill that the committee doubted their jurisdiction, then I took it to be my duty at the earliest possible moment to get the question of reference satisfactorily and finally determined. I hope I will not therefore be considered as having been discourteous to any of these gentlemen, although they did not notify me when they had it switched from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, what does this propose? The gentleman from Texas says this House has gone on record as saying that the officers and men of the emergency force shall all have the same treatment when wounded. That is true, but this House is perfectly competent to change that law; and when it passes an act changing that law it may make another class. The House has not said that all men who were injured shall have the same amount of money. It has said that the man who has lost one leg shall receive more than the man who has been kicked in the knee. It has said that the man who has lost both eyes shall get more than anybody else, unless there is somebody who has also lost two legs. A classification has been made. Now, the proposition in this bill is purely and simply to create a new class, as was so clearly stated by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] a day or two ago, and it provides that that be according to certain rules and regulations, and it creates a new class in the war-risk insurance act, according to my idea.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to ask the gentleman this question: The men whom it is intended to benefit by this proposed legislation are already carried in a law which now gives them a certain rate of compensation?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If this bill provides a higher rate of compensation for men already carried in a substantive law, is it not in the nature of an amendment to that law?

Mr. STEVENSON. Not only that but the bill contains a repealing clause, repealing all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with what is herein proposed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And the same committee that now refuses jurisdiction of the amendment took jurisdiction of the original law which is sought to be amended?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; but that grew up from something which was a long way from this. The committee got jurisdiction of war-risk insurance when it was a commercial insurance on the marine transactions of the Government in the war.

Then the insurance of the soldier became an amendment merely to that, and that brought the soldiers' insurance into the Interstate Commerce Committee, and then to that they hung the allotment and allowance feature, and in that way they got the whole thing into that committee. I object to every committee sidestepping the bill. It is not an orphan; it provides for a respectable and very gallant bunch of officers who have suffered grievously at the hands of the enemy and who are not asking for anything unreasonable. I submit that these committees ought not to run away from it.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say that it is rather a peculiar situation where the mother of a child is trying to seek a nurse and the nurse does not want it. If you had let it stay with us, in the Ways and Means Committee, we would have treated it kindly.

Mr. STEVENSON. And keep it 60 days and then return it for want of jurisdiction, as the Committee on Military Affairs did.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] may have five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. In my time I want to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question. How long did the Military Affairs Committee have the bill?

Mr. STEVENSON. From the 3d of December until the 28th of February.

Mr. SWEET. When was it first referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. STEVENSON. On the 28th of February.

Mr. SWEET. Was it not referred the 2d of March?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; on the 28th day of February. The gentleman will find that on page 3629 of the RECORD.

Mr. SWEET. When was it referred to the Ways and Means Committee?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not know; I was not here. But when I found that it got there I asked that it go back——

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman says that the Ways and Means Committee disclaimed jurisdiction?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; I do.

Mr. SWEET. In what way did they evidence that?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will read to the gentleman the letter. It is as follows:

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 8, 1920.

Lieut. A. B. DONLIN,
Walter Reed General Hospital, Takoma Park, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the chairman, I acknowledge receipt of your letter of March 6 relative to the Stevenson bill, H. R. 10835. The committee at this time is holding hearings with respect to soldiers' adjusted compensation, and the belief has been expressed that the bill to which you refer concerns a military policy which properly belongs to the Military Affairs Committee and should not have been re-referred to this committee in connection with the bonus matter.

However, the committee is holding this bill under advisement, and should it be decided to hold hearings you will be advised in ample time to appear and present your views.

Very truly, yours, E. W. CAMP, Clerk.

Mr. SWEET. They claim that it should have gone to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; and I came back to the jurisdiction that had the right to settle where it should go.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I think we have had some evidence of the course this bill has taken and I want to say to the House that when the leader on this side said that it was an inadvertence on the part of the Speaker, I believe he is incorrect, for the attention of the Speaker was called to the resolution passed in this House, known as the Mondell resolution, and also to the bill, and after an examination of the resolution and an examination of the bill it was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. They say that this is a matter of compensation which refers to disabled soldiers. That perhaps in a sense is true, but you must remember that all matters pertaining to war-risk insurance and all matters of compensation in connection therewith are based upon impairment or reduction of earning capacity resulting from such injuries in civil occupations. While the Stevenson bill relates to disabled ex-service Army officers, under it they will receive, according to the bill, compensation or pay based upon rank in service. Is not that true?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is absolutely true—based on the pay which an officer of equal rank in the Regular Army gets when he is retired.

Mr. SWEET. That is, a disabled retired Army officer?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. The measure of compensation under the war-risk insurance act is based upon impairment and reduction of earning capacity in civil occupations. Under the proposed measure it is according to the rank of the officer; and undoubtedly when the Speaker examined this matter he said, that being the case, it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. If there is any compensation in any particular case, would it not be entirely within the jurisdiction of the gentleman's committee to say that the compensation for the loss of an arm should be, for instance, the same pay as that received by a lieutenant in the Regular Establishment?

Mr. SWEET. But that is not the measure of the compensation under the war-risk insurance. Neither does it relate to the war-risk insurance act, because it is based on provisions in the military law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is not that language carried in this bill simply another way of expressing what otherwise might be expressed in figures.

Mr. SWEET. It is another way of expressing pay rather than compensation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is it not another way of expressing figures when putting them into words?

Mr. SWEET. That may be the manner in which it was presented and in which the Military Affairs Committee got rid of it; but, as I view it, under the resolution now passed it should go to the Committee on Ways and Means. Not only that, but I do not believe that we are treating the Speaker of this House fairly by taking it up in this way and in his absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10835 be withdrawn from the committee to which it was referred and be resubmitted to the Speaker for rereference on his return, in view of the fact that the Speaker is not here and that the leader of the House has said that it was done inadvertently.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 10835 be withdrawn from the committee to which it was referred and be resubmitted to the Speaker for rereference on his return. Is their objection?

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 170. Joint resolution to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Navy to open certain naval radio stations for the use of the general public; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

H. J. Res. 194. Joint resolution amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, March 13, 1920, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of requested legislation to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to sanction the use of certain titles on tablets or other materials; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting information in response to House resolution 428, concerning the awarding of the distinguished service medal to certain officers and enlisted men of the United States Army and to civilians on account of distinguished service during the World War; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

3. A letter from the Chairman of the Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries, transmitting report of the Congressional Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries (H. Doc. No. 686); to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. NOLAN, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10104) to renew patent No. 25900, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 737), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12869) for the construction of a bridge across the Pentwater River or Pentwater Lake, Mich., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 738), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FOCHT, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 358) carrying into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of the claim of T. L. Love, surviving partner of Robert Love & Son, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 736), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 13, 1920.

(Legislative day of Thursday, March 11, 1920.)

The Senate met in open executive session at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. CUMMINS) resumed the chair.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, as in legislative session, to submit a report from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received as in legislative session.

Mr. GRONNA. I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, to report it favorably with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 469) thereon.

I give notice that I shall move to take up the bill next Monday, and I hope to be able to keep it before the Senate until it shall be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Gronna	McNary	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hale	Moses	Smoot
Brandegee	Harris	Nelson	Spencer

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent, due to illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

RECLASSIFICATION OF SALARIES (H. DOC. NO. 686).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, as in legislative session, laid before the Senate the report of the Congressional Joint Commission on Reclassification of Salaries submitted, pursuant to law, by the chairman of the joint commission, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting schedules and lists of useless papers devoid of historic interest on the files of the Treasury Department and requesting action looking to their disposition. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

ALASKAN RAILROAD (S. DOC. NO. 252).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, certain information relative to the development and settlement of the country traversed by and tributary to the Government railroad being constructed in Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN DEAD IN FRANCE (S. DOC. NO. 253).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 10th instant, certain information relative to the disposal and protection of the remains of American soldiers who have died in France, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT subsequently said: This morning the Chair handed down a communication from the Secretary of War in response to a Senate resolution of March 10, 1920, concerning the disposal and protection of the remains of American soldiers who have died in France, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 12, 1920.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you, in response to resolution of the Senate of the United States dated March 10, 1920, the information requested concerning the disposal and protection of the remains of American soldiers who have died in France and what amount or amounts of money have been estimated to be necessary in the accomplishment of that result.

There are three distinct projects of removal which have had to be considered, owing to the fact that the consent of foreign Governments has been and is being progressively secured and no authorization has yet been received for the disposition of the entire list of American dead overseas.

The first project involves removals from all countries outside of France; and orders were given by this office to immediately undertake the same. Under this order removals have been made from Siberia; 111 bodies have been removed from the Archangel district in North Russia, the work having been suspended before its completion because of disturbance in that country, which made further work at this time impossible. One hundred and eleven bodies still remain in North Russia, and it is probable that nothing can be done toward their removal for a period of one year, or such time as conditions in Russia shall become more normal.

The evacuation of Germany is to be undertaken at once, the officer in charge of the zone of mid-Europe having completed plans therefor.

In Great Britain there are 92 places in which our dead are interred. Evacuations are now taking place in the southern part of that zone. Eighteen bodies have been returned from several cemeteries in South England and advices are immediately expected as to the shipment of a much larger consignment from other cemeteries in that area.

In Italy all bodies have been concentrated in one place, and the matter of their transfer to the States will be easily effected.

The second project of removal, for which authority was subsequently obtained, involves the French zone of the interior, including all the base and intermediate sections back of the battle area. It was first intended to begin work at Paris, the cemetery at Suresnes, a suburb of that city, having been recommended as a permanent cemetery, so that as other cemeteries are closed it might be possible to remove bodies that are to remain in France to Suresnes for permanent interment; but the congestion of French railways has been such that it has thus far been impossible to obtain transportation inland, and the necessary caskets and personnel have been transferred to Brest, where the latter is now operating, with the expectation that we shall very early receive advices of the shipment of bodies from that region. Should the railway congestion continue thereafter, it will be the policy to shift operations to other ports and operate in such cemeteries as may be contiguous thereto, where motor transportation may be utilized for the shorter distance involved in getting bodies to the port of shipment, to which ocean transportation can be diverted as required.

The third project of removal will become operative so soon as the Government of France shall have agreed to recommendations relative to evacuation from the zone of the armies, which are to be submitted by an international council appointed for the comprehensive study of the question affecting allied dead interred within that zone. So far as the American Government is concerned nothing can be done relative to this phase of the question until conclusions have been reached by the French Government itself.

The general work of removals to the United States involves in brief the following preparatory action:

The small force of the graves registration service left in France after the work of demobilization was slightly increased so as to provide sufficient official and civilian personnel to attend to the work of perfecting and maintaining our cemeteries, which had been previously reduced by concentration in number from 2,400 to about 600. The force already there has since been augmented by the dispatch of about 15 additional officers and upward of 260 graduated personnel of directive capacity, and the officer in charge has been given full authority to employ all necessary labor for the prosecution of his work. Further personnel of graduated character will be sent so soon as requisitions are made by the officer in charge in Europe. Preparations have already been made for the execution of this plan.

Seventeen thousands caskets have already been purchased, but the shortage of materials for manufacture has caused vexatious delay in their delivery. In addition to those already shipped to Europe 3,000 will be forwarded during the month of March and 5,000 during April and each month thereafter until the contract is completed. Anticipating the possibility of French consent to the evacuation of the battle areas designated as the zone of the armies, the Quartermaster General has been making an exhaustive study of the sources of procurement, with a view to placing an order, at the earliest possible date, for the necessary number of caskets to complete the entire work of removing all bodies in Europe from the places where they are now interred, and transferring the same either to their homes or to such place as may ultimately be selected, in addition to Suresnes for a permanent cemetery in France.

Motor transportation has been secured from a variety of sources to meet the entire requisitions for the same by the officer in charge in Europe, and ample requisitions have been prepared for further procurement from existing supplies to be filled so soon as advices are received from him as to additional needs and points of desired delivery.

The graduated personnel referred to above includes qualified embalmers, who are to supervise sanitary arrangements and insure the most approved professional preparation of bodies for return to their homes.

The personal requests from relatives indicate that practically 70 per cent of the dead are to be returned to their homes (about 50,000 in all), and with about 20,000 or 25,000 to remain permanently interred abroad.

An estimate of the probable cost of this project can be only tentative at this time, but it is likely to involve a minimum expense of $500 in each case where a body is to be returned to the home of the next of kin and probably $200 or $250 in connection with the permanent interment in a field of honor abroad. It is believed that a minimum appropriation of $30,000,000 will be required for the completion of the work. The sundry civil bill for the current year contains an appropriation of $8,451,000, at least $6,000,000 having been already required for existing projects, contracts, and the above-mentioned provision for additional caskets for the zone of the armies. It is requested that the amount appropriated in the sundry civil bill for the current year may be made a continuing appropriation and that there be added thereto a further appropriation to cover the balance of the $30,000,000 herein suggested.

Division of territory: Three zones have been created in Europe: First, the zone of Great Britain, with headquarters at London, comprising three sections with boundary lines running from east to west. Second, the zone of mid-Europe, comprising all the continental countries outside of France and having headquarters at Cochem. Third, the zone of France. This zone practically covers two large areas, one of which involves the extensive work of cemeterial maintenance at the north and the other covers the area of evacuations, which are immediately to be made from the rear section. The central office of the zone of France is in Paris, and Col. Rethers, the officer in charge in that country, is employing there a sufficient clerical force for the dispatch of business.

The chief of the graves registration service is at the head of a new division in the Quartermaster General's office, and is directing a large clerical force, which is engaged in the work of reconciling conflicting reports, completing identifications which have hitherto been in doubt, and working out from the great mass of diverse and even conflicting requests from relatives the necessary data upon which the return of bodies may be effected.

Respectfully, yours, NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 194) amending joint resolution extending the time for payment of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash., and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

BONUS FOR DISCHARGED SOLDIERS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, on the morning of the 10th instant during the morning hour I asked to have read into the RECORD a letter which I had received from a returned soldier protesting against the proposed bonus of $50 per month, or a $50 bond per month for each month of service. In the discussion which followed I expressed myself as being in accord with the views set forth in that letter, and I am of the same opinion still. I am now in receipt of a telegram from the State commander of the American Legion of South Dakota, and he asks that the same publicity be given to this telegram that was given to the letter. As a matter of privilege, I ask to be allowed to read it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will read it?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I expect to read it. The telegram is from Mitchell, S. Dak., dated March 12, and is as follows:

MITCHELL, S. DAK., March 12, 1920.

Senator THOMAS STERLING,
Washington, D. C.:

Following telegram just received: "Pierre Post favors bonus. Sioux City Journal not authorized. Signed Carl Walker, post commander." Please give this same publicity given the one-man opinion you previously received.

M. L. SHADE, State Commander.

SUGAR DIVISION—BUREAU OF STANDARDS.

Mr. GAY. Mr. President, I desire to read a telegram which I have just received addressed to me from the secretary of the Louisiana Sugar Planters' Association.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., March 12, 1920.

Hon. EDWARD J. GAY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Resolved, That the Louisiana Sugar Planters' Association, representing in its membership the sugar, sirup, and molasses manufacturing interests of Louisiana, strongly urges upon the Congress of the United States that ample and sufficient funds be appropriated for the operation of the sugar division of the Bureau of Standards. This association regards the Bureau of Standards as important for the welfare of the people of the United States and gives its emphatic indorsement to the sugar division thereof, the needs of which should be fully met.

LOUISIANA SUGAR PLANTERS' ASSOCIATION, REGINALD DYKERS, Secretary.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent to present numerously signed petitions from citizens of Detroit indorsing resolution adopted by the Board of Commerce of Detroit, Mich., and which were transmitted to the Vice President. The Vice President submitted them to me because he states that he has adopted the practice of not laying such matters directly before the Senate but that they should be presented by a Senator from the State. I present the petitions in behalf of a large number of citizens of Detroit and Mount Clemens, Mich., relative to the purchase of Selfridge Field, Mount Clemens, for use as an aviation field. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of the Ministerial Alliance, of Wichita, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation for the organization of a corps of chaplains, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented memorials of Nikkletown Grange, No. 1722, Patrons of Husbandry, of Gridley, Kans., and of sundry citizens of Mayfield, Portis, Quinter, Rose Hill, Lewis, Scott City, Council Grove, and Dorrance, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. KIRBY, from the Committee on Miltary Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2278) for the relief of John Healy, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 470) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2600) for the relief of John Lyons, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 471) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 4071) to amend section 304 of the revenue act of 1918, approved February 24, 1919; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 4072) for the relief of George W. Willcox; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 4073) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 4074) to incorporate the American Women's Legion (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4075) making appropriation to pay the R. S. Howard Co., of New York City, N. Y., its loss and damage incurred and suffered by it in complying with United States Navy Commandeer Order No. N-3255, dated June 18, 1918; to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for investigating the diseases of hog cholera, etc., from $410,000 to $658,945, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for investigations of insects affecting truck crops, etc., from $110,000 to $131,760, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $6,000 for the printing and distribution of the film entitled "Come clean," and $9,000 for cooperation with the States in educational work in oral hygiene, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment relative to the retirement of officers now on the active list of the Regular Army who will be over 45 years of age on July 1, 1920, and who shall have served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps for at least 90 days during the Spanish-American War, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

IMPORTATION OF COAL-TAR PRODUCTS.

Mr. MOSES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. KIRBY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole and in open executive session, resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, since the treaty first came to the attention of the Senate the point in it which has commanded my most intense interest and attention has been article 10. It is not my purpose this morning to discuss that article. It has been discussed so often that I could add nothing. Suffice it to say that from the very beginning, since I first saw it in print, the proposal laid down in article 10 has seemed to me to be monstrous; that it constitutes a challenge of all history and human nature and human experience; and that were the people of the United States to undertake the obligation sought to be imposed upon them under the language of that article they would, in effect, lose our independence. So, as the weary months have gone by, characterized as they have been by a discussion of this article, and with more twistings and squirmings and turnings in the way of interpretation or attempts at interpretation than I have ever witnessed in any public discussion, and more attempts to read into the article things that are not there and to read out of it things that are there—I say, Mr. President, as this discussion has gone on for weary months, my principal concern has been that whatever we shall do in connection with article 10 we shall do with our eyes wide open; that whatever decision we shall make in connection with it shall be made in such a way that there shall be no doubt whatsoever as to our meaning.

From the very beginning, Mr. President, I have entertained a profound conviction that the decision we ought to reach in connection with this article should relieve the people of the United States of this obligation. A majority of the Senate, on November 19 last, after a most exhaustive discussion, finally agreed to a reservation which was conceded, I think, at the time to be effective. All the Senators upon this side of the aisle voted for that reservation and a number upon the other side—not so great, of course—voted for it. It has been printed far and wide for months all over the country, and I think it fair to say that the people of the United States understand that reservation and understand it thoroughly.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has read the article in the current number of the North American Review by an eminent citizen of his State, David Jayne Hill, wherein he utterly misconstrues the present Lodge reservation and construes the present reservation as follows:

> The United States, under the second reservation, assumes no obligations under article 10, unless in any particular case the Congress shall provide for the employment of the military and naval forces of the United States.

The Senator, I think, will agree that that is not the proper construction of the present reservation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar with the article, I may say to the Senator. I should have to read the whole text to see what Dr. Hill means.

Mr. LENROOT. He gives his construction that there is no obligation unless Congress shall provide for the employment of the military and naval forces, and the Senator will agree that that is not the proper construction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of the original Lodge reservation?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My conception of the original Lodge reservation is that it freed us entirely from the obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly; and yet here is an eminent citizen of the Senator's own State who utterly misconstrues the original reservation which the Senator has just said "everybody understands."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, I may have used the term "everybody," but I suppose it can not be said that any proposal is accepted unanimously.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure the Senator from New York has given the correct construction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am glad it is conceded that that construction is correct.

My concern about this matter, Mr. President, is so deep, I regard the whole matter as so vital, that I think I am justified in examining into any other reservation applicable to this article with the utmost care and to inquire from time to time during this debate as to the exact meaning of the substitute reservation which has been offered.

In a short colloquy upon yesterday I admitted that I was not competent to discuss the meaning from a legal standpoint, in all its technicality, of every word and phrase, in the new reservation; but now that it has been offered and we read in the press that a number of Senators who voted against the former reservation are willing to vote for this one, I think it is pertinent to inquire what difference they see betweer this one and the former one.

I do not believe that any appreciable number of Senators; in fact, I do not believe that any Senator in this body is going to change his attitude from one of opposition to the former reservation to one of approval of this new reservation simply because there is a mere change of phraseology. I can not believe that Senators are going thus to change their attitude; I can not help believing that Senators who are thus going to change their attitude see some substantial difference between the old reservation and the new one. I can not bring myself to believe that this is merely a case of some one trying to "save his face." We are informed with some degree of reliability through the public press that something like 20 or 25 Senators who voted against the first Lodge reservation are contemplating voting for this one.

Already there has appeared a grave difference of opinion among Senators upon the floor as to the meaning of the new one as contrasted with the meaning of the old one.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any more difference of opinion as to the meaning of the new reservation than there was as to the meaning of the original Lodge reservation which we adopted, and if Senators on this floor did not claim that under the original reservation the entire obligation remained?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very few did, as I recollect; I can not recall how many Senators made that contention, but at least the former reservation finally secured the support of a majority of the Senate. Now, it is proposed to change it in some way, and it is announced, unofficially of course, that by changing it something like 20 or 25 Senators, who were bitterly opposed to the first reservation, and who voted against it, will now vote for it. I think the Senate and the country are entitled to know how that happens.

The contention has been made, Mr. President, that there is no difference between the two reservations. If there is no difference in substance, why the change in votes? How can it be explained? I am confident that the Senate is not trifling with this question; that Senators know why they are doing things, or why they propose to vote in such and such a way. I think it fair to say that I knew why I voted for the first Lodge reservation and why I shall not vote for a substitute reservation which in any way changes the substance. It is perfectly clear; there is no mystery about it.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New York how he construes the language "in the exercise of full liberty of action by Congress" in passing on the question of whether it shall or shall not furnish any of the means for preserving the territorial integrity, and so forth, of other countries?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator permit me to come to that a little later?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. May I say before the Senator from New York departs from that subject that full liberty of action is pure rhetoric. If Congress has jurisdiction of a question, a treaty can not take it away; if it does not have jurisdiction of it, a treaty can not confer jurisdiction upon it; and to say that the Congress has "full liberty of action" over anything that the Constitution confers upon Congress the power to deal with is sheer rhetoric.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my construction of the original reservation I have already described. It absolves us completely from the obligation involved in article 10. Its first phrase was particularly clear upon that point. It read as follows:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—

And so forth.

That was complete and comprehensive, and the meaning which I ascribe to that language has been accepted by an overwhelming majority of persons who have discussed article 10 pro and con. There is no substantial doubt as to the meaning of that language. If it is preserved in any reservation that we may adopt to this treaty, the American people will believe, and will have a right to believe, that they are absolved from the obligation to protect every other member of the league in the event of attack.

Now, it is confidently asserted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and by others that the new reservation confers the same protection, but we find already that there is grave doubt about that. I find just this morning an editorial in the New York Times discussing the new reservation. We all know the attitude of the New York Times in respect to the treaty. It has supported the treaty; it is a friend of the treaty; it has decried the opposition expressed here upon the floor of the Senate against the obligation under article 10, and so far as I can recollect, it has acquiesced, editorially and otherwise, to the assumption of such an obligation by the people of the United States; but here is what it says this morning about the new reservation:

> This compromise—

Referring to the compromise reservation—

> This compromise reservation does not affect the principle or substance of article 10 of the treaty. It is declaratory of our perfectly well understood constitutional practice. If a reservation is necessary to preclude in any quarter, either at home or abroad, the foolish belief that the league covenant would require us to employ our military or naval force without the sanction of Congress, this proposal of Mr. LODGE'S will answer the purpose. And as interference in a dispute might lead to military action it is not unreasonable to invoke the antecedent sanction of Congress. That process will cause delay; it may be fatal to the effort to prevent a resort to arms. But the point is not at the moment important enough to delay or defeat ratification.

Here is a great metropolitan journal which says in so many words that the obligation involved in article 10 will still rest upon the people of the United States under the language of the so-called compromise reservation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether the New York Times has not in the past given exactly the same construction to the original Lodge reservation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not to my recollection, though I would not deny it; but it is immaterial what they have done in the past. We are now discussing this compromise reservation, and that is what the New York Times is discussing.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMICK. Let me submit to the Senator a copy of a newspaper which has opposed the treaty as the Times has supported it, which announces that the Senator from Massachusetts weakens the reservation:

> By weakening his reservation to article 10 through offering a substitute, Senator LODGE yesterday yielded to the wishes of the mild reservationists and made a last desperate bid for ratification of the peace treaty.

That is from the Washington Post. Two papers which have held opposite views on the treaty are agreed that the reservation is weakened.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in my observations upon this exceedingly important thing, I of course do not for a moment question the intentions or the motives of any Senator; but, as I said before, I am so deeply concerned about our action in connection with this monstrous article 10 that I feel that the Senate must be absolutely certain of what it is doing. There should not be left any doubt at all. We either assume this obligation or we do not assume it, and there can be no compromise between those alternatives. On many other reservations and many other portions of the treaty and of the covenant there is room for compromise and adjustment, but upon this one I see no room for it.

Now, Mr. President, the question is, Does this new reservation leave the obligation of article 10 imposed upon the people of the United States?

The reservation reads:

> The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country by the employment of its military or naval forces, its resources, or any form of economic discrimination, or to interfere in any way in controversies between nations, whether members of the league or not, under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall, in the exercise of full liberty of action, by act or joint resolution so provide.

I think it was intimated in the discussion yesterday that while this compromise reservation does not remove the obligation imposed by article 10, it nevertheless withdraws all the means by which the obligation could be performed if it were assumed; in other words, that as this reservation provides that the United States does not promise or refuses to promise to use its Army or its Navy or its resources or a blockade in the performance of its obligations, that in effect wipes out the obligation.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Although the Senator says that he is not a lawyer, I have no doubt he is familiar with the legal principle which prevents a defendant from setting up as a defense in a suit for breach of contract that he was prevented from performing his contract by his own voluntary acts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that theory, of course, unless these parties agree to this, we are stating that we agree to do a certain thing and depriving ourselves of the means to do it. Of course, if we ask them to agree to that we ask them to agree to an absurdity, a zero.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thank the Senator for his interruption.

Mr. President, I think it was also intimated in the discussion yesterday that there would be no other way of performing the obligation left to the people of the United States, now that under the language of this compromise reservation the use of the Army, the Navy, the material resources, and the blockade have been withdrawn or withheld. That may be true. I do not know that I can think of any other effective weapon which the Government and people of the United States could use in performing the obligation; but my question is, Does not the obligation still exist?

Some say it does not. Some believe it does. The New York Times believes it does. Now, if it still exists, what position are we left in? We will say that aggression is threatened or, indeed, perpetrated upon some member of the league. We are a member of the league. Assuming that the obligation remains undisturbed, instantly our Government will be asked, "What are you going to do by way of contributing your share in putting down this aggression which is about to break out or has already broken out? Will you help?" We say, "Well, you remember we said when we signed this treaty that we would not promise to use our Army or our Navy." "Will you establish a blockade and help us in that way?" "Well, you must remember that when we signed this treaty we said we would not promise to use a blockade." "Will you use your material resources?" We may say, "Well, remember that when we signed this treaty we said we would not promise to use our material resources." "Well, what will you do?" will be the inevitable inquiry.

Now, no man will contend that we can not use these forces under these circumstances, even under the terms of this compromise reservation. The pressure will then be brought to bear upon us that, although we have said we would not promise to use them, still we are at liberty to use them; and the obligation still remaining undisturbed, it will then become a matter of good faith in greater or less degree. That is my fear. It may be unjustified. I am trying to look far ahead, to estimate, if I can, the possibilities of these situations; for this, Senators, is a very vital matter, and we must try to estimate the feelings of peoples and of governments and the swayings of human sentiments in the years to come and the crises which may arise from time to time, and which may be and undoubtedly will be affected by the terms of article 10 of the treaty.

Would our position under a compromise reservation such as this be a comfortable one? Would it be secure? How would our conscience feel? Would we feel that we were conducting ourselves in international affairs with absolute candor and honesty?

If I were to make any special criticism of the compromise reservation, I would say that it was lacking in candor; that it was not quite an honest way of going about making a reservation. It says one thing, or one set of things, and implies something else. It does not hit straight from the shoulder and deal with the obligation in the first instance and deal with it conclusively. It leaves that element of doubt in people's minds, an element of doubt that will live through the years, and which may come back to plague us some day; and, Mr. President, I do not want that element of doubt left in it. I do not want to have any question about what the people of the United Sates have pledged themselves to do or have refused to pledge themselves to do.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] asked a moment ago what I thought of the meaning of the phrase "in the exercise of full liberty of action." Well, Mr. President, I do not know what to think of it. When I read it in conjunction with the rest of the reservation I do not know what degree of freedom of action we will have.

We may claim complete and full freedom of action, but it is very difficult to exercise full freedom of action in connection with an obligation that has not been distinctly removed. If the obligation is still there in any form whatsoever, implied or otherwise, your freedom of action is somewhat cramped.

So while I would not assume to give a conclusive interpretation of the meaning of that one phrase in this connection, I do mean to suggest to the Senators that there is some doubt as to just what degree of freedom of action the United States would have under the terms of this compromise.

Mr. President, this is the crux of the whole treaty. This is the article in the treaty which has attracted most attention all over the world, certainly in the United States. It constitutes an attempt, in my humble judgment, to put a strait-jacket upon mankind, which shall not be changed or removed without the consent of a supergovernment. It constitutes an attempt to pledge the Government and the people of the United States to throw all their resources and all their men into any and every war that breaks out in the future that may be accompanied by aggression by one party as against another.

I hope and pray, Mr. President, that we will never undertake any such obligations; that we will never make any such pledge; and that the Senate, when it acts, will act in such a way that no doubt whatsoever will live in the mind of any reasonable man that that pledge is denied and that the assumption of that obligation is refused.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. May I ask the Senator why, in his analysis of the different phrases of this reservation, he has wholly omitted any reference to the phrase "controversies between nations," whereby we assume no obligation to interfere in any way in controversies between nations? Can the Senator imagine any case of external aggression that we would get into that did not involve a controversy between nations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have been wondering why that phrase was placed in exactly that position. First we say we will not promise to use our Army or Navy, in effect, or our resources, or a blockade. Then we say we will not promise to interfere in controversies.

I take it that interference in controversies, as used in that connection, must refer to something other than the use of the Army and Navy or resources or blockade. It must cover something else not contemplated in the phrase immediately preceding it.

Mr. LENROOT. If there is no obligation to interfere in controversies, what obligation can be assumed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The obligation to preserve still remains.

Mr. LENROOT. Is not that interfering in a controversy?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It may be deemed so, but what becomes of the obligation? Can we assume an obligation in one line and deny it in the next, and do it with candor and honesty?

Mr. LENROOT. We do not assume it. The whole reservation is excluding obligations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that is the point of it I am in doubt about, and it is ambiguous. It seems to me that the original obligation of article 10 is not materially disturbed by this compromise reservation.

Mr. MOSES. May I call to the attenton of the Senator from Wisconsin the historic fact, which has been mentioned here in this debate and mentioned elsewhere more frequently, that any controversy which may have arisen between the German Empire and Belgium in August, 1914, was of such a momentary character that the aggression had taken place before even the controversy was formulated?

Mr. LENROOT. No; but there was a controversy the moment the German armies stepped upon Belgian soil.

Mr. MOSES. That was an aggression, Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator refers to that as a controversy. Then would the Senator be willing to put in the reservation an explanatory phrase to the effect that the word "controversy" includes conflicts with reference to territorial boundaries or political independence?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say in response that the Senator from Idaho is one of those who say, "What is the use of changing language when the language is clear?" This is just as clear as language could make it, and applying the Senator's own reasoning, why add language to that which is already clear?

Mr. BORAH. I will show the Senator in a minute that he is mistaken.

There are controversies, as the Senator will admit, which do not involve territorial integrity or political independence.

Mr. LENROOT. But——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment until I get through. There are controversies which do not involve those under article 10. Therefore, under a familiar rule of construction, this word having been used in contradistinction to "territorial integrity and political independence," the presumption would be that you were covering those controversies which were not covered by the classes formerly mentioned. So, will the Senator be willing to insert in this substitute, in connection with the words "political controversy," the words, "meaning, as well, controversies over territorial integrity and political independence"?

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield now?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is correct in saying that there may be controversies other than those arising under article 10. That is true; but the controversies which are here referred to are only controversies arising under article 10. It says so in express language, and article 10 refers only to external aggression and political independence. Therefore, that is the only kind of a controversy that could be included in the reservation.

Mr. BORAH. But there may be controversies under article 10 which do not involve political independence or territorial integrity.

Mr. LENROOT. How could there be, since the whole obligation is over external aggression?

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but you have gone outside of the language of article 10 and used a term that is not in article 10 at all—the word "controversies."

Mr. LENROOT. That is in the original Lodge reservation.

Mr. BORAH. I know it is in the original Lodge reservation, but it is not in article 10, and you are using language which is not in article 10 at all. Now, will you be willing to put into this reservation language which shows that it refers to the same kind of controversies which article 10 covers?

Mr. LENROOT. I see no objection to it. There can be no question about it.

Mr. BORAH. All right. When the time comes we will put it in.

Mr. REED resumed the speech begun by him yesterday. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I desire to modify the substitute I offered in accordance with the suggestion made a few moments ago by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], to which we all assented, because we all believe it means precisely the same thing. I want to modify my substitute by inserting, at the end of line 5, after the word "nations," the words "including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence"; and I ask that it may be printed in that form.

Friday, March 12, 1920.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has this moment concluded a speech remarkable alike for candor and clearness. Holding him in profound respect and affectionate regard, I regret that we are unable to agree upon the League of Nations. He stands for the league with certain reservations; I am against this league in toto.

In my judgment the speech he has just made amounts to a confession that the league covenant ought to be rejected. When the Senator from Georgia, in substance, states that every day the people of the United States are turning against this treaty, that it must be ratified now, if at all, he tacitly admits that the instrument will not stand the test of investigation, and that as soon as the people examine it they will condemn and reject it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator has not correctly stated my position. What I said was that the friends of ratification without reservations must know that the changes have been against them. I believe that the overwhelming majority of the people of this country favor ratification with reservations.

Mr. REED. But the Senator also said that every day the people were turning—those are not his exact words, but that is the meaning—and that you could get the treaty to-day with less reservations than you ever again could get it. That means that every day the people inspect this treaty, the more they want to be rid of it, the more evil they see in it.

It is a singular argument we have listened to. It is the argument of a very great Senator, my personal friend, and almost always we have fought on the same side of leading questions. But what is his statement boiled down? "Pass this thing now in whatsoever form you can, because if you wait until the people have spoken the people will repudiate it." He said just that when he declared that, looking over the list of Senators who are to be reelected, it was plain that those who were against the treaty altogether would be here in greater numbers and greater proportion after the election than they are now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I did not say that. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. REED. Mighty near it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not get mighty near it.

Mr. REED. Then, let the RECORD stand between us.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. REED. But I want the Senator to make any correction he desires.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That was not my position. My position was that ratification without reservations would be weaker next year than it would be now. That was my position. My position was that it was most important, even during the next 12 months, that we should have the benefits that would come to this country from the treaty with proper reservations safeguarding American interests.

Mr. REED. Did not the Senator say that rejection now was rejection for all time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think I did.

Mr. REED. Very well, then, that is equivalent to the statement that as soon as the American people get at this thing they will not only cut out its heart but all the rest of its viscera; that they will have none of it. When I find myself standing in the American Senate asking that something be done hurriedly because the American people will repudiate it as soon as they have a chance to hold an election, I shall feel that I am cheating the people. Yet that is where the Senator's logic really brings us. I am, however, sure the Senator does not really want to deprive the people of their just rights. He is incapable of such an act. If the Senator had argued for the reservations, that they were proper and right and therefore ought to be accepted, he would, of course, have been upon different ground.

I am interested in following the Senator's line of thought, though, that we must accept this instrument now or we will never get it at all. It is presented to the American people and to the world as the herald and guarantor of a new era. We are told that it will inaugurate the millennium; that wars will be no more; that virtue will reign; and that justice will hold universal sway. At the same moment it is asserted that if we do not adopt it before there is an election we will never have the treaty, at least in its present form—that is to say, the American people will repudiate this heaven-born blessing that, like a celestial dove, comes with "healing on its wings."

Mr. President, that is exactly what they will do; that is exactly what they are doing, they are turning each day more and more against the league. The argument of the Senator at once confesses and demonstrates the fact. Let us follow it further.

The Senator tells us that until recently all the newspapers were for the league without reservations, but that substantially all of them are to-day for the league with reservations. What does that mean? That they all admit to-day that the league as originally submitted has in it 18 vital defects.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Again the Senator misunderstands me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would misrepresent those papers if I said they were for it or preferred to have it with the reservations. What I said was that while they still prefer it without the reservations, they conceded that they could not get it and urged Senators who preferred it without reservations to support it now with the reservations which the majority of the Senate might put upon it. My entire line of thought was that the country was accepting the view that the reservations are proper. I did not go into a discussion of the reservations at this time. I have done that frequently before. I do maintain that most of them are wise and desirable.

Mr. REED. Very well. Then the Senator states that, exculpating the newspapers and saying that the newspapers have not changed at all——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I did not say that. I said they had changed.

Mr. REED. They still want the treaty without reservations, but will take it with reservations if they can not get it without reservations. The Senator still says that the public now believes in the reservations; that is to say, that public opinion has moved from a unanimous acceptance of this document without a single change to a position where the public now demands 14 more vital changes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Eighteen reservations in order to make it respectable; and the spokesman for the Republican Party, in addition to that, demands that the first hour of the first day of a Republican administration they shall call a conference for rewriting the whole instrument, in order to make it safe to live under.

Mr. REED. Let me follow my thought a moment. I have referred to 18 changes, because when the President delivered the original constitution of the league he declared, "There was a reason for every word of the document." That is to say, that the document should be accepted without change. Nevertheless certain Senators had the temerity to call attention to its grave defects and dangers. We showed:

1. That the Monroe doctrine had been surrendered.

2. That once the United States entered the league it could not withdraw.

3. That a majority of the council could determine questions of world-wide importance; that therefore five men sitting as members of the council might grievously affect the interests of the United States.

4. That jurisdiction could be assumed over matters really domestic in character.

We also pointed out many other defects and dangers. For this we were denounced as reactionaries, as "pygmy minded," as men afflicted "with curious aberrations of thinking," as men "whose heads were only fit to serve as knots to prevent their bodies from unraveling," as "dishonest opponents of the treaty, who will be gibbetted, and who will regret that the gibbet is so high." The President even went to the extent of saying that he would like to see Senators who opposed the treaty "hung on a gibbet as high as heaven, but pointed in the opposite direction."

Nevertheless, when the President brought back the revised treaty, they had written into it a new article relating to the Monroe doctrine which reads as follows:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine for securing and maintaining peace.

The provision was ineffective and deficient, nevertheless its insertion amounted to an admission that the critics had been correct.

The treaty also came back with a new clause relating to the right of withdrawal. It read:

> Any member of the league may, after two year's notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

This was, of course, an admission that the critics were right when they asserted that there was no way to withdraw from the league. But it was deficient in that it still left the council of the league with authority to decide whether or not we had performed our international obligations and our obligations under the covenant, and as this would require a unanimous vote, we would be barred from withdrawal by the vote of a single member of the council.

When the treaty came back it also contained this entirely new language:

> Except where otherwise expressly provided in this covenant or by the terms of this treaty decisions at any meeting of the assembly or council shall require the agreement of all the members of the league represented at the meeting.

The insertion of this language was a plain admission that the critics had been right when they had asserted that the league decisions could be arrived at by a mere majority vote.

There were important changes in the provisions of the treaty regarding the control over domestic affairs, which demonstrated that the critics had been right who had called attention to the fact that our domestic affairs were jeopardized.

There were many other important changes. Yet, notwithstanding all these admissions, not a single one of the great men who have seen fit to criticize Senators have ever, so far as I know, withdrawn any of the insulting charges they have hurled at our devoted heads. If the critics of the league had done nothing but point out these wrongs and secure their remedy, they were entitled to the gratitude of the President and of the country. They will some day, I am sure, have the gratitude of the country.

And now, after all these changes have been made, the great Senator from Georgia asserts that the press and the people of the country demand that the treaty shall be changed in 14 additional important respects. This conviction has been a matter of slow growth. It required weeks of insistence on the part of the critics of the league as finally submitted to force the admission that the British Empire does have six votes in the assembly of the league. It was at last further admitted with great reluctance that the colonies of the British Empire are qualified to sit as members of the council and that they have all the rights possessed by the five great powers, except that they are not permanent members of the council.

Coming now to the 14 reservations. What are they? The President says every one of them changes the character and construction of the league. The President declares every one of them to be fatal to the league. He asserts that we have not only cut the heart of the league when we propose a reservation to article 10, but he asserts in addition to that that we have cut off the arms and its legs and the functions and powers of the whole body of the league by the other reservations. Yet with the President so asserting, there are Senators here who say that the newspapers that supported the league without a single change are now logical when they propose to support it with 14 changes which the President says are in each instance fatal to the instrument.

I shall again refer to this topic in a moment. Permit me the privilege to digress a moment that I may pay my respects to the Louisville Courier Journal, which assumes to tell the Democrats of the Senate how they ought to vote on these reservations.

Henry Watterson is all there ever was to the Louisville Courier Journal. It was the child of his heart, the offspring of his soul. It was his genius that gave it life; his character and energy has sustained it through the long years. And yet, sir, in the very eventide of his existence when, surveying the western horizon, he contemplated the sun of his life sinking majestically into the shadow land, the proprietors of the Louisville Courier Journal incontinently discharged him because as an American citizen he had dared expose the infamies of this league of treason. That journal, which under its new management has heaped every character of contumely upon those who have dared criticize the league, now assumes to give advice which may be epitomized as follows: "If you can not save the whole treasonable thing, give us at least some treason, some surrender of American sovereignty. If you can not yield all, at least yield a part of the control of the American Republic into the hands of European rulers."

What the Louisville Courier Journal says every crooked, selfish international banker echoes, and as they speak you can hear the clinking of the golden profits they have all gathered and you can understand their anxiety to make further profits out of future exploitation of Europe—the while their securities are guaranteed in the blood of America's sons.

The Senator states that there are papers in Georgia which formerly demanded the league without change which are now advocating reservations. I give those papers credit for having changed their views, because the forces of inexorable logic and fact have been felt in the sanctums of the wise. They have begun to see some of the enormities and iniquities of this instrument which they had at first indorsed without sufficient study.

I have no quarrel with the editors of the country, but with all due respect to them I raise the question whether there are 50 editors in the United States who, if required to pass a real examination on the terms of the League of Nations and the effect upon the world and upon the United States of the league, could secure a rating of 15 per cent.

Witness a telegram sent out this morning by the New York World. It proposes that we substitute for all the reservations now under consideration a single reservation and that that reservation should contain nothing but the Constitution of the United States. It urged that such a reservation ought to satisfy everybody, and that it would preserve both the Constitution and the league.

I am amazed that any man should possess an intellect so marvelous as to produce so sublime an idea. Manifestly, the editor thinks that the Constitution of the United States will not even exist after the League of Nations is adopted, unless it is written as a reservation to the League of Nations. Hence, he would have us, as a supplement to that document, write "and the Senate further reserves to the people of the United States the Constitution." He seems entirely to forget that the Constitution will exist notwithstanding any action of the Senate; that it was in fact created by the people; and that they alone, thank God, can strike it down.

Certain great papers in my State, four of them I believe in the city of St. Louis, have changed their attitude.

Some months ago, in a speech in the city of St. Louis, I ventured to call attention, among other things, to the dangers of this treaty. I pointed out that it surrendered the Monroe doctrine; that it took us into a foreign league and left us no way of escape. One of the editors of a great paper at a mass meeting the next day denounced me as an anarchist. That editor has since been in Washington urging that reservations must be adopted. This he does not ask as a matter of expediency in order to get the treaty accepted, but because he is convinced that without reservations the treaty is a menace to the American Republic. I give to that editor the credit that, having been convinced of a mistake, he has manfully sought to right the wrong.

It is true that there is to-day in the United States scarcely a single great newspaper that is not demanding the ratification of the treaty with reservations or opposing it altogether. Those who demand the ratification of the treaty with reservations act from different motives. I believe most of them are honest, and most of them believe that reservations must be put upon the treaty; but if we can just have this question go to the American people it will not be long after the fight of the campaign is on until you will find a great number of them declaring that they were always against the treaty—head, horns, and tail—and that it all ought to be rejected.

However, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]—and I am very glad he said it—tells us the treaty must be adopted now or it will never be adopted.

Why will it never be adopted? Because, to adopt the language of Robert Lansing, the people are finding out what the treaty lets them in for. There is not a Senator but knows that if the question were submitted to the people, "Shall the treaty be accepted without amendments or reservations?" or, "Shall it be rejected?" that it would be incontinently rejected by a majority of the people of the American States.

And yet, sir, when these debates began there was scarcely a State or a township of a State in the Union the people of which would not at that time have voted to accept the treaty exactly as it was delivered to us.

But now we have arrived at the point where the country is convinced that there are 14 great evils yet remaining in this instrument, and the only hope for its ratification is to admit those evils and cut them out. A little further debate—and to this I shall give attention in a day or two—will demonstrate that the Lodge reservations do not take the evils out of the instrument. I undertake to prove on the floor of the Senate that after the Lodge reservations have been made the world government set up under the league can involve this country in all the wars of the world without the consent of Congress.

I shall undertake to prove that notwithstanding the Lodge reservations we by this treaty sacrifice the sovereignty of the United States.

I shall also undertake to show that in so far as the President and the Senate can prostrate the glory, honor, and independence of the United States at the feet of European powers this document, even with the Lodge reservations, accomplishes that infamous result.

Coming to a discussion of the reservations, I candidly admit that their tendency is in the right direction, but they do not go far enough to accomplish a substantial result.

Of what avail is it to declare that the United States assumes no obligation under a particular article if the same obligation is imposed by other articles against which there is no reservation?

What does it profit us to place slight limitations upon specific acts of a world government and at the same time grant general powers which include and go beyond the specific powers we have sought to preserve?

The Lodge reservations are open to these objections.

It is as though a farmer were to seek to protect his crops by a fence and yet leave in the fence a number of gaps through which marauding cattle could enter and devour the produce of his field.

It is as though one were to seek to protect by a dike the ravages of a flood and yet leave breaks in the dike through which the waters could pour with resistless force.

After all the Lodge reservations have been accepted they leave to the league a jurisdiction so broad that it may assume to pass upon questions which involve the life of the Republic. A single example proves my statement.

There was offered by the Foreign Relations Committee a reservation which I suggested. Briefly, it provided that the United States declines to submit to the League of Nations any question involving its national honor or its vital interests. The reservation was defeated. Every Senator who voted against that reservation declared by his vote that under the covenant of the league we were compelled to submit our national honor and vital interests to the league. He declared by his vote that under the league covenant we were obliged to submit questions involving the very life of the Republic, and he further declared he desired that such questions should be so submitted. That authority is still vested in the league. Notwithstanding the other Lodge reservations, questions of vital interest and national honor must still be submitted.

The reservation was rejected by a majority vote of the Senate. It is not now numbered among the Lodge reservations. The Senators who voted against the reservation and who thereby voted to submit to a tribunal composed of seven foreigners, five of whom are the representatives of emperors or kings, the honor and life of the United States were:

Ashurst	Henderson	Myers	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sterling
Colt	Kellogg	Owen	Swanson
Cummins	Kendrick	Phelan	Thomas
Dial	Kenyon	Pittman	Townsend
Edge	Keyes	Pomerene	Trammell
Fletcher	King	Ransdell	Underwood
Gay	Kirby	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	Lenroot	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Hale	McCumber	Simmons	Warren
Harris	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Harrison	McNary	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott

Those for the reservation were:

Ball	France	Lodge	Phipps
Borah	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Poindexter
Brandegee	Gore	McLean	Reed
Calder	Gronna	Moses	Sherman
Capper	Harding	New	Shields
Curtis	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Spencer
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sutherland
Elkins	Knox	Page	Wadsworth
Fernald	La Follette	Penrose	Watson

Not voting:

Culberson	Fall	Stanley

I repeat that the Senators who voted against this reservation declared that they were willing to submit the vital interests of the United States to a body of seven foreigners.

Mark you, we do not sit and our antagonist does not sit; no American sits; we are to submit the vital interests of the United States to a tribunal upon which sit the representative of the King of England, of the Mikado of Japan, of the King of Italy, of the King of Greece, of the King of Spain, of the King of Belgium, and the representatives of the Republics of France and Brazil. Of those named our antagonist will not sit, but the others will be there. So, I repeat, it is proposed that the vital interests of the United States shall be submitted to a tribunal of foreigners instead of being kept, as our vital interests are now kept, in the hearts of the American people, protected by their strong arms and heroic souls.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator believe that the people of any country which may become a member of the league could be induced to submit to a decision of this tribunal against their vital interests if they could resist successfully?

Mr. REED. Unquestionably they could not; unquestionably the United States would fight, but it would fight under the disadvantage of this treacherous contract. Do it if you will, but when you do it do not go out to the American people and say you have Americanized this contract; do not go out to the American people and tell them that you have agreed to submit the life of the United States to a tribunal of foreigners and that that is an Americanized document. It is a treasonable thing. If Eugene Debs had returned from Europe and proposed action without force that would have resulted in submitting the vital interests of the United States to a tribunal of seven aliens he would have been hanged before this if the crowd had gotten hold of him, and if the law had seized hold of him he would have been sent to the penitentiary.

This league covenant with the Lodge reservations is constantly referred to as an Americanized document. "An Americanized document," indeed! Let me paint you a picture: The United States has a controversy over the Panama Canal. It undertakes to say that it is going to run that canal as it sees fit, because it is its property, and it is actually going to charge tolls to a British ship for going through the canal and it is going to let its own coastwise vessels go through without paying any toll. Thereupon the process of "Americanization" begins. We are summoned, at the suit of Great Britain, to—where is our new capital to be?

Mr. BORAH. In London.

Mr. REED. I think that is where it is actually going to be, but let us say Geneva. That is the first step in the process of "Americanization." The summons is issued to us by the secretary of the League of Nations, an Englishman. It it delivered by a British sheriff or a British diplomat. That is the second step in the process of Americanization. The United States is told it must answer by a given day; and so I see old Uncle Sam packing his carpetbag and getting together all his old treaties and all the lawyers he can to go with him, and he is now going across, over to London or Geneva, to be "Americanized."

When he gets there, there is a long table. Seated at this table are the representatives of five kings and two republics. One of the republics is tied to Great Britain with chains of steel and the other republic is tied to Great Britain by commercial interests; and now they proceed to "Americanize" Uncle Sam. He is told to take his seat at the table, and I can hear a fanfare of trumpets as the representative of the great British Empire comes in and is announced by the crier, and he takes his seat; and so they proceed before this foreign tribunal to try old Uncle Sam, and when they get through they render a decision that under a treaty we are bound to let British ships go through the canal as cheaply as American ships, and the decree is signed and sealed and delivered by a unanimous vote. Thereupon Uncle Sam, now thoroughly Americanized, is told that he can either obey that decree, issued by the representatives of foreign governments, or he can incur the pains and penalties that the league may visit upon him; and so the old man comes back genuinely Americanized.

Americanize this treaty? You can no more Americanize it than you can make a domestic animal out of a rattlesnake. It is a league of power, and the league of power is there, and the poison of internationalism is in its fangs, and the death of nationalism is within its deadly and scaly folds. An Americanized treaty!

Let us take another illustration.

Mexico proceeds to demean herself so that some day Uncle Sam says, "We will not stand this any longer." The American people say, "Long enough you have ravished and ravaged our border towns and our border people. Long enough you have disregarded the rights of the United States. We propose to go down there and stop you." Thereupon, Mexico wires the British secretariat of the League of Nations, and again Uncle Sam is summoned, and again he makes a painful trip across the water, and again he is subjected to the humiliation of having his sovereign rights interfered with by the satellites of kings, and again a decree is rendered, and the United States is told that in the opinion of these foreigners, who live 3,000 miles away, Mexico is right and we are wrong, and that we must let these outrages go on indefinitely.

And so old Uncle Sam comes back again thoroughly Americanized!

What do you mean by Americanizing a treaty, anyway? What did you coin that catchword for? What is there American about this treaty? Do we need it for our protection? No. Does the League of Nations possess any power? Yes. I will not dispute for the moment about how much power or how little it possesses. I will say that it is a supergovernment of the world. It is a supergovernment of the world with the Lodge reservations on it, and it is a supergovernment of the world without them. But I will not stop to dispute that. It has power. Everybody admits that. Where does it get that power?

It had no power until it was called into existence, of course, for it did not exist. If, then, you set up a new body of power, where does it get its power? The power that it gets must be subtracted from the power of other countries. Whatever power it possesses that is conferred by the United States is taken from the powers of the United States. To that extent we have had our right to control our own affairs taken away. To that extent we have sacrified the sovereignty of this Republic. I want to know by what warrant of authority, under what clause of the Constitution of the United States, 96 Senators sitting here, and one President, have the right to take away any of the sovereign powers of the sovereign people of the United States, numbering 110,000,000?

We were sent here, sir, not to surrender power, but to preserve power; not to grant away the rights and liberties of this Republic, but to preserve them; and we swore before Almighty God that we would defend the Constitution and the Government of the United States.

Americanize the treaty? Let me give you another example of Americanization.

President Wilson is on record—and I cite him, although he seems to be rapidly getting into total eclipse on this side of the Chamber. All the mild repudiationists on both sides who have each morning gone down and drunk from the fount of his wisdom, and have each night uttered up a prayer that in the morning he would be there to guide them, are the men who are now turning their backs upon the President; and all of these papers, that for a year of time have denounced every man who dared have an opinion of his own, because he differed from the President, are now themselves assailing the President. But, coming to another example of Americanization, it was the American policy, as the President said, even after we entered this war, that we should preserve ourselves free from foreign entanglements and the quarrels of other peoples, save where America's interest was directly concerned. Just a few days before we entered the war, he said: "Gentlemen, are you ready for the test? Are you ready to enter where America's interests are involved, and to withdraw the moment America's interests are no longer common with those of all the rest of the world?"

The substance of his language was that we would enter this war for the purpose of vindicating America's rights, and then we would immediately withdraw from the conflict.

This was the American doctrine. Let us see how it will work under this new kind of Americanism—this diluted, internationalized Americanism—this treacherous and treasonable Americanism.

There is a quarrel between Italy and Jugo-Slavia over Fiume, a little Italian town with 50,000 population. Italy and Jugo-Slavia can not settle it. Thereupon the council of the League of Nations undertakes it, and they render a decision, and thereupon it is ordered that the United States shall apply economic pressure; that she shall cease to ship her goods to Italy or to Jugo-Slavia; and then the war drums begin to roll. Then the draft becomes automatically effective, for those are the terms of the new military bill—that as soon as we are at war the draft becomes automatically effective. The President, by proclamation, can call to arms every man between 18 and 45.

So the draft is invoked, and we see the boys leaving the farms, the workshops, the banks, the counting houses, coming to camps of concentration; women weeping until the eyes are red and the fountain of their tears are dried up; and we see them brought down to the ports and loaded on vessels and sent across over into Italy or Jugo-Slavia, and there they are dying in a fight they have no interest in. Their blood is splashed upon the white snows of the Alps. Their bones lie whiter yet than snow in the valleys of the mountains. What are we doing with these boys? Americanizing them; Americanizing them under this Americanized treaty!

Again, a conflict arises between Poland and Russia. The council of the League of Nations meets and declares that Russia is wrong or that Poland is wrong. Once more I see the boys called out; once more I hear the roll of the war drums; once more I behold them fighting in a cause in which they have no interest, dying over there on the plains of Russia, perishing in her swamps, killing men who have never done them any harm on earth. But it is all right. They are being Americanized.

Again, a conflict arises between Japan and China. Chinamen in Shantung endeavor to throw off the chains of Japan, and China sends her troops, and her brothers and her sons, who for 6,000 years have lived under the Chinese banner, and our boys are sent there this time to help the Japs kill the Chinamen, where they have come to the rescue of their brethren. This is an Americanized treaty! The thing that needs to be Americanized is the United States Senate.

Oh, for the ancient spirit that proclaimed the independence and sovereignty of this country! Oh, that the soul of Washington might, like a pillar of flame, appear! Oh, that the heroes of the Revolution might march by, a shadowy host, and from their fleshless lips they could speak! What think you they would say of Americans who surrender back to Great Britain the right to say what the policy of the United States shall be? Let Nathan Hale look down from his scaffold. Let the dead arise and speak, and see if those who fought and died that this country might be born regard this as an Americanized doctrine.

Mr. President, this much I have to say, that there is no middle ground. Reservations represent the compromise between conscience and cowardice of the man who fears to face his constituency when there is a great propaganda on that well nigh swept the American people off their feet. But the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] says they are getting back on their feet, and if you want to get this thing over, do it quickly; do it before the American people get a chance at it, because he says if you do not do it now you never can do it. Mr. President, why not let the American people speak?

Before I leave the subject, let me say that there is a great deal of logic in the position of the President. He says: "Take this treaty or leave it." I quote his words. Those of you who have been conjuring in his name thus far, and whose title to the good will of your people rests upon your faithful following and your ability not to think for yourselves, will not be able longer to shield yourselves behind presidential coat tails, because the President says: "Take it or leave it." I say he is logical.

If you undertake a great task which requires immense power, which involves great danger, then you must furnish the power or the danger will be certain to result in your destruction.

Let me give you a homely illustration. You send a sheriff out here to arrest a body of bandits, but before he goes you take away his gun. The inevitable result is that you have increased the danger to the sheriff. If you give him his gun and if you give him a powerful posse comitatus, the probabilities are that the bandits will surrender, but if you send him there upon that mission and disarm him in advance, it is almost certain that he will meet with destruction.

As soon as certain nations of the earth set up a supergovernment over all the world, to judge the cause not only of their own members but the cause of every nation of the world, even of those who have refused to come under the sway of the power set up, you interfere at once with the affairs of these other powers, and when you undertake to interfere with a great power you had better be ready to back up your intereference. If you are not ready to back up your intereference, then you have incurred the enmity and ill will and aroused the fears of that power, with the result that war will be almost inevitable. The only way to make this kind of a League of Nations a success is to make it so powerful it can crush all opposition. If you do that, it will exist for a while and hold within its mighty hands the liberties of the world. But I warn you that even with all the power you can give it the day will come when the protesting spirit of men will no longer submit to an international slavery established by an international body run by five countries, and war will result.

But to put that evil off as long as possible, you had better be ready before you undertake this herculean task to arm yourself with the strength of Hercules. Otherwise you will only stir up disturbance and you will bring to yourself calamity.

You have had a very recent example. There lay Russia prostrate for the time being. We had the option of letting Russia alone, letting her attend to her own business and work out her own salvation, and in the end hoping for her friendship. Or we had the other option, to go in and conquer her and set up a stable government. We did neither. We went in far enough to irritate Russia and obtain her ill will for perhaps a century. We went there half armed, half equipped, half prepared. Contempt, perhaps, would be a better expression to employ. Having goaded Russia and incurred the ill will of her people and lost the lives of a lot of gallant men, we withdrew. That was a war with reservations; and a war with reservations, like a treaty with reservations, is always bound to be a failure.

Sir, therefore I say the President is logical when he says take this treaty or leave it; take it and give it power to function or else be men enough to reject it. He has not only said that once, but he has said it a score of times.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator before he left the other subject if he thinks that under the reservations as proposed the sending of the boys across the water to fight the battles of other nations can be done?

Mr. REED. Absolutely.

Mr. KENYON. I am not willing to vote for anything which will permit that to be done, but I have been under the impression that the proposed reservations would prevent that very thing. I would like to have the Senator's view as to why the reservations will not prevent it.

Mr. REED. That is a theme that I intend to discuss later. Will the Senator pardon me if I defer my answer?

Mr. KENYON. I am perfectly willing to withdraw my question and let the Senator take that up when he reaches it.

Mr. REED. No; I want very briefly to answer it at this time. It is provided in article 3:

> The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

In article 4 it is provided that—

> The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

Thus is given by these two propositions a complete jurisdiction over every question, external and internal, that, in the opinion of the masters of these two bodies, affects the peace of the world. There is nothing in human language that can be broader than the phraseology I have referred to.

Article 11 recites that—

> Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations.

What does that mean? The league may take any action effectually to safeguard the peace of nations. What does that mean except that the league, with the armies and navies it may control or be permitted to call upon, can make war upon that nation and crush it?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just a moment, and I will yield to the Senator. Let us take a concrete example. Let us assume that Russia and Poland get into a war or they are threatening war. The league can take any action it sees fit to prevent that war. Let us assume that it summons these nations to its bar and they defy its will; then the only action that can be taken—and we must assume that they intend an effective action—is to conquer Russia or Poland, or both of them, by the force of arms. The President has said, and I quote his exact words:

> Article 11 is my favorite article. At present we must attend to our own business, but under article 11 we can attend to other people's business.

So we now have article 11 assuming the jurisdiction and right to suppress any uprising or to conquer any nation that dares to fight. I am coming to the matter of the reservation in a moment.

Let us take the next step:

> It is also declared to be the friendly right—

What does that word "friendly" mean?

> It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

The right is here given for the League of Nations to dip its fingers into every conceivable kind of question that in its opinion—for there is no Supreme Court to regulate its conduct and no Constitution to limit its authority—will result in disturbing the good understanding between nations.

Now we come to article 15:

> If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the secretary general, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.
> The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate.
> If the dispute is not thus settled the council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.
>
> If a report by the council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the members of the league agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

So if the decision was against us, no matter how infamous it might be and how vital the question might be to our life, we are bound not to go to our own defense and to assert our rights.

Then there is a provision that the dispute may be sent to the assembly by mere notice:

> The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request shall be made within 14 days after the submission of the dispute to the council.

And then article 16—

> Should any member of the league—

I want the Senator to get this—> resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15—

That is, if the decision has been against us and if we dare to go to war—

> it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

I will stop there for just a moment. We will assume, now, that there is a dispute between Russia and Roumania; that there is a unanimous decision; that one of those countries does not obey that decision. What is the situation we are in? We have solemnly agreed that we will employ all these forces, but whether we agree to it or not, whether we except ourselves from it or not, what happens? We undertake to trade with Russia, it being the offending party, but when we do undertake to trade with it all the rest of the world have agreed to seize our ships; to prohibit all intercourse between our nationals and the nationals of Russia; to cut off our commerce on the seas, and have done to us every act which goes with the making of war, except, up to this point, we have not been required to send our troops there.

Let us take the next step.

It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

We have entered this thing, we have agreed to this proposition, we have set up a tribunal to make the recommendations, and if the nations of the world do not obey that recommendation, then the league melts to pieces and is nothing; but if they do obey it, if it is intended that they shall obey it, there is an absolute power vested in the council to tell us how many soldiers to send, and it is our duty to send them.

I want somebody to point me to a reservation that does away with that obligation.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the proposed reservation that it shall not be necessary or permissible "to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose," cover that point?

Mr. REED. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. KENYON. I am reading from the reservation proposed to-day, but I think those words were in the original Lodge reservation.

Mr. REED. No; it does not exculpate us, and it is because it does not exculpate us that it is offered. The second of the Lodge reservations I do not think ever covered this question. It covered it in part; but the reservation that is now submitted is a fraud and does not relieve us from the obligation, and it was brought in here as a fraud. The Lodge reservation was that—

The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—under the provisions of article 10, or to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose, unless in any particular case the Congress, which, under the Constitution, has the sole power to declare war or authorize the employment of the military or naval forces of the United States, shall by act or joint resolution so provide.

Let us put our mind on that for just a moment.

The United States under the original Lodge reservation expressly stated that it refused to assume any obligation under article 10 and that it exculpates us from the obligation to furnish armies under article 10, but when we come to the other provisions of the treaty it is now stated we assume no obligation under the other provisions of the treaty. It is said that we do not assume an obligation to employ our Army or Navy until Congress has authorized its employment. It is said that Congress still has the power to say that it will not furnish an Army or Navy, and, of course, that power always exists. Why was not this written as it should have been written—that the United States refuses to assume any obligation under article 10 or any other part of this covenant, either moral or otherwise, to defend or send its Army or Navy? We do under the treaty assume the obligation under article 11, we do assume it under article 16, and all that the original Lodge reservation said was that we hereby notify the powers that Congress must act in each one of these two cases. But the obligation, nevertheless, was there.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the language in reference to the other articles of the treaty—in fact, all the articles—is the same in both drafts of the reservation:

The United States assumes no obligation * * * to employ the military or naval forces of the United States, under any article of the treaty for any purpose.

That is the language of both drafts.

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President; but taking the whole instrument and giving to every part of it a meaning, where that is possible, there is not a court, in my opinion, in the country but will say, with the rules of construction before it, that by entering this treaty we assume the obligation. When we sign the treaty we assume all of the obligations except where we expressly say we do not. We have expressly said that in the original Lodge reservation as to article 10; but as to all the other obligations of the treaty we have not said we do not assume them; we have simply said that we do not agree to send our Army or Navy there until Congress has so directed. However, the obligation exists; and I ask the Senator from Massachusetts, if he did not intend a difference, why did he employ different language?

Mr. LODGE. I am speaking on only one point, and that is the employment of the Army or the Navy. I say the English language can not express the idea more plainly than it is expressed here; and it is in precisely the same language as in the original reservation:

The United States assumes no obligation * * * to employ the military or naval forces of the United States under any article of the treaty for any purpose.

I confine that statement, of course, simply to the Army and the Navy.

Mr. REED. Now, let us see where that leads us. The point may seem a little finely drawn, but when this document is laid down on an international table it will be found that it is a very substantial point. The council of the League of Nations meets and resolves in favor of the use of an army and navy. The United States has agreed to this treaty; it has agreed to the setting up of that tribunal; it has agreed to that tribunal's jurisdiction; and that tribunal has acted. Our representative has sat there and acted with it. Then comes the question of enforcement, and the league recommends a certain number of soldiers from each of the countries. When it comes to our quota, we point to the clause that says we do not assume an obligation to furnish an army.

"Ah," say the gentlemen on the other side of the table, "you assumed the obligation in the treaty to preserve the peace of the world, and when you said that you did not bind yourselves to send any army until Congress ordered it you did nothing more than to certify to us that the action of Congress was necessary. Are you going to perform your duty or not? And if you are not, why did you sign this instrument, and what are you doing in here? Why are you sitting at this table attempting to control the world where it requires power, and then sitting back and saying you will furnish no part of the power?"

You can not take that position internationally. I agree with the President; we have either got to be in this thing or out of this thing; we can not sit there and vote for the control of the world and at the same time say, "We have said we will not furnish any men unless Congress said so, and we are under no obligation to furnish them because we said that." It will not so work out; it has not so worked out. We went into the war to whip Germany; we had no other motive at the time. Germany had insulted us. We had not been in the war 10 days, however, until it was a common enterprise and until we had to stand with our associates. Now, when it comes to the great question of the settlement of the war we are told in each instance that we are morally bound, and that a great proud nation can not withdraw until every one of these controversies is settled. So it will be when we sit around the council table. If we take our seat there and if we sign an obligation, as we do sign an obligation under article 11 and article 16, to enter upon the enterprise of controlling other countries, the fact that we have said that we will not send our Army unless Congress says so will not by any means exculpate us from the obligation and duty to respond and back up the decree we helped to enter.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield gladly.

Mr. LENROOT. But even assuming that there is an obligation such as the Senator suggests—which I do not think is true—the Senator's criticism is directed not against this amendment but against the original Lodge reservation.

Mr. REED. I am discussing the original reservation. Now I am going to discuss the Senator's proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that whatever the merit, if there be any, of his criticism of the original reservation, it can not apply to the amendment because of the phrase "in the exercise of full liberty of action" upon the part of Congress.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, "in the exercise of full liberty of action" applies to the right of Congress to act for itself. Let us take the position of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin. He is a fine lawyer; almost as fine a lawyer as he is a gentleman. What was the proposition he put before the Senate of the United States and the country to-day? We have drawn a thing here that means exactly what the thing which existed before meant; it has not a particle of difference in meaning; it goes into the same hole and comes out of the same hole; it functions in exactly the same way. They are as like as Siamese twins. The only difference is a change of the color of the necktie on one of the twins, but it is the same old twin. Why does the Senator offer it? The amount of his remarks, boiled down into brutal English is, "We expect to get three or four votes by it; we are going to get three or four votes by changing some words that do not change the meaning." Why will that get the votes? Are these three or four Senators so foolish that they do not know it is the same hand and that you have merely changed the glove? Are they so thick-headed as that, or are they hypocrites who want to change but are afraid to change unless you give them an excuse, and so offer them an excuse, which is no excuse at all, by giving them the same thing? You merely change a few words.

The only thing I can compare it to is the incident of the boy sitting on a bridge fishing for suckers with worms. Somebody said to him, "You had better change your bait," whereupon he slipped the worm off and put it on the other end to. He was told, "That does not change the bait really"; but he replied, "These are nothing but fish, and they have not got much sense." [Laughter.] What kind of fish are these that are going to take this painted minnow? What kind of fish are they that are going to accept a thing that does not change anything? Or is it possible that the bait has been changed, and that the fish know it, or, to adopt a more dignified phraseology, that Senators know it? I affirm that there has been a change, a substantial change, and that is why this instrument is presented here, because it embodies some substantial change. That is the reason it was written. If it was not written for that reason, it is an absolutely preposterous and idiotic thing to bring it in here, if you assume that Senators who read it have not intelligence enough to know that you have made no change.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to suggest to the Senator that I am sure nearly every Senator on this side is satisfied there is no change, and, if the Senator will be able to satisfy enough Democrats that there is a change, we may be able to ratify the treaty.

Mr. REED. If the Senator is satisfied there is no change, why did he offer it? Why does he offer a thing that does nothing? Why does he go through all the circumlocution that is necessary in order to do something that does not do anything? What is the sense in that unless you expect to fool somebody who has not brains enough to know that you have presented him something that does not change the reservation, and who is going to accept it without knowing he is being fooled?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When he is told he is going to be fooled, what does the Senator think of it? [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. There is no one being fooled that I know of; but, of course, if I occupied the position of the Senator from Missouri I would take exactly the ground that he does. Will the Senator from Missouri, however, give any reason why any friend of the treaty with this reservation should object to any change in phraseology if some Senators desire it and are willing to vote for the reservation if the change is made?

Mr. REED. If I thought that the change in phraseology made no change whatever in the sense, I would say there was not any use in making it, and if a Senator told me that he wanted it because it did change the meaning, it would at least raise a doubt in my mind as to whether that Senator might not be right and I might be wrong and he was getting a change and I was being fooled. I assume, however, that the Senator from Wisconsin, as a good lawyer, when he is drawing a contract for a client and in the discussion about the council table it develops that two constructions may be put upon its language, will immediately say, "That will not do; let us write some language in here that expresses exactly what we both mean." He never drew a contract in his life and when he found that a dispute arose as to its meaning handed it over for signature. Under those circumstances he clarified the instrument; he wrote it in unquestioned language; he made it plain so that it expressed the meaning of the parties. He did not leave it to the courts and leave it to disputes afterwards, if his attention was called to it at the time. Here is a contract that concerns the world; and the Senator says that there are some words in it that he thinks do not change the meaning, but that other Senators think do change the meaning, and therefore he is willing to concede them. Thus we enter into this world contract for perhaps a hundred years of time with an ambiguity in the contract, and the Senator is offering an amendment to put the ambiguity in, for there was no ambiguity under the original reservation on that proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. If I were drawing a contract between two parties I do not think that I would follow the advice of a third party who was trying to prevent the two parties from making any contract at all.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, that is the old argument; that is to say, you have got to be for the treaty before you can have anything to say about it; you must not call attention to the fact there is camouflaging and false pretense being indulged in. There are a lot of men trying to put themselves before the country as champions of the treaty and at the same time to emasculate the treaty. That is what this amounts to. A great league of power is conceived for the purpose of controlling the world by force; we sign up to do that and then we say we will not furnish our share of the power. That is contemptible.

Saturday, March 13, 1920.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have wearied the Senate many a time with a discussion of this treaty; and yet I feel like asking Senators to listen a little longer while I discuss what I believe goes to the very heart of the proposed substitute, and which I think may serve in some manner to clarify a somewhat confused situation.

I am very sure there is a misunderstanding here that ought to be cleared up. I was never more certain of it than when I heard the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] say a few minutes ago that reservation No. 2 applies only to article 10.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator does not wish to misquote me. The reference to controversies between nations applies only to article 10.

Mr. REED. What are we dealing with here except controversies between nations? We are not dealing with controversies between individuals.

Let me say now, just as a groundwork for all that I am going to say, that we must start with the proposition that when the United States attaches its signature to this document we consent to the formation of the league and make ourselves a party to it. It is no longer a foreign body to us. We are part and parcel of it. We are a joint partner in the enterprise. We are liable for everything it does. We can not treat it as something external to ourselves.

We agree that this organization of which we are a constituent part shall possess certain powers and have a certain jurisdiction, and we are just as much responsible when we join for the creation of those powers and the creation of that jurisdiction as any other nation. It is our league, and let me emphasize the word "our." It is a thing which we help to set up and to maintain.

We provide for two governing bodies and we agree to become a member and a constituent part of those governing bodies. They are our governing bodies. Moreover, for the most part in international controversy they can not function except by our consent and by our positive action. There are exceptions, but I am speaking of the question in its broad light. Of course, one of those important exceptions is that we do not act where we are a party.

We have set up a council, of which we are a part, and that council can not take a single step in an international controversy, with the exceptions I have named, unless we, the United States, vote that that step shall be taken. So that we ourselves are responsible for breathing the breath of life into the action of the council when it relates to any of these controversies.

The proposition that we have before us to-day is that the United States shall set up a council, that the United States shall say that the council shall have jurisdiction over all controversies affecting the peace of the world, and over other controversies to which I shall call attention, and that that council shall be empowered to do certain things, and when it comes to the doing of those certain things we ourselves must vote for it.

With that situation staring us in the face the proposition is that we shall do all these things, breathe the breath of life into the action of the council, join with the council in recommending armies and navies for the purpose of carrying out the decrees of the council, join with the council in recommending war to be made upon countries; and yet in the same breath say, "But we will assume no obligation to carry out the very things being set in motion by our own vote."

There never was a more monstrous proposition offered in this world in any body of sensible men.

I affirm, without going into technicalities and refinements, that we can not set up these bodies and vote that they shall take a certain course of action and then escape the responsibility of helping to carry out the very action which we ourselves have said shall be taken; for I represent to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is here, that the council can not take any action leading to war unless the United States by its duly authorized representative has voted for that war, and that it is an infinite and unparalleled absurdity to say that we can vote that a war shall be made, recommend to the council how many troops each country shall furnish, and at the same time say that we are not under any obligation to comply with the very decree that we wrote with our own hand.

The trouble is we have not approached this thing with enough courage. Let us see, with these preliminary words, just what is the jurisdiction of this body which we are creating, and which can only function for the most part by our acts. Indulge me for a moment while I illustrate that. Let us say that there is a partnership of business men which can not under its rules act except all of the partners agree. All the partners meet and agree that a certain thing shall be done. Yet it is proposed that one of the partners, having agreed that that thing shall be done, will repudiate the very obligation to which his agreement gave life and force.

Permit me now to call attention to the things that we have agreed shall be done as soon as we sign the treaty. Article 10 embraces four distinct undertakings:

First, that we will respect the territorial integrity of all members. The Lodge reservation leaves this obligation in full force. It bars us—and Senators, I think, have overlooked this—from attacking any nation, however great the provocation or acute the emergency. We sign away our rights to attack a country, even though its armies may be massing on our borders or its navy threatening our coast cities. A British fleet might be just outside New York Harbor and British soldiers en route to Canada, yet we would be barred under this clause from making an attack, although the attack might be the best means of our defense. But I pass that with the mere mention. Nevertheless, it ties our hands, and it may tie them at a fatal moment. That obligation is left untouched.

Second, the article binds us to preserve against attack the territory of all members. That obligation under article 10 is completely repudiated by the Lodge reservation. I am speaking now of the original reservation.

Third, it binds us to preserve the existing political independence of all members of the league. That obligation is repudiated by the Lodge reservation.

Fourth, article 10 binds us that we agree, in case of attack or threat thereof, that the council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation is to be fulfilled. The Lodge reservation having refused to accept the obligation to preserve against attack, we are clearly not obliged to obey the advice of the council in regard to carrying out—I mean by the literal terms, now, of the instrument—but the council nevertheless has the power and the 31 other nations are bound by the terms of the article and the advice of the council. They therefore would be obliged to attack the United States if we were to engage in a war with Mexico, if that country is admitted to the league, and this they would be called upon to do regardless of the justice of our cause. The moment we were to attack Mexico they would be obliged to attack us.

But there is a still weightier consideration. When we sign the agreement with article 10 in it, even with the Lodge reservation as originally offered, we have agreed to a combination between the other nations of the world under which they will assert a supergovernment over the world and crush any Government going to war contrary to their will. We, having assented to this, are powerless to intervene in any way against any action the league takes. To illustrate, if China were to undertake to recover her stolen property and move her troops into Shantung, it would be an external attack, and the league would be bound to employ all its forces to destroy China, and the United States would be in the position of consenting to this when it has bound itself by the terms of the league through the obligations of the league to preserve against external attack the territory of Japan as fixed at Versailles.

It is no answer to say that we are not obliged to actually furnish soldiers until Congress shall act. The whole weight of our moral influence and our national honor is thrown in the balance against China, but having assumed the obligation of the league, how can we refuse to carry out that obligation? This obligation of the league that I am speaking of under article 10 is one which I hold does not require the unanimous action of the league, because it is an express obligation in itself and the nations are bound without any action of the league whatever.

Now, what about the obligations of the other articles? I am passing for the moment from the obligation assumed in article 10, and I am seeking to show, if I can, that even if article 10 were stricken from this covenant we are nevertheless obligated to plunge into all the wars of the world the moment we sign the covenant. If I can make Senators understand that some of them will not vote for this instrument who now contemplate doing so. What about the obligations of other articles?

By articles 3 and 4 we agree that the assembly and council may deal with any matters affecting the peace of the world. By article 11 we agree, first, that in case of war or threat of war the league may take any action it may deem wise; that is, it may take any action that it sees fit to take; second, that any member may cause the council to be immediately summoned; third, that any member may invoke the action of the council on any matter affecting international relations which threaten to disturb the peace or good understanding of the world.

Let us change that language a little and paraphrase it and put it in plain, blunt English. By article 11 we agree that the league may do whatsoever it pleases, (a) in case of war anywhere, (b) in case of any threat of war anywhere, (c) in case it decides that the circumstances threaten to disturb the good understanding between nations.

Let us see how far that goes. The present dispute between the United States and Mexico threatens to be, and in fact is, a disturbance of good understanding.

Plainly Mexico as soon as admitted, and if she is not admitted any other nation in her behalf, can invoke the jurisdiction of the council, and that body can, by our express consent, given the moment we enter the league and irrevocable by us, proceed to determine the question, and thereupon take any action it may see fit.

The Monroe doctrine, I think, is involved in this, but I shall not pause to discuss it.

We have a pending dispute with Japan. When we sign this agreement we agree that the league may take jurisdiction of that dispute and may take any action it sees fit. Its jurisdiction over that dispute is indisputable, because it is expressly provided that the league shall have jurisdiction over all disputes growing out of treaties, and Japan claims her right to plant her people in California under a treaty between Japan and the United States. What do the words "take any action it may see fit" mean? Clearly that means the right to employ arms; clearly we consent to this power being employed by the league even against us, for this league is formed as much to control us as it is to control other nations. We have been talking about the league, with us as a part of it, controlling other nations, but let us not forget that when we set this league up to control other nations, they set it up to control us. Having granted this power of the league to make war, clearly we are bound to contribute unless expressly excepted.

Let us turn now to article 11. Under article 11 we agree (1) that any war or threat of war is a matter of concern to the whole league; a matter of concern to our league which we helped to set up and of which we are a part; (2) that the league of which we are a part may take any action effectively to safeguard the peace of nations. Any action effectively to compel obedience to an order or decree of the league means the employment of military force; it means the right to make war or order war to be made.

Under that article when a controversy of any kind has arisen between nations, whether it immediately affects the members of the league or not, we declare that the controversy concerns the whole league, of which we are a part, and we expressly authorize the league to take any action that "may be deemed wise and effectual." We know, and every candid man must admit, that the action to be taken may involve, and very likely will involve, the employment of military force. We therefore sit upon this council as a member of the league; we take jurisdiction of a dispute between two countries; we vote for a certain decision; and when that decision has been rendered, if it is not obeyed, we vote what the various Governments shall do, and the vote is that they shall each furnish a certain number of troops. Having taken that action, are we in any way bound to carry out our part of the contract? Are we in any way bound to comply with the very decree we wrote with our own hand? Clearly every consideration of honor and every obligation of a contract binds us to take that action, and we are bound even though we expressly say we reserve the right of Congress not to furnish the men. Our honor is bound; we have set in motion the great international movement of armies; we have sent others into the field, and I do not care how many reservations we write, we can not escape from such a situation. As I shall show, there is no reservation that affects article 11 at all; it is more sweeping in its terms than article 10, and it is more injurious to the sovereignty of this Republic.

Let us proceed a little further to other obligations—to article 13. What are our obligations under article 13? We agree to arbitrate questions and every other nation agrees to arbitrate questions or to submit them to the council. These questions are (1) the interpretation of treaties; (2) facts constituting breaches of international obligations or treaties; (3) the extent and nature of reparation; that is, all damages or penalties to be imposed. Let us not misunderstand the term "reparation"; it means that when we are haled to that tribunal it has an unlimited power of punishment. (4) We agree that we will obey the decrees, and every other nation so agrees; (5) we agree not to resort to war against a nation which complies, and every other nation so agrees; (6) we agree that the council shall propose the steps—that is, any steps it sees fit—that shall be taken to give effect to the decree.

Now, we will assume that a controversy has arisen between two nations, one of them complaining against another, that it goes to the council, that we sit on the council, that we join in a unanimous decision against a nation, and that we command it not to do a certain thing, and that nation proceeds to do it. Thereupon the council, we sitting, votes that certain pains and penalties shall be visited upon that nation, and among other things we vote to send armed forces against it, and under the other provisions of the treaty we recommend the number of troops that our Nation shall send, and our representative votes for all these propositions. He votes that Great Britain shall send 200,000 men, and that the United States shall send 200,000 men, and that the other nations shall furnish their quotas; and thereupon the nations do furnish their quotas, and the war begins. Do you say that any reservation on earth can take us out of that obligation? Do you say that that situation does not compel us to act, and that the only thing we could do, if we had an express reservation, would be to say that we take the position that our representative can by his vote impose upon other nations the duty and obligation of going to war, and name the amount of their troops, and that we are at perfect liberty in honor to repudiate his act?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I do not take that position, but I do take the position that under article 7 our representative can do nothing except what he is permitted to do by statute.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. LODGE. And if Congress permits him to involve us in war it will be done anyway.

Mr. REED. That is to say, a statute is to be passed after we have made this treaty defining the powers of our representative.

Mr. LODGE. Why, yes. None can exist until it is passed.

Mr. REED. And when we pass that statute, we are either going to give this gentleman a seat at the table, and a vote or not; and if we are not going to give it to him, let us repudiate this treaty.

Mr. LODGE. The provision of the statute, of course, will define his duties and his powers.

Mr. REED. Exactly. Now, you have set up a body here. You have said how it shall function. It shall function through the votes of different nations. It shall have these tremendous and all-embracing powers. It shall proceed in accordance with the votes of nine men. You give a man a seat at the table as one of those nine men or you do not. If he takes his seat at the table with the other eight men and does not vote, then the council is paralyzed; it can not act. If he does vote, then the United States, through its representative, has set in motion a world war, if that is the question that is involved, or a national war, and has called upon the other nations to act; and yet by statute our man, having set all those things in motion, is held not to bind us.

Why, Mr. President, there never was a more absurd proposition in the world than that. You can ransack the literature of absurdities and you can not find its parallel.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to modify the substitute I offered in accordance with the suggestion made a few moments ago by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], to which we all assented, because we all believe it means precisely the same thing. I want to modify my substitute by inserting at the end of line 5, after the word "nations," the words "including all controversies relating to territorial integrity or political independence"; and I ask that it may be printed in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave is granted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KING. If I understand the position of my friend the Senator from Missouri, I do not know that I can quite assent to the proposition which he has laid down. His proposition, as I understand it, is that it would be the height of absurdity to be represented in the League of Nations and to impose upon our representative there restrictions and limitations which would determine his conduct, or that if we attempted to impose restrictions and limitations it would practically reduce him to a condition of impotency, so that he could not function as the representative of this Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator states my position in part, but not quite. The position I take is that here is a body upon which certain powers and duties are devolved, and that we help create that body to carry out those purposes. It functions through the council, of which we are a constituent part, and it can not carry out those obligations and duties except by the vote of our representative. Now, if we say that our representative shall go into that council with powers so limited that he can not bind us, we have destroyed the effect of his vote, for there is no consent by America to the action, and the council is paralyzed. If he does vote and bind the council, then we are in this position: We have set in motion the machinery; we have imposed upon others obligations to do certain things as to which we say we will not do our part. If we take that position, we take a position of dishonor. We can not go in there and by our vote bind Great Britain to send 200,000 men to the field of battle, bind France to send 100,000, and so on through the list, and say at the same time and in the same breath, "We will not send a single soldier, and we are bound neither morally nor in any other way to carry out the project which we ourselves helped initiate."

I am not talking about that as a legal proposition. I am talking about it as a proposition of common sense and decency, and I am trying to present it and show the attitude we would be in before the world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to make an observation?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. KING. It is rather more than a question.

I agree with the last statement of my distinguished friend, if I properly interpret it. I agree that it would be an act of dishonor, of perfidy, if our representative on the council should vote for any proposition which resulted in war, made recommendations which called for Great Britain to furnish 200,000 men or any other number of men, and other signatories to the league to furnish various quotas for warlike purposes, and our Government did nothing, so that we devolved upon our coadjutors in this great scheme the entire responsibility. But that is not quite the question that I had in mind, and to which I desired in a respectful way to challenge the attention of my distinguished friend.

My understanding of this treaty and the reservation which has been submitted is that our representative upon the council must act or will act in conformity with laws which shall be enacted, and that we may limit and circumscribe his action by any legislation which we deem to be appropriate. We may prescribe that he shall not vote or make any recommendation without submitting it to the Executive of the United States, and that the Executive shall transmit it to Congress, and that Congress shall determine then what shall be done in a given circumstance.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me interrupt him? Does the Senator think that would be a practicable thing? Does he not know that he has stated an impossible case?

Mr. KING. I agree that that construction—and that is the proper one, I insist—makes the league a cumbersome instrumentality in respect to decisive and prompt action. It means, of course, that before any action shall be taken by the league and recommendations made consultation must be had by our representative with the Government at home, and the Government at home could paralyze his action, and where unanimity is required his paralysis would paralyze the action of the league. That is one of the weaknesses and one of the infirmities of the covenant of the league.

Mr. REED. Now, will the Senator let me ask him another question?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator believe that Congress would ever pass an act of that kind? Let us see where it would lead us.

Let us assume that an acute situation arises, like the one which brought this war on the earth. The council of the League of Nations is hastily assembled to prevent that war. The members of the council conclude that certain action ought to be recommended in order to prevent it; that Germany shall be told, in the case in point, "If you do this, all the powers of England and France and the United States and the other countries of the league will be hurled upon you to crush you." But up rises the gentleman from America and says, "I vote for this, but you must understand that before I can do anything here at all I have got to send a message to the President of the United States and ask his authority, and the President has got to transmit it to the Congress, and Congress will debate for 30, 60, or 90 days the proposition of whether the United States wants to go into this war and then probably vote that they will not go in at all."

How much of an influence will a thing of that kind be to stop a war in a great world crisis? Have you not paralyzed your infant? Is it not stillborn, if not paralyzed?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the illustration which the Senator gave is one which, I repeat, shows the weakness and the infirmity which this covenant of the league possesses. I have no doubt in the world that Congress will pass an act which will circumscribe the powers of our representative upon the council. I have no doubt that this Government, if we enter the league, will not commit to our representative upon the council the power to take action there that would involve this country in war without consultation with such agencies or instrumentalities as Congress by law shall determine; and in making that statement I concede that it impairs the usefulness of the league, or the council of the league, as a prompt and expeditious agency in taking decisive action at a time when prompt action is required. Yet, believing in the league as I do, and voting for the ratification of the league as I have in the past, and as I shall again, I think, I would not vote to confer upon the representative of this Government upon the council full and unrestricted power to act as he saw fit in the emergency or crisis which should arise. Yet, in taking that position I admit that it cripples him, that it impairs to a large degree the efficiency of the league to act promptly and expeditiously in times of great crises.

But let me put to the Senator, while not a parallel case, one which furnishes us an analogy. The Senator recalls that when the treaty of Paris was being negotiated, at the conclusion of the Spanish-American War, we sent over as our representatives Hon. George Gray, Hon. Cushman K. Davis, and Mr. Justice Day, of the Supreme Court of the United States, men learned in the law, men of great ability as statesmen and as jurists; and yet, commissioned as they were to represent this Government, they kept in constant touch by cablegram with President McKinley, and at the conclusion of each day's conversations and deliberations the results were forwarded to the President of the United States, who communicated to them what terms of the treaty would be acceptable to him as a part of the treaty-making power.

I concede that that is not quite a parallel case, and yet it furnishes an analogy. We have a member upon the council, and an important question arises which presages war; the council meets for the purpose of deliberating upon what steps shall be taken to avert the horrors of war; he communicates daily, perhaps hourly, with the President of the United States, or with Congress, depending entirely upon the character of law which we shall pass limiting his instructions, asking for the advice and instructions which he shall observe with respect to the matters coming before him. It hampers him, of course; it delays prompt action. Yet I can see, Mr. President, that that course does not nullify the league or its actions or its powers. It hampers, in some instances it may seriously cripple, its activities, but, nevertheless, it will possess great power for the prevention of war and will exercise a great influence for universal peace.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; it will exercise great powers to create international trouble, because you have made an arrangement for something which undertakes to interfere in international affairs and have deprived it of the power of action so effectively that all it can do is to interfere and make trouble. Let me take the illustration the Senator just gave us. We were negotiating a treaty of peace at Paris, and word was telegraphed back to the President daily, giving him an account of the progress. What were we doing? We were making peace at the end of a war. We had all of the time in the world to make that peace, just as we have had a year consumed in making peace with Germany. But you could not take that time in those tragic hours that intervened between the killing of the Austrian Crown Prince and the movement of the legions of Germany across the frontier of Belgium.

The Senator states that Congress may take the action he has indicated. If we ever enter this league, and Congress takes the action he has indicated, and the other nations take similar action, you could not get this league to function in 10 years' time. I will tell you what you are doing. You are proposing to have a foot race and to capitalize your man, and you are entering him with a bad case of locomotor ataxia. If you are going to enter this compact to boss the world, get into a position to boss it.

If I may drop into a very common illustration, if you are going to have a quarrel with another man, if you are going to irritate him, if you are going to thrust yourself into his disputes, go full armed, so that you can protect yourself. Do not go there and get the difficulty started, and then not be able to finish it. A league such as the Senator has proposed here would not rise to the dignity of the much discussed debating society.

I am willing to form an international debating society, but I want it to be a debating society, not a thing authorized to levy armies and to set navies in motion. But if I am going to set up a power to control this world, then I want enough power so that no nation in the world dare rise against it. Then I recognize, when I have set it up, that I have set up a power greater than my own country, a power that may destroy my own country, a world despotism in which the liberties of the American Nation are sunk. I hope that Almighty God will paralyze my arm if I ever give my consent to so infamous a thing.

Mr. President, I was discussing the powers of this league as they exist, and I am not going into the realm of the future to suppose that, we having entered this league and assumed its obligations, Congress will hereafter put us in a position where we can not help enforce those obligations. That is the proposition which is made here, not only by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], but it is the general attitude in this Chamber of many men.

Let me digress long enough to tell the country, at least, what I think about the attitude of the men who are proposing to go into this league. I have not seen one of them willing to face the issue as it is. All of them take the attitude that we are not going to plunge into the waters of this ocean and accept the responsibility and the danger, but that we are going in just far enough to get our feet wet. It is so monstrous, so wicked, so unthinkable, so un-American, that the only way they can salve their consciences is with the thought that we are not really going in.

The only man I know of who takes a bold and logical stand is the President. He says:

> Article 11 is my favorite article. At present we must attend to our own business, but under article 11 we can attend to other people's business.

Those are his exact words.

He also said that the League of Nations was greater than the Government of the United States. That is his viewpoint. His words were:

> It is greater than the Senate; it is greater than the Government of the United States.

He looks the situation in the face. He proposes an international government. He proposes a world government. He proposes to enter in with all the power and force of this Nation. He proposes to interfere in the affairs of all nations, kindreds, and tongues; but he seems to overlook the fact that when we acquire the right to interfere in the affairs of other nations we give them the right to interfere in our affairs, and that this league is no more to function against other governments and people than against us; and that if it is a power superior to the rights of other nations, it is a power superior to ours, and that if it possesses a force great enough to impose its will upon other nations, it possesses a force great enough to impose its will upon us. Thus it is proposed to create a power great enough to impose its will upon this country and to crush us if we do not obey that will.

Mr. President, there is but one power to which I am willing to trust my country, and that is the people who created this Government, and who, under the providence of God and with His generous aid, have built this mighty Nation. I can not escape the conclusion that if I were to vote to set up a power greater than the Government of the United States, capable of imposing its will upon the United States, I would be guilty of treason to the United States, and yet that is the proposition. We propose to enter a scheme of that kind and then reserve certain things. We must either be a part and a potential part or we must keep out of the accursed thing.

But, Mr. President, this is a long digression, splitting up the things that I wanted to lay before the Senate into somewhat concrete form. I have referred to the powers conferred under article 4, the obligations of article 10, powers conferred by article 11, and I come now to the powers that are conferred by certain other articles. I say that if we do not expressly except ourselves from the terms of these other articles, then we are bound by them.

Article 13 recites, as I have said, that all questions of international law, facts constituting breaches of international law, the extent and nature of reparations—that is, damages to be assessed or penalties imposed—are within the jurisdiction of the council. We agree that we will not resort to war against any nation which complies with the decree of the council, and this is true although it may have assumed jurisdiction which we have disputed, and although its decree may involve the life of this Republic. Then we agree that the council shall propose what steps shall be taken to give effect to the decree, and, sitting upon that council as a member of it, we vote what steps shall be taken. If we do not vote, if we send a man over there with both hands tied by a law so that he can not vote, then the league can not function, because they must have his vote to function under the constitution of the league itself. If we send him over with the power to vote, then he has the power to vote that is laid down in the instrument that governs this international body.

Now I come to article 15. It is there agreed that all questions that are not arbitrated shall go to the council, and that any party can force the question into the council by a mere demand. It is agreed that with its decisions, if unanimous, the parties to the controversy not voting, the losing party must comply, no matter how unjust; and again I say, even though the life of the country is at stake.

Then it is agreed that if a decision is not unanimous any party can make war in a cause, no matter how unjust. Let us see where this leads us. I will take the illustration of the last war. I will assume that the league had as its members the principal nations of Europe, and including also the United States. A dispute has arisen now to which Serbia and Austria are parties.

The council of the league is hastily assembled and an attempt is made to pass a resolution or decree that there shall not be war. If there is a unanimous vote, then the powers of the league will be invoked against those bringing on the war. But if there is not a unanimous vote, then the parties are at perfect liberty under the terms of this covenant to make war.

The question comes to a vote. Austria and Serbia, being parties, stand aside, but Germany votes no. There is no unanimous decision, and the war goes on with the complete sanction of this new Holy Alliance—that is, they have failed to command that war shall not be made. You never will get a unanimous decision in this world in any great controversy involving the interests of four or five of the great nations. It is absolutely out of the question, and the illustration I have given shows how impotent this league would have been in the case of the last war.

But suppose in addition to all that our representative, when he comes to vote, gets up in the council and says: "Well, I am a member of this council, that is true, but Senator KING, of Utah, introduced a bill in Congress providing that we could not do anything on a question like this until I had wired the President of the United States, and until he had submitted it to the Congress, and until a bill had been introduced and referred to a committee and reported to the Senate and debated for three or four or five weeks, perhaps. After all that has been done, if I get authority, I will vote. If I do not get authority, I will not vote, and there can not be any action by the council," and while he is still talking he can hear through the windows the rumble of the carriages that are hauling the 16-inch guns to the siege of Liege, and before he gets his first cablegram sent the 16-inch shells are bursting over the forts that guard the frontier of Belgium and the soil of that devoted country is trembling beneath the tread of the innumerable legions of William the Third.

Why are we indulging in boy's play? Let us do something or do nothing. Let us rely upon the strength of the American people and our national pride and institutions to defend ourselves and to set an example to the world, or else let us set up a government strong enough to protect, even though unhappily it be strong enough to destroy, for always remember that when you set up a power to do good it also has the power to do evil. When you set up a power greater than yourself, hoping and expecting that it will do that which is beneficial, bear in mind that it may do that which is deadly.

We lodge powers in American tribunals, it is true, but they are our tribunals, acting under our laws, confined by our Constitution, subject to our courts if they shall be guilty of acts of usurpation. Here is a tribunal that is a law unto itself, that is composed exclusively of foreigners, we not sitting when we have a controversy, those foreigners the representatives of Kings or Mikados with two exceptions, and those exceptions unhappily are nations that in most controversies would naturally be against us both because of interest and of environment. That is the power you set up. Who will control it? It is like the Triumvirate which was supreme over the world, and its will was the law of the world. From its will there was no appeal except to revolution.

Coming again to these powers under article 15, there is a pretense to the exception of domestic questions, but what is the exception? Who decides what is the domestic question? Is it the United States? No; it is the council of the league, and an affirmative decision is necessary in order to have a question declared to be domestic, and that decision must be unanimous, so that if we have a controversy which we claim is domestic, the league nevertheless takes jurisdiction to determine whether it is a domestic question or is not a domestic question. We being interested do not vote, and unless every other member of the council votes that it is a domestic question we have lost our case, because there must be a unanimous vote in order for the council to decide that kind of a question. No matter how we may protest our domestic affairs, a single vote to the contrary and our domestic affairs will be taken charge of by this body of foreigners.

That was the intention, undoubtedly, of the President. I would not misrepresent him; but I am warranted in making the statement that that was his intention, because, first, he gave assent to this document; second, he said it should be changed in no respect; and, third, he said the league is greater than the Government of the United States—the most astounding and most appalling words that have ever fallen from the lips of an American statesman, that the league is greater than the Government of the United States!

Moreover, when the question arises whether a dispute is domestic in its character, the league by a unanimous vote must not only decide that it is domestic but that it is solely a domestic question. If in any aspect it is international, the league takes jurisdiction; if there be one vote in the council of the league to the effect that the question is in any aspect international, then the league assumes jurisdiction. We may protest until doomsday, but it will do us no good unless it be the protest of America's Army massed to defend this country against the united attacks of the league and of the world, if the league holds together. When that day comes, I suppose somebody will remember with great consolation the fact that the mothers of America were told there would never be any more war and that they were not raising boys for gun fodder. Oh, no; that will not be remembered; that will be forgotten. The cry will go out then, "Americans, save your country"; and then, as in the past, they will come, stalwart and brave, indomitable and fearless; but because of this iniquitous compact you may compel them to fight against the armies and navies of the world instead of fighting against a single enemy.

There is a decision rendered against us or against any other nation; then article 16 provides that any member resorting to war in disregard of the mandate or the decree of this superworld government shall be placed in this condition, namely, if it shall go to war with a single nation it thereby ipso facto commits an act of war against all the other members of the league. So, Mr. President, when we sign this covenant we agree that we shall be put in a state of war not by the act of the Congress of the United States but by the act of a foreign nation over which we have no control. The act of that nation in firing a single gun in defiance of the mandate of the league ipso facto puts us into that war. That is the express language of this instrument; no man need close his eyes to it.

Then what follows? I will read it:

> Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, and 15—

Those are the articles that give the league jurisdiction and the right to decide. Any member that does not obey the mandate of the league and goes to war with a single nation ipso facto has "committed an act of war against all the other members of the league, which hereby undertake to subject it" (1) to the severance of all trade relations, (2) to the severance of all financial relations, (3) to the severance of all intercourse between its nationals and the nationals of the State that has offended against the league, and (4) each nation, which would include us, of course, undertakes the prevention of all financial, commercial, and personal intercourse between its citizens and the citizens or nationals—which is a broader term—of the State that has gone to war. Every one of these acts is an act of war. We agree that we will do all of these acts of war. They are calculated to starve a nation into subjection, to compel it to surrender and yield because its babies are sucking the dry breasts of starving mothers and because from the faces of the women has faded the rose of health and in its stead has come the pallor of death by starvation. We agree that we will do all that, and it is our duty not when Congress acts but when another State has violated the majesty of this thing we are setting up.

I wish the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] were here. The Senator from Utah argued that we could submit these matters to Congress. What a farce that is when we come to consider this article. I do not mean to say that anything the Senator said was farcical; I am speaking of the idea.

Under article 16 a state of war exists; we have agreed, as I have stated, to cut off all intercourse, and each nation agrees to that; in other words, the agreement is to blockade the ports of the proscribed country, to seize all commerce going to those ports, to completely isolate it from the world. How could we keep out of that sort of controversy if we wanted to? Our ships, if we sent them, would be seized by the other members of the league; our commerce would be destroyed if we permitted it to leave our ports, and destroyed by our partners under an authority which we expressly gave them when we signed this covenant. The very thing would happen to our commerce by virtue of this instrument which we went to war with Germany for doing. Germany undertook to stop our commerce moving into the ports of countries with which we were not at war, moving into the ports of European countries; and, because Germany did sink our ships, we went into this terrible war—and we rightly went into it, however costly it has been—but I put it to Senators who have a little independence of thought when we agree that if any nation in Europe or any other continent goes to war with another nation contrary to the command of the league, thereupon all intercourse with that nation shall be immediately stopped, all commerce shall be seized, its ports blockaded, and that ipso facto we are in the war; how can we under any reservation save ourselves from the fate?

We may say we will not levy armies until Congress acts, but when we go into this league we agree that other nations may seize our commerce; we agree that we will be guilty of an act which is almost equivalent to war by refusing any intercourse with the nation that has gone to war, not with us but with another nation; and we agree that all the other nations on earth shall destroy or seize all the commerce going to the ports of that nation.

I ask Senators to tell me what reservation there is that relieves us from that situation which is created ipso facto by the refusal of a nation to obey the mandate of the league, and not created by an act of Congress? Point me to the reservation that saves us from that. I challenge any man to do it. There is no such reservation, and there can not be such a reservation, because if you get rid of that condition you have got to do something more than reserve or interpret. You have got to strike out of the league the article which gives to the other nations the right to destroy commerce. You have got to strike out of the league the obligation upon us to be at war the moment another nation shall begin war without the consent of the league or contrary to its mandates.

Mr. President, right here is where we are going to get into these wars whether we want to or not. Regardless of any act of Congress, we are going to get into them. Let us apply this. I will go back again to the last war. I am going to assume that the league met, and that it actually got a unanimous vote—a thing that would have been impossible, as I have shown—but assume that it did; and I take the facts of that case, because they are quite familiar.

Germany proceeds to the attack. What happens? Immediately, ipso facto, we are at war with her. Ipso facto, without any action on our part, our commerce can not be sent to the ports of Germany, and every other nation in the world is authorized to seize our commerce if it is aimed at Germany. Ipso facto, we have joined all the other nations of the world in starving Germany, or else we are suffering our commerce to be destroyed without protest; but ipso facto another thing happens—that the obligation is imposed upon us to be a party to this, to forbid our nationals to have any business with Germany, to become parties to the proposal of starving her into submission. In a word, as was said by Lloyd-George, if the league had been in existence America would have been in the war with Germany the first day of that war, instead of two years later.

What reservation is there that removes this difficulty? And yet it is the very difficulty that is certain to drag us into every war.

Russia engages in a conflict with Poland. We are likely to have it. The League of Nations meets and forbids Russia to make that attack. Russia proceeds to make the attack. Ipso facto we are at war with Russia. We have agreed not to have anything more to do with Russia, and ipso facto all our commerce with Russia is destroyed by the other governments of the world, and we consent in advance that they shall seize it and destroy it. Where is the Lodge reservation that saves us from such a case? And yet, if such a case were to arise, we would be in that war in dead earnest, in all probability, and very quickly. Why? Because if we had not agreed by act of Congress to this, and the league was proceeding to seize our commerce, it is very likely that there would be a vigorous protest, that our people would not stand it, and so we would become embroiled in a controversy with all the nations that had united in that struggle.

Bear in mind the war goes on whether we are a party or not, whether Congress has said our Army shall move or not. We agree now that ipso facto a state of war exists between the United States and Russia if Russia does not obey the mandate of the league, and we have agreed—and I am repeating because the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has come in—that all the commerce of Russia shall be seized and destroyed, and that every ship going to her ports shall be seized. That cuts off our commerce. Moreover, we have agreed to do things that are the equivalent to acts of war when we agree that we will have no more business with her, and that we will ostracize her nationals, and that we will join in an attempt to starve her to death, for that is what "economic pressure" means. You could not have a condition of that kind for 24 hours without being on the verge of war. You could not have it for 48 hours without war actually existing not on paper but in fact. Where is the reservation that takes us out of that?

Suppose we apply the doctrine that has been so well presented by the Senator from Utah—and I am speaking to him because I believe that in his mind he thinks of this league just as I do. Of course, I can not read the hearts of men, but I can read their brains sometimes, and I know the Senator has a head full of them.

Suppose the Senator's plan were adopted, and that Congress were hereafter to say: "Our representative shall not have any authority to bind the United States." But, my dear sir, we have set up an institution that functions, and we have said that that institution can decide the case, and we have said that if the decision is not obeyed, ipso facto the war is here. Ipso facto the war is upon us. Ipso facto we proceed to the delectable business of starving a nation to death. To say that that is not war which is declared to be war by the instrument itself, and that that is not war which under all the rules that have governed the world since Adam was a boy has constituted war, is to say the absurd; and to say that any action of Congress can protect us against that except an action of Congress that keeps us out of it is to argue the impossible.

But let us see. We take another obligation under article 16. The nations agree to support one another in financial and economic measures, and we reserve that—let us say we do it—and they agree to support one another in any special measures aimed at one of their members. To put it in plain language, they agree that if this state of war ipso facto arises, not by the act of the Congress of the United States but by the action of a nation 3,000 miles away, if a member of the league marches its armies down here against that nation undertaking special measures, we will support that nation.

How are you going to reserve against that? If you reserve against that you destroy the whole force of the obligation itself and you say to the world, "Although we set you and the various nations to the task, although we have signed a covenant that agrees that you shall do the very thing you are doing, although we cast the necessary vote to impose upon you the obligation to do that thing, still we will stand aside and accept none of the responsibilities." Now, regardless of all technicalities and treating this as a practical question, I ask what Senator there is, under those circumstances, who would dare rise in his place and say that the United States was not in duty and honor bound to do her share? And no reservation can ever undertake this sort of thing without accepting the responsibility.

Article 16 further provides that we will afford passage through our territory for the armies of any of our associates, members of the league, moving to attack this offending nation with which we are ipso facto at war, not by the act of Congress but by the act of a foreign government; not by the action of the league even but by the single act of that government.

In our isolated position that might and that might not amount to a great deal. Let us assume, however, that the great British Empire shall be the nation first to defy this league; and she is most likely to be that nation, because she is the most powerful nation in the world save the United States, and therefore has the greater ability to defy the league.

Let Germany, then, propose, as a member of the league, that she wants to land in New York a million German soldiers and move them across this country to attack Great Britain in Canada. We have agreed to give them free passage across our country. The league has rendered a decision in a controversy between Great Britain and some European country. Germany revivified and once more strong, under the command of another war lord, her heart beating with the same invincible courage that has characterized the Germans in every age of history, proposes to send over here an army to crush Canada, and we are to open our ports and give them free passage that they may proceed to Canada and devastate her cities and kill that people which, nearer than any other people in the world, are bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh.

Where is the reservation on that? What reservation saves us from that horrible obligation?

How do you know that an army of that kind might not seize our Capital, our coast cities, and overwhelm us? It has happened in all history. Every page of the annals of man shows that it has occurred time and time again.

Before I would ever vote to open the ports of this country to a foreign army, sent here for the purpose of destroying Canada, I would die in my seat. There is no reservation on this, and you can not point it out. I am talking to a few Senators who sit here, who represent as fine a quality of brains as there is in the Senate or elsewhere, and I ask one of them to rise and show me the reservation that saves us from that obligation.

Again, somebody says that is fanciful, that it will never occur. If it will never occur, why is the provision written here? Why provide for a thing that will never occur? Why do we not add another reservation and say that the United States will never permit the foot of a foreign soldier to touch this soil, and that if he comes, to borrow the phrase of another, "we will welcome him with bloody hands to a hospitable grave"?

Possibly I got a bad illustration when I suggested Germany crossing this country to conquer Canada. Perhaps it is the Mikado, with an army of a million or a million and a half Japs, who are now pouring through the ports of New York and Boston and the ports of the South. Here they come, in long trains that seem to never end, pouring over the border of Canada to slit the throats of our Canadian neighbors, and we open our hospitable ports and welcome them in their quest of slaughter.

Where is your reservation that frees us from that? It is not fanciful, sir. Danger lurks here as much as in any other part of the treaty.

I would not attack Great Britain. I only speak of Great Britain because of her position in the world. There she is, her dominions spread all over the earth. Her flag is planted amidst the snows of the Arctics and the ice of the Antarctics. Her gallant soldiers are quartered in the towns and cities of one-fourth of the habitable world. She holds beneath her subjection men of every color, of every race, of every religion. Her borders touch almost every nation in the whole world, or if her borders do not actually touch, her islands guard their ports and hold mastery over their waters.

Such a nation is inevitably bound to have controversies. I think I am safe in saying that there have not been 10 years of British history when the British battle flags have not at some time been unfurled and British soldiers have not rallied beneath them on the fields of war. She is engaged in a race to-day in the Orient for the complete domination of all oriental countries, and the race happens to be between her and Japan. To-day they are partners; to-morrow they may be enemies. A nation so situated, powerful, puissant, proud, will not brook an interference by the League of Nations with what she regards as her manifest destiny.

So it might well be England that would disregard the mandate of the league and move to war; and if she did, where would a great enemy seek to strike her more quickly than Canada—Canada, the granary of Great Britain, the source of her supplies of meats and all kinds of foodstuffs; better than that, the source of supply of gallant soldiers? So it might easily come that the demand for free passage across America would be made. We have agreed to grant it, and we have agreed to do worse than that. If a controversy arises of the shape I have spoken of, we have agreed to help starve England into subjection. If you except that by a reservation, you have not excepted the fact that we have agreed that all the other nations of the world shall starve her, and we have agreed that our commerce shall be withheld, for we have set up the power and authority to withhold it.

The further you get into this thing the more it is like the reading of Dante's Inferno. Each page takes you into a deeper hell. Each exploration brings new horrors. Each hour of contemplation presents new dangers.

Again, it is provided that the council shall recommend the armed forces to be furnished by each member to protect the covenants of the league. What does that mean, sir? I say that it means an international army in presenti. I say that is what the President understands it to mean, that is what the War Department understands it to mean, and that is what the War Department is now preparing to carry out and what it is, in fact, carrying out.

Let me make a preliminary statement. The Secretary of War demanded a standing Army of 576,000 men, and he testified, and Gen. March, Chief of Staff, testified, that we must have that many men to redeem our obligations under the league; and they have never taken it back.

The Secretary of the Navy demanded 250,000 personnel for the Navy, ten times as many men as we had in the whole Army of the United States until a few years ago. The Secretary of War demands and the Chief of Staff demands that every boy, when he arrives at the age of 19, shall under a modified Prussian military system be compelled to leave his home and enter the camps of war or preparation for war. Altogether that means that we will have constantly under arms, counting the Regulars and the Navy and the marines, more than 1,000,000 men, and all of this to redeem our obligations under this treaty of peace, to redeem our obligations at a time when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together and there is none to make us afraid.

This will be the millennium, echoing with the clash of resounding arms, that is ushered in by the roar of cannon, that functions through mighty armament. Ah! what a contrast between that and the millennium of the Master that comes to the sound of hammers beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks, that brings us the vision of the sweetest face that ever looked upon this earth, a Christ of peace! This is the result of men undertaking to do what God alone can do. Every man who has ever undertaken it has made a botch of it.

So, Mr. President, we have made all these agreements about war, we have concentered in this body which we create these mighty powers, we have agreed that the acts of a foreign nation can ipso facto plunge us into war, we have agreed that the council shall tell us how many men we shall furnish, and we have agreed that foreign troops shall cross our foreign soil to attack a neighbor.

Now, I want to inquire how the Lodge reservation takes us out of all those obligations? The Lodge reservation as originally offered is broader than the substitute which has been offered, and therefore I am discussing the original reservation.

Let us see whether it is not limited in its operation simply to the obligations of article 10. Let us see whether the obligations of article 11, which touch every question that can possibly be considered under article 10, and the obligations of articles 13, 16, and 17, do not stand here unimpaired with the original Lodge reservation before it was diluted, emasculated, hamstrung, assassinated, murdered by its own author, murdered not with a good murderous motive, which at least might strengthen the arm of the assassin, but murdered for no purpose, because they tell us it does not change a single thing, and if, in their opinion, it does not change a single thing, why are they doing a single thing to it? I can tell you the reason. It is either because they think they have fooled somebody or else they are changing it in fact in order to get some votes, the votes of men whose consciences will not permit them to really save the rights of America. That kind of a conscience finds its mainspring in the political hustings of the States of the gentlemen who would rather hold a seat in the Senate and draw a salary than to protect their country, and who, instead of sitting here inquiring "What is my duty to my country under my God?" are, rather, asking, "How can I get back here and draw my salary?"

Let me tell the political artful dodgers that I am no prophet, but I never saw a man yet who pursued the policy of the old line—

> Writhed in and writhed out
> And left the public still in doubt
> Whether the snake that made the track
> Was going out or coming back—

I have never seen a man pursue that policy very long who has not contributed to his own political death. Sooner or later the people are going to make up their minds on this question. If the money of the New York bankers can keep up a propaganda that will befool them and befuddle them, it may be they will decide in favor of surrendering American sovereignty temporarily; but I know the American people well enough to know that there will be no grave so deep that it will protect the dead body of the man who votes away the liberties of this Nation from the indignation of the people when they once learn of his perfidy.

The people of this country have the right to be represented here by men who are not looking after their political fortunes, but looking after the people's interests. They have the right to expect from us the truth as we see it. They have the right to expect a leadership, if you please, not in the sense of anyone here undertaking to command the will of the people, but in the sense that we will bravely analyze each question, tell the people what we believe it involves, and having stated the question to them in that way, let them ultimately decide.

And yet here we are trying to get three or four votes by a change in phraseology which they tell us does not change the meaning. To what end, pray? That a little more dust may be thrown in the air? That an already obscure question may be made more difficult to understand? Thus we shall coin new phrases that we ourselves can not interpret and lead the people into new mazes; but I say that when we get through the people will take a big, broad view of this question, and they are not going to pay any attention to the dotters of "i's" or the strokers of "t's and the makers of phrases and the verbal hairsplitters. They are going to decide that they want the sovereignty of this Nation preserved as the fathers gave it to us, or else they will decide that they are willing to try the experiment of internationalism and the surrender of the American flag into the hands of foreign diplomats sitting around a council table, with doors locked, and dealing with the fate of the world.

I think I know what the people will ultimately say. They are beginning to find out. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] told us that all the newspapers had moved up to reservations who were denouncing everybody a little while ago for proposing to lay a single unholy finger upon this divinely inspired instrument, and that the drift was away, and that you had to get this now and nail it down quick or the people would take it away from you altogether; and so the Senator from Georgia called for a hammer and the tacks at once and the warm friends of the treaty to get what they could—if they could not get the whole carcass, at least save the hide and tallow. Well, he is not the originator of that service.

The great syndicated patriot of America, Brother Taft, told us first that we must take this without a change; that everybody was narrow-headed who wanted a change; but long ago he said, "You had better take what you can get." I do not like to employ slang on the floor of the Senate, but what he meant was to "take what you can get while the getting is good." Mr. Bryan, who I think originally said that the document was full of errors, nevertheless said, "Take it with reservations; do not get it into the political campaign; it is not a thing for the people to decide at all." When did the great Commoner lose faith in the decision of the people? Ever since I first knew him as a handsome and splendid young man, a wonderful orator, with curly black hair and flashing eyes and the "front of Jove." I recall that he could not make a speech without crying in that clarion voice—that now is a little frayed at the edges, but then sounded like the music of the spheres—"Vox populi, vox Dei." Now he says, "Do not get this into the campaign."

Why? He said it might obscure other issues and that this issue might be obscured by other issues. I will tell you the reason. They fear the heartbeat of America. They know that no matter how we may differ on politics, on prohibition, on woman suffrage, and on all the other questions, if you scratch the white skin of an American man or an American woman the same red blood of patriotism answers to the touch. They know that the American people will never haul down the American flag; they know that the American people will never surrender the sovereignty which Washington won with his sword; they know that the American people will insist upon controlling their own destiny; they know that the eyes of America turn in love to the star of our national destiny, and that they will follow no vanishing will-o'-the-wisp into the mirage of international socialism nor into the grave of national death. So they say, "Let us do it now, before the American people have a chance." The President, however, does not say that. The President said, "Let it go to the people." I want to read his words after a while.

Now, let us see what there is in the Lodge reservation that saves all of the obligations of article 16, article 15, article 13, and article 17, which I have taken so much time of the Senate to portray. The Lodge reservation is limited to article 10 and does not touch a single one of the other obligations. Let me read it:

> 2. The United States assumes no obligation to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country or to interfere in controversies between nations—whether members of the league or not—

If we had stopped there it might be claimed that we were relieved from the other obligations, but what is the concluding phrase?—

> under the provisions of article 10.

It is exactly as I said in the beginning of my remarks; it is exactly as though the article read, "The United States assumes no obligation under article 10 to preserve the territorial integrity or political independence of any other country; the United States assumes no obligation under article 10 to interfere in controversies between nations." The words "under the provisions of article 10" qualify all that precede, so that the only thing we escape under this reservation to article 10, of all the obligations that we have assumed under all of these separate articles, is the obligation of article 10 itself; but we do not escape all of them, because we do still accept the obligation to respect the territorial integrity of other countries.

When we come to the second part of the reservation we deal with another question. We say we will not employ our military or naval forces under any article of the treaty for any purpose unless Congress shall so authorize, but we assume every obligation of all of the other articles; it becomes a binding thing upon us. We have simply said to the world, "Under the Constitution of the United States we can not make war except by act of Congress, and therefore, while we accept the obligation, we must always notify you that we must go to Congress for the power to enforce the obligation." You may quibble about those words from now until the sun sinks behind the hills of time forever, but that is the true construction of those words; that is all you can make out of them. We assume all the obligations of article 13, all the obligations of article 16, all the obligations of article 15. We agree that the council of the league shall decide cases; we agree that its decision shall be binding and shall be backed by armed forces; we agree that if a nation violates its mandate, the violation shall constitute an act of war against us; we agree that our commerce shall be cut off; we agree ipso facto that we are at war with it; we agree when we sit on the council and vote for these things that war is necessary, and that the other nations shall bring forward their armies in accordance with a certain program; we agree to the act of our own member that the United States shall furnish a certain part; and then we say, "But Congress must first act." Are we not bound? There can not be imagined a concrete case where we would not stand before the world dishonered, disgraced, and damned if the Congress failed to respond under those circumstances. Honorable nations do not construe such contracts like a crooked lawyer hunting for a crooked path through which he can get his client a means of escape; they do not split hairs if they are honorable, but live up to the spirit of the instrument. What is the spirit of this instrument? We say that we shall help set up this tribunal; we shall give it this jurisdiction; we shall join with it in deciding cases; we shall help write the decrees; we shall then join in the decision that the decree shall be enforced by arms; we shall then join in the demand that all other nations shall furnish certain troops and that we shall furnish certain troops; and then, after we have done all that, tell me that this country can escape by refusing to furnish its part and yet maintain its honor! I say the President is right in his position that we should take this thing as a whole or not take it at all.

Now, Mr. President, just a word in illustration of what I have said, and in illustration of the fact that honorable nations can not take these positions and do not take them unless they mean to fulfill them. Always there is a reservation of the fact that a nation does not move its armies until some other body acts. The diplomat who signs this instrument for Great Britain has not the power to command Great Britain to send her armed forces; there must be action upon the part of some of the departments of the British Government; there must, in fact, be action by Parliament, for without the money which the House of Commons appropriates England, of course, can not make a war. So there is written in fact into this instrument, back of the obligation that Great Britain has assumed, the circumstance that in carrying it out she must get the authority of the House of Commons. It is there, although it is not written there. So, likewise, when the prime minister or other representative of France signs this instrument and agrees that France shall go to war, he understands, we understand, everybody but a fool knows, that before the French armies can be moved the parliamentary bodies, the governing powers of France, must direct the move. Therefore, when we provide that Congress must first act we have only provided a thing that is true of every nation before it actually proceeds to war.

Now, in illustration of what I have just said, and in illustration of the fact that honorable nations are bound not by the technical wording of documents but are bound by the common understanding of a case, I read a statement here by Mr. Asquith recently made:

As has been repeatedly stated, this country is not under any obligation not public and known to Parliament which compels it to take part in any war. In other words, if war arises between European powers there are no unpublished agreements which will restrict or hamper the freedom of the Government or of Parliament to decide whether or not Great Britain should participate in a war. The use that would be made of the naval or military forces if the Government and Parliament decided to take part in a war is, for obvious reasons, not a matter about which public statements can be made beforehand.

In other words, they have not in any of these treaties obligated themselves expressly to go to war, but they have made the treaty, and if, as a result of those treaties and in carrying them out, war becomes necessary then the Parliament of Great Britain is expected to respond with the men and the guns, and does so not because she wrote into the covenant, "We will go to war," but because she entered into an engagement with another nation to do a certain thing; and, war becoming necessary in order to do it, the English conscience and the English honor respond through the regular parliamentary body.

So it is here. When we accept the obligations of this league, when we agree to the provisions of articles 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17, when we set up these bodies, when we give them the power and jurisdiction to determine questions, when we provide that a failure to abide by their decisions shall result in war, when we provide that the council shall recommend the size of the Army, when our representative sits there and takes part in all of those proceedings and gives his vote for them—because without them there is no unanimous decision and the council can not function—when we have done all that, we have no option except to make good. Any array of words that may be presented is as a sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal, for the Nation's honor is involved, and the Nation must respond to the call of honor.

Oh, you can spin your cobweb theories of how, by these words, we have let ourselves out. You might as well talk about marrying a woman and assuming the duties of a husband and a father, and then claim that some antenuptial settlement had relieved you, as a man of honor, from the duty of taking care of that woman and the children she bears to you.

Mr. President, I have one theme which I want just for a minute to develop.

I have stated that this Government was now enlisting troops for service abroad under the League of Nations. I am sorry that I have not been able to get from the War Department its literature; but recently I was in a central western State and had occasion to change trains at two or three small stations where they had out recruiting officers. The inside of those stations was literally plastered, literally papered with bills advertising the presence of the recruiting officers. The literature was of an expensive character. They had pictures of American soldiers standing within the shadows of the great castles of Europe, gazing in mixed awe and wonderment at those majestic monuments of the past. There were pictures of soldiers within the shadows of the Pyramids. Again, they were represented engaged in the pastime of shooting crocodiles in the Tropics. Perhaps the most enticing to the young chap was a picture of a couple of Yankee soldiers walking down the streets of Paris with a half dozen French girls trying to flirt with them. This literature was of such a character that if it had been put forth with equally fraudulent purpose and false representation by a promoter of oil stocks it would have landed him in the penitentiary as soon as the Federal courts could have taken jurisdiction.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves the description of these posters I trust he will not omit that touching scene of a United States soldier in the shadow of the pyramids feeding a banana to a camel. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I overlooked the camel. They did not have him in the menagerie to which I was admitted.

We smile, but this is not a smiling matter. These placards went on to state: "Enlist and see the world at the Government's expense. Rich people spend their money to travel abroad. You can travel at the expense of the Government. Enlist! Complete your education by travel," and so on ad infinitum.

I intend to get that literature, and if I can not get it from the War Department I am going to get it out of these depots. This is the preparation we are making to redeem the obligations of the League of Nations! We already have troops abroad. Some of them are in Germany. If we accept this treaty, we probably are under a contract to keep them there for 15 years. Some of them are yet in Russia; some of them are in other places. The American people were told in great headlines in the papers that all the troops were brought back; that the last trooper had been brought back from Russia, or ordered out of Russia, and the people thought all our troops had come back; but at the same time they were enlisting troops to take their places, and sending them there without authority of law, in violation of the statutes and Constitution of this country, to make war upon a nation with which we were at profound peace, without any authority of Congress, and at the command of an international body that will constitute the League of Nations as soon as that concern is really functioning. You will have an international army, and it will be over there in Europe, and we will have our men there, if you have the League of Nations.

I put this to Senators who think they can keep us out by reservations: That international army is there. Let us assume that. It has to have a commander, and who will command? Just as in the last Great War a Frenchman commanded all the troops, so some foreigner will command these troops; just as in Russia, when our troops went there, they went in accordance with the command or agreement of the supreme council—a term that has been coined in this war—and when they got there they served under British and Japanese officers and not under their own. I know a soldier of high intelligence who was there. He told me that if at any given post there was not a British officer that outranked the American officer the next day the mail brought the British officer a promotion which gave him the command, and so it was with the Japanese troops.

Now, assume that you have a body of troops there, great or small, and assume that a disturbance arises, and that this international army is ordered into the conflict. Our boys will be spilling their blood; our flag will have been fired upon; we will be in the struggle. Then the cry will go up over this country, "Stand by the flag! Stand by your boys who have died!" And we are in, and we are in notwithstanding all the reservations that have been thought out at night, worked out by day, conned over with microscopes, and changed so that the changes do not mean anything, as the gentlemen state.

Just a little in regard to this enlisting business. You can not get a letter out of the mail nowadays, at least I do not, unless the Post Office Department has stamped on the outside of it a message to the boys of America to enlist in the Army. I do not know how many days this practice has been in vogue. The first one I saw was the other day. It was sent to me. I got one in the mail this morning. Here it is:

Learn while you earn. Join the United States Army.

This is accompanied by literature telling these boys that if they enter they can learn a trade and get paid all the time they are learning the trade, and be well fed and clothed by Uncle Sam. So they are trying to coax the boys into the Army. I offer that letter as Exhibit 1. Here is another:

Join the Navy. Train and travel.

I offer that as Exhibit 2.

Here is a beautifully illustrated and embellished work of art, gotten up by some advertising agency much in the style of the railroad circulars advertising the wonders of the Rockies, or the steamship line circulars inviting you to visit European countries and telling you their wonders. There is a foreword:

Infantry wins wars. The story of the American Infantry is closely interwoven with the history of the Army and the Nation. From the days of Bunker Hill and Yorktown to when the beaten Hun was driven from the heights of Sedan, theirs has been the glory of doing. Out in front of every advance, they have blazed the trail of civilization.

The flags they flung to the breezes still proudly float, proclaiming the majesty of law and freedom. Their deeds of valor and devotion are reverently discussed wherever brave men gather.

So page after page. I concur in that statement. I believe in brave men and brave people, and I have not any use for any nation on earth that will not fight for what it thinks is its rights. No more have I any use for a man who will not defend his home. I do not advocate war; I would like to see war minimized and mitigated. But if there is a creature on earth that I hold in profound and absolute contempt it is a pacifist.

But while we read these words of the glory of the Infantry, and while we inculcate in these boys a spirit of military valor, behold the women of America are told that their sons will never have to fight, that war is at an end, that the League of Nations is the voice of God proclaiming universal peace.

Let the fraud and chicanery cease. This has been a contemptible and fraudulent attempt to deceive the American people.

In this pamphlet there is a picture of beautiful barracks, and there stand the boys, ranged in martial array, a delight to the eye and an inspiration to the lover of manly courage. Then there are pictures of the charge through the forest, where the men, their heads bent low and guns at their sides, are rushing forward with high courage and with dauntless spirit.

Then, again, the post school is pictured, where, seated in almost palatial quarters, the young gentlemen are learning stenography and typewriting. There is the classroom, and it is about the handsomest school you ever saw.

Then, again, there is another picture of a young man talking the sign language of the flags. Then there is a field of war, where two men, solitary, except for their own company, are crossing a field, their guns in hand, charging alone the breastworks of the enemy.

So we find them, until at last we come to the bayonet drill, where the soldier in battle poise is preparing to thrust his bayonet through the quivering heart of an antagonist; and all this, that might be entirely appropriate in the habitations of Mars, but behold, it is offered now on this terrestrial sphere, just when war has come to its final end, tribulation is to be no more, disputes are to vanish, and the muffled drum will beat the funeral march of the god of battles.

Here is one of the inducements they offer:

TRAVEL.

The Infantry roll call daily circles the globe. The sun never sets on its colors. Should you desire to see America first, you will find Infantry stationed from New England to California, from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific Northwest; Hawaii, famous in song and story, extends its hospitality. The Far East—China, Siberia, and the Philippine Islands—holds several regiments. The call of the North is answered by Alaska. The tonnage of the world files before its ranks in the Canal Zone. In France and on the Rhine, it keeps the American flag flying.

The Infantry's opportunity for travel is unsurpassed. Here, again, the advantage of size is emphasized. Infantry occupies a station in considerable numbers. Your chance for obtaining a particular station increases in the Infantry.

Travel is educational. It broadens the mind, trains the powers of observation, and quickens the perception. Travel opens the road to greater opportunity. The hum of the little village is no longer the roar of the world. The veil of the unknown is brushed aside. New scenes and new experiences compel attention. In the Infantry you are a citizen of the world.

But the clock of time has rung the knell of war. The dove of peace now covers the world with its white wings. The sound of war no longer alarms the air. The League of Nations is here, and there is to be only good will.

What a nauseating thing to have these two propositions put forward at the same time! If there was a single man connected with this Government in important place who believed what you have claimed about the League of Nations, they would be disbanding their armies, they would be junking their battleships, they would be teaching the boys not to leave the village, but to stay there and cultivate the arts of peace. They would not be endeavoring to seduce them from the protection of virtuous homes and good mothers into the armed camp, beneath foreign skies. They would not be trying to withdraw from them the love of the old village, and to make them "citizens of the world," and to give them a preference for the roar of the great metropolis over the hum of the little village where they were born and reared.

I hold in my hand the Army News for January 16. It says:

Army launches recruiting plan; War Department to give school prizes; contest for Nation's students.

Advertising campaign to swell new Army's ranks.

Nine hundred newspapers, through paid columns, to carry to Nation's young men message of peace-time democratic Army.

I do not say it in criticism, because an army has to be an army, but most of the boys who served found out how democratic a thing an army is. An army is the most autocratic machine on earth; it is the most despotic machine on earth. A democratic army! I can see the privates holding a caucus every night to elect their officers and say where they will go! Of course, I do not criticize the Army for that. We can not have an army and have it democratic. An army is a fighting machine, and somebody bosses it; and he is a real boss, too—he has to be. When you are going to tell men to walk up to their death, the man who gives the order has to have some authority.

Let me read on from the display. I am reading an article by Col. J. T. Conrad, chief of the recruiting publicity, United States Army:

An intensive recruiting campaign, backed by $125,000 worth of paid-space advertising in the more than 900 newspapers in the substation cities, and engineered by the Advertising Agencies Corporation of New York, will begin during the week of January 19 and will continue for three months. It is believed that as a result of this plan many new recruits, who might not otherwise have heard of the opportunities offered by the new democratic peace-time Army will be brought into the fold.

Listen to this:

The "selling point" in this campaign is the fact that recruiters are offering something brand-new. Everyone knows something about the old army and the war army, while but few know anything about the new democratic peace-time army. That's it! The new democratic peace-time army, with its educational training schools offering the chance to the average man to better his station in life.

And so it proceeds.

Mr. President, I can not refrain at this point from putting into the RECORD the statement of one who speaks by authority and not as the scribes, the great advocate of a peace navy that is to sail the unruffled seas and not even get as much moisture as a wave on board, the gentleman who was the author of the remarkable proposition that we ought to spend $913,000,000 building ships for the United States Navy and at the same time sink $900,000,000 worth of German ships to the bottom of the ocean after the war was all over, and who recommended this, as I understand, in the interest of economy. Of course, to the plain, ordinary man whose soul has not been lifted to those sublime heights where dwells the spirit of the master of the American Navy, to just an ordinary glowworm of this earth, it might have seemed the sensible thing to do to take the German ships and add them to our Navy and save the $913,000,000. But, of course, an ordinary man is not expected to pursue the heights that are traveled by the really intellectual.

He is a great advocate of the League of Nations. He would have been just as much an advocate of a league of war outright and so-called if the President had said so. He would have been just as much an advocate of an offensive and defensive alliance between this country and Great Britain and France if the President had said so.

He would with the same alacrity and the same suavity have advocated the complete disarmament of this country and the sinking of every battleship if the President had so indicated. His mind "travels along" beautifully. He still holds his job. But, of course, he is in a little of an uncomfortable position. He advocates a big Navy because he is told to do that, and he advocates the doctrine that we are not going to have any more use for a Navy because he is told to do that. Ah, these be days when giants walk the earth!

Says the Secretary of the Navy:

No man is a stronger advocate of the league than I, but in the present perturbed condition of the world the league must have a police force on the sea, and I want the United States to have a force in that police force as large as any other nation.

What? Is it possible that when these diplomats sit down about a table beneath the magic influence of the league of peace they will still have the hearts of men and selfish instincts, sometimes controlled? Is it true, then, that men are just as they were before they sat down, that you can not change your European or Asiatic diplomat into an angel by having him sign his name to a peace document or the covenant of a league? If the world is in a perturbed condition, how long is it going to stay? Since the new millennium has come, how long will it take this millennium to get it back? You can not build a battleship and equip it in less than about five years. If the league is of any use, if it really is going to produce peace, surely it ought to do it in five years' time, and evidently we are building these vessels for some time——

Mr. GORE. For souvenirs.

Mr. REED. Yes. We are going to have a Navy as big as the biggest.

What has become of our disarmament theory? Where is the child disarmament? On whose doorstep has that waif been dropped? We are to build a Navy as big as the biggest, and what does that mean? I have not the figures with me, but I think that the British Navy is five times as great as ours to-day. Perhaps the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee can tell me, or perhaps the chairman of the Naval Committee can tell me, or perhaps that is a question which we have not thought well to look into much. But what we do know is that on the waves of the ocean England's floating fortresses are omnipotent. What we know is that, although Germany strained every effort for many years to create a great war fleet, the moment the British dreadnoughts began to nose out of the channel every German ship had to go to the cover of the guns of German fortresses or go to the bottom, and only once did they essay battle, and that was when they could make a running fight with a part of the British Navy and get away. We know, moreover, that Great Britain has asserted that she will not reduce her navy by a single vessel; that she puts her confidence to-day not in leagues of nations, not in wooden but in steel fortresses of the waves. We know that her statesmen have declared that Great Britain has the freedom of the seas and proposes to keep the freedom of the seas. We know that her admiralty have already advised that about one-half of the British ships be put out of commission, but in place of them ship for ship there is to be built a mighty dreadnought many times more powerful than its predecessor.

We know that Canada in the last 10 days has been asked by the British Government to undertake the establishment of a war fleet and to maintain it, with its base within sight of the American doors, and that Great Britain proposes to donate the cannon and the vessels for the nucleus of that fleet, and that Canada is to maintain it and man it, and that British military experts have been sent to Canada to train the Canadians for this work—all of this to carry out the gospel of peace and the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. These are the hands that open the doors to this new Arcadia where there is to be no war, but the hand is the mailed hand of military power.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand that the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, in relation to this matter has stated that it was the duty of the United States to maintain its moral and spiritual dominance of the world. Could this Army be used in that business?

Mr. REED. Ask Billy Sunday! Billy is a militant Christian. I do not know whether he would have use for one in a spiritual sense or not. However, I appreciate the irony of the Senator from Tennessee.

Now, the Secretary of the Navy proposes what? That we shall build ships until we overtake Great Britain; but we have to do something else. His proposition is that we shall build those ships, so that we will have a Navy as great as the greatest, which means that we must build a navy as great as Great Britain will hereafter possess. Everyone knows the British rule is that Great Britain will lay down the keels of two vessels where another nation lays the keel of one.

So that as I see the picture, as I behold this coming of the millennium, we are to enter its waters upon an American dreadnought followed by the mightiest fleet ever assembled beneath the canopy of the skies, every turret groaning with the weight of mighty guns, from its masthead floating the flag of the Secretary of the Navy, standing upon the prow the classic form of Josephus Daniels holding in his hands the proclamation that war is at an end, but that just the same we are going to have a Navy big enough to lick anybody else. God rules, but through the cannon of His servant, the Secretary of the Navy. The gorge rises at such a spectacle of fraud and false pretense.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me a moment for an inquiry?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Under the espionage law does the Senator from Missouri realize that there are only two places in the United States, and those are the halls of this Chamber and of the House of Representatives, where the enticing and deceitful lure set out would be permitted to be criticized, as the Senator has properly and forcefully done this afternoon? If that were done outside, in our capacity of private citizens, does the Senator realize that we would be prosecuted and sent to Fort Leavenworth?

Mr. REED. Well, possibly that is true.

Mr. SHERMAN. And does the Senator not think it is a public duty in this Chamber to give just such forceful analyses of the conditions as he is doing?

Mr. REED. Well, I think it is a public duty for somebody to do so, in the best way he can; but I am just blundering along at it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I myself think the Senator from Missouri is performing a great public duty and one which is needed.

Mr. REED. I read the following telegram from Tokyo, dated January 20:

JAPAN PREPARES FOR HUGE NAVY—AN EXTENSIVE BUILDING PROGRAM ALREADY UNDER WAY.

TOKYO, January 20.

Gigantic arrangements are being made at the naval port of Kure and adjacent territory to facilitate the manufacture of warships, seaplanes, and other weapons of naval warfare, according to a Kure dispatch received here.

Admiral Ide, director of naval affairs in the navy department, recently inspected the progress being made on the new buildings but refused to make any statement regarding the naval work. It was learned, however, that the Government has designed new works to enable the naval dock yard to turn out big warships and seaplanes in view of the lessons learned in the World War.

Docks on which the superdreadnought Nagato was built, it is said, will be extended by about 200 feet, and the construction of the Akagi, of 40,000 tons, will begin next spring.

Of course, Japan is in favor of disarmament; of course, Japan trusts the League of Nations; of course, Japan is merely building these ships for fun, for something to play with; of course, as we see them upon their docks and as we behold them sailing the waters of the ocean we know that the League of Nations is functioning.

Great Britain asks $625,000,000 for her army, and this although Great Brtiain and other countries have asked us to extend the time for the payment of the interest due us. That is all right; I am willing to extend the time for the payment of the interest; I am willing that Great Britain shall have an army; I am willing that she shall have a navy; she is going to have them anyway; but Great Britain regards the building of a navy and the maintenance of an army as so important, although the league is already in existence, that she prefers to spend her money in that way rather than pay her debts, at this time. Of course, Great Britain will pay; she always pays, and I am not criticizing this incident; I am speaking of it because it shows the British view with regard to this miserable makeshift thing that is being put off on the world and on this country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the $625,000,000 which is asked for by England for her army this year is four times greater than the amount required by England for her army in the year 1914.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; and a great British statesman said in palliation that they could not reduce these expenses at all until the League of Nations undertook the burden, in part, that Great Britain now sustains. I offer that as additional evidence of the argument I made awhile ago, that there is to be an international army.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand the Senator from Missouri to argue that on account of the construction of great navies by Great Britain and Japan there is no prospect of disarmament?

Mr. REED. It is conclusive proof that there is no prospect of disarmament.

Mr. PHELAN. The league, of course, in its covenant provides that the nations shall confer with a view ultimately of general disarmament or partial disarmament. They are not prepared as yet to confer, probably, because the United States is reluctant about going in.

Mr. REED. But they had all of these plans made and under headway when they confidently expected the United States was coming in. The plans for every dreadnought that is now being built were in existence before the Senate of the United States proved that it was yet an American body in part.

Mr. PHELAN. If the original proposal represented by article 10 of the covenant were approved unhesitatingly, of course, these great nations, with their powerful armaments, could not have made aggressive warfare against any of their neighbors.

Mr. REED. Why?

Mr. PHELAN. Because they are forbidden to do so by its terms, and the other members of the league would be under obligation to prevent aggression.

Mr. REED. In other words, if one of them did that, we would have to get into the war at once?

Mr. PHELAN. The mere fact that the others were prepared to prevent aggression would deter any prudent nation from engaging alone the others that were united and were, consequently, more powerful.

Mr. REED. It would deter any prudent nation! How does the Senator know it would? It never has done so.

Mr. PHELAN. We never before had a league.

Mr. REED. Nations are never prudent when they go into war. If Germany had been prudent she would not have started this war, and if she had any kind of prudence she would not have fired on the American flag; but nations do these things; that is the trouble. If men were prudent they would never commit crime, but they do, and it is necessary to have a constabulary. Nobody but a fool ever believed that you could make men good by dismissing the police force.

Mr. PHELAN. That is the very point—we want a police force; we have none now.

Mr. REED. Very well. Now, who is going to command it? Come, let us have an answer; I have been looking for somebody of this kind for a long time—who is going to command this police force? [Laughter.]

Mr. PHELAN. I am not in a position, of course, authoritatively to answer the Senator, but the enlightened nations of France, Italy, the United States, and Great Britain——

Mr. REED. And Japan.

Mr. PHELAN. Have assumed control of the league, and the others are largely spectators.

Mr. REED. You think Japan is a spectator, do you? Why did you not mention Japan? You did not forget Japan, Senator, did you?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator is right; I should have mentioned Japan, but I am glad that Japan is only one of the "big four." While I have already interrupted the Senator too long, I would furthermore like to state that one reason why I feel that the league is imperative is to bottle up Japan, because she is a danger, and probably her activities have led to the maintenance of greater armaments by the other nations.

Mr. REED. You want to bottle up Japan by putting her on a tribunal that will vote upon the fate of the United States? That is the way you would bottle her up? You make her a member of a tribunal that will control the remainder of the world and whose vote may be fatal to the United States. That is the California idea of bottling up Japan, is it?

Mr. PHELAN. It would be exceedingly dangerous to allow Japan and the European powers to compose the league, as they do to-day, with the United States having no representative to veto their action.

Mr. REED. I am glad the Senator has the floor, and I want him to keep it a little while, for I wish to ask him some questions. It will be dangerous to have the league formed without us in it, says the Senator. Why?

Mr. PHELAN. Because under the terms of the covenant, if we enter the league, we shall have a veto power on all the actions of the league, whereas now we have no voice at all.

Mr. REED. But in all vital questions in which we are interested we have no vote, no veto power in the league. You said it would be dangerous to have the league formed and we not be in it. Why will it be dangerous to us?

Mr. PHELAN. I have informed the Senator—because we would have no voice there, whereas, if we have a voice, under the terms of the covenant it would be an effective voice, amounting substantially to a veto.

Mr. REED. Suppose we do not have a voice and the league is organized, what is the league that is formed for peace going to do to us? Is this league that is formed for peace and for the prevention of war going to attack us? If so, it is not a league of peace; it is a league of hell.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator is asking me the question——

Mr. REED. And answering it; I want it answered right and answered quickly. [Laughter.]

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I have another version, which is that, as it stands to-day, there is a league, but it is a league of European nations and they will necessarily combine against the richest hemisphere, the Western Hemisphere, which has all the resources of raw materials and foodstuffs. That has been demonstrated very recently by the action of the economic council, on which we have no representative, which has resolved to purchase in common, and, hence prevent competitive prices for the producers of this hemisphere if trading were allowed to be done in the normal and usual way.

Mr. REED. Now, I have got you just where I want you, and I am going to insist that the Senator keep the floor, and we will have this out.

The Senator states that this league, which can only act by unanimous vote, is so constituted that its members unanimously, without provocation on our part, will look across the ocean, because we are the richest country in the world, and will come over here to prey upon us. That is what the Senator said. When he said that he said they were a body of pirates; and yet he wants the United States to enter into a copartnership with them and to agree to submit to their decision questions involving the life and death of this Republic when the United States does not sit in a case where it is involved!

He tells us that these nations with which he asks us to go into partnership would be guilty of acts of piracy and of wrong that would do discredit to the worst murderer of the ocean who ever sailed beneath the black flag of death and made his victims walk the plank into a watery grave.

These are the men, you tell us, who are to control the destinies of the league. This is the spirit that is there prevalent. Yet you say that we should enter into a compact with them and become partners with them and submit to them our destiny!

The Senator spoke of an international army. Would that international army be of any use unless it was big enough to conquer any nation that refused to obey? I am asking the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator spoke of no international army.

Mr. REED. The Senator spoke of having the league and protecting the world through an international police force, and the RECORD will show it. Now, is that police force to be strong enough to control the world and keep down war, or not?

Mr. PHELAN. The international police force is something that is not contemplated by the present organization of the league.

Mr. REED. But the Senator just spoke of it as the thing that would take the place of the armies and navies of the nations; that in place of that, in order to save that, we would have an international force, and the RECORD will show it. Now, is that force to be great enough to be potential, or does the Senator now say we are to have no international force, and that we are to go back to the question of national armaments?

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator asks the question and also answers it.

Mr. REED. I am asking it.

Mr. PHELAN. The league contemplates the enforcement of its decrees either by force, in the judgment of the members of the league, to be determined in any given case, or by the exercise of an economic boycott. I am one of those who believe that if the united nations desire to discipline a recalcitrant nation, the exercise of economic pressure will be quite sufficient, if wisely and properly directed; so I do not contemplate even the organization of a force, and certainly one is not contemplated at all, but that each nation shall be asked to do its part in a given case, and when that arises it will be time enough to decide. The Senator is assuming that the nations of Europe which existed long before ours are pirates and bandits.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. PHELAN. I would remind him that the United States is made up of the descendants of the people of these very European nations; and while it is true that they have been bent upon predatory designs for a long time, that period is now at an end. In the Napoleonic era——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator let me interrupt there? He said that period is now at an end, and yet not 10 minutes ago he said that if we did not enter the League of Nations they would come over here on marauding expeditions and take all we had.

Mr. PHELAN. We expose ourselves to the danger of an attack at any time, because I do not suppose that those nations united will submit to any aggression on the part of the United States or any step by which they will be denied the natural resources of the world, or, as in the case of the Japanese, a foothold upon the Western Continent. They may have designs of that kind, and from their point of view seek to justify them. I do not say that they will not take offense at many things that we may do; and I was very much surprised a few years ago when I went to Spain, where Americans are inhospitably received, and those good Spaniards said, "How can we possibly love the United States of America, which you consider blameless, when you have despoiled us—this ancient and historic nation, this civilizer of the world—when you, the young nation, have despoiled us of our possessions in every sea?" Hence, they regard us, although we do not regard ourselves, as a danger in the world if left alone.

I do not know that these nations are any better or worse than the human nature which is common to us all. Japan, in one of her papers, a leading militarist organ, which I read the other day, made a perfect case against America for the domestic consumption of her own people when she said:

"Beware of America! We must build up our navy, and keep our army organized and equipped, because across the water there is that Nation which has by rebellion wrested her own continent from Great Britain; which has in the Spanish-American War taken the Philippine Islands at our very door; which, against our protest, took the Hawaiian Islands and the Island of Guam, and went down into the Samoan group and took possessions there; and then went into the Caribbean and invaded Colombia, and constructed the Panama Canal, took Cuba, Porto Rico, and is now purchasing with ill-gotten wealth the islands of the sea. We, as Japanese, must arm ourselves against this predatory Nation."

Will not the Senator take the point of view of other nations in the contemplation of this question? He assumes all virtue for ourselves, and denies it to all our neighbors. He should travel abroad. He should broaden his vision. He should get out of his environment and see that we are living in a world which is getting smaller and smaller every day. Then he would be a better statesman, because he would be better able to understand American needs and international problems.

Mr. REED. Now has the Senator answered my question? The trouble is, the Senator has traveled abroad too much. [Laughter.]

The Senator can not dodge this question and envelop it in a mass of words. I did not say that these nations were pirate nations. The Senator said it. The Senator, in so many words, asserted that if we did not join the League of Nations all of these nations were likely to come here and despoil us, because we were rich; and he proceeded to try to prove that that was still their spirit by citing the economic conference over there and telling how unjust it had already been to us.

I come back to my question: Does the Senator say we are to have an international force, or not? He did say, a while ago, that we were going to, and I want to know if he recedes from it.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from California did not state that we were going to have an international force, but that these nations jointly would take up the question of treatment of any recalcitrant nation refusing to abide by its obligations under the pact, and then it will be time enough to consider how it should be disciplined, either by force or by economic pressure. Now, that does not admit of an international force. It may admit of an international understanding which will be reached at some future time to meet a certain contingency.

Mr. REED. That is a different proposition. It is not what the Senator stated. I asked him the question because I wanted to get an answer.

Mr. PHELAN. I will stand by the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I wanted to know whether this international force is to be great enough to control any nation. Then, I wanted to know who was going to command the international force that was great enough to crush the United States; but the Senator is avoiding the question by taking an entirely different ground, and so I decline to pursue it any further. We have enough, however, to show that no advocate of this league can stand on the same ground with any more stability than the proverbial hen on a hot griddle. They have to keep moving to save their lives. I am talking about these men who take the position that the millennium is here, and yet that great armaments are necessary. I am talking about them just now.

Mr. President, here is another statement. I said that I would have something to say about President Wilson's position. Gen. March came before the House Military Affairs Committee, and asserted:

> The military authorities and the War Department have favored universal military training for years, but this is the first time an administration has come forward in approval of the plan. Secretary of War Baker has indorsed it, and, because of the Secretary's position, it is a fair assumption that the President approves it, although I can not quote the President.

That is sufficient. We know the President did approve it, and does approve, or it would not be put forward by the Chief of Staff or the Secretary of War. Since that he wrote a letter to the Secretary of War expressly approving this plan, as I understand.

So you are to have a standing Army, which is asked for, as I have said, of over half a million men, and a personnel of the Navy of a quarter of a million men, and universal military training, which will keep in the camps of America from 200,000 to 250,000 young men all the time. A million men under arms, and the personnel of the Navy greater than that of Great Britain.

In addition to that, I cite the fact, and I will not stop to read it into the RECORD, that only the other day, in discussing the Fiume controversy, the President said that the old spirit of Europe was evidently rife and abroad in the land, and that they were governed by the old instincts and the old appetites. I shall put his exact words in. I am abbreviating that. He said that this spirit was so manifest that unless they yielded on Fiume we probably could not enter the league, as though yielding upon Fiume would change their spirit, as though if they were that kind of men, who believed in marauding, believed in the old spirit, that the yielding under pressure on Fiume would change their spirit and transmogrify them into angels of light and evangels of the new day.

A day or two later he certified that in France the militarists have gained the ascendancy, so that France was doubly committed to the old order. Yet these are to be the chief counselors in this league that is to usher in the new day. The President said:

> Militaristic ambitions and imperialistic policies are by no means dead even in the counsels of the nations whom we must trust and with whom we most desire to be associated in the tasks of peace.

That was in his last letter. He also said:

> Throughout the sessions of the conference in Paris it was evident that a militaristic party, under the most influential leadership, was seeking to gain ascendency in the counsels of France. They were defeated then, but are in control now.

Mr. President, before I close, in talking about the military preparations of Great Britain, I call attention to the fact that Lloyd-George on January 19 made a statement which led to the understanding in Europe, as is covered by a dispatch, that Great Britain proposed to raise an army at that time of a half million men for service outside her own borders.

When will we ever get out of this witches' cauldron? We went to Europe for a specific purpose, to punish Germany for offending against our flag and insulting us on the high seas. We did not go for any 14 points. They were dreamed of, or thought of, long afterwards. The Congress of the United States did not even declare war on Germany. It declared that Germany had made war on us, and that a state of war existed.

We did not go over there to democratize the world. No nation can democratize the world. People can only democratize themselves. We have no more right to force democracy on the world than the world has to force autocracy on us. Every nation must settle those questions for itself. It has the right to settle them. The government that suits us might not suit other countries.

I believe, if I remember rightly, that over 60 per cent, perhaps 70 per cent, of the Serbians are absolutely illiterate. Are they capable of the same kind of government we set up? In Russia there is even a worse condition. The creation of government is a matter of development, but the talk about democratizing the world was utter and sheer nonsense.

We should have fought this war, stayed by it to the end, joined in a peace which would have protected America's rights and vindicated America's honor; then we should have recalled our troops and let the nations of the Old World conduct their own affairs. Every day we stay there is a day of menace. Every hour we continue to interfere in the affairs of Europe spells trouble for the United States.

How many wars will they have? I do not know. How long will they fight? I do not know. I only know this: That human nature is the same to-day as it has always been, and I know there has not been a time in recorded history when there has not been a war every few years between some of the peoples of the world. These wars are the result of many causes, but deep down in the human heart is a sentiment that perhaps is the mainspring, after all, of war. It is the desire of an individual not only to have all that he wants, but to control others.

However that may be as to the individual, we do know that it has been the clashing of the ambitions of people. Whoever looks for the sources of this war can not find them alone in German militarism. Back of that was the imperial policy of England, England's determination to control the seas.

Accordingly Germany attempted to make herself dominant upon the land. She entered upon a militaristic policy and an imperialistic policy. I do not doubt that Germany began on account of England. The two races were run side by side.

Italy desired to extend her borders, and for many years she has been fighting in not only her own wars, but the wars of other nations and taking her pay in territory.

France has sent her soldiers into northern Africa and carried on war. There German and French ambitions came in conflict, with the result that they were almost at the verge of a war some few years ago.

Japan is extending her dominions, trenchin upon the territory of her weaker neighbors.

So the race has been run. This nation wants supremacy in trade; that one wants supremacy in some other respect; and out of these ambitions of the peoples of the world grow conflicts.

But they are not our conflicts. We are not a party to them. As Washington said, Europe has a set of primary interests in which we have little, if any, concern. We should get out of those countries. We should not thrust ourselves into them or stay in them. There will be wars there, in my opinion, as long as men are men. The only thing that will change that order of affairs is that the finger of the Divine Master may be laid upon the hearts of men, melt the ice of human selfishness into the gentle dew of kindliness, and make us all friends and brothers, indeed. That is a divine work. It can not be accomplished by calling around a table a lot of men representing selfish interests, whom the President himself denounces in language so severe that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] felt obliged to mitigate it by a statement upon the floor of this body.

The evening papers carry the headlines that the monarchists are in revolt in Germany, that they are overthrowing Ebert's government in Berlin, that the troops are moving, that the Socialists have called a general strike, and that the President of Germany and his wife have quit the capital.

So those people may have their internal wars, and if they desire to fight to settle their differences it is not our business to spend our blood in their fights. We did not make the conditions in Germany. The German people made them. We have no more right to interfere in their affairs than a European nation had to interfere between the North and the South in 1860 to 1864.

Suppose some European nation had come here then, with its mighty army, and joined either one side or the other. This Nation would have emerged probably a half subject nation, and the wounds of that war and the hatreds of that war would exist for the next century of time. We settled our own difference. It was a bloody price we paid, and yet it was worth the price, for out of it in the end emerged the mightiest Nation of all time, her sons indeed brothers; the boy of the South has married the daughter of the North and the son of the North has united his fortunes with the families of the South, so that we have here a great homogeneous people. But we worked out our own salvation. We are pursuing the high path of the most magnificent destiny a nation has ever followed. The star of our empire shines brightly on the horizon. It is a national star—represents the national soul and the national conscience and the national spirit which we call the American spirit.

I say to you, sirs, there is but one cloud which obscures the future, and that is the proposition to surrender the nationality of America, and to enter an international government which will be controlled by intrigue, by selfishness, and by the civil passions which have held this world in thrall for so many years.

Mr. President, I hope I have said my last word on this treaty in the Senate. I think that it is morally wrong. I hope that it will fail. Then the world can look across the seas and say yonder stands the Nation pursuing her own course, whose people are sovereign, whose flag represents equity and justice, a Nation that has never endeavored to place the hand of power upon the weak; a nation of people where the equality of man and the sovereignty of the citizen are the cardinal doctrines of its faith and practice.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate vote on Monday, not later than 3 o'clock, upon the pending reservation, No. 2, with all amendments that may be pending and all that may be hereafter offered. I send to the desk a draft of the proposed agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] asks unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, March 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to reported reservation No. 2, and immediately thereafter upon said reported reservation No. 2 as amended or unamended; that upon the said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the reservation as reported or upon any amendment proposed thereto.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not that require a quorum under the rule?

Mr. LODGE. No; only on an agreement upon the passage of a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule to which the Senator from North Carolina refers relates, in the opinion of the Chair, only to bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. LODGE. That is all—to their passage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if I correctly understand the intent of the unanimous-consent agreement proposed, that any Senator can speak 15 minutes upon any amendment to the proposed reservation and on the reservation itself? It does not limit a Senator to 15 minutes on all? That is what I want to have made clear.

Mr. LODGE. I think it does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought it read "or" instead of "and."

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum because some Senators are not here who ought to know about the agreement proposed.

Mr. LODGE. I talked with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] about it, and he agreed to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Nebraska has no objection to it, I withdraw my suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws his suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let the entire proposed agreement be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again state the proposed agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

That not later than 3 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Monday, March 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to reported reservation No. 2, and immediately thereafter upon the said reported reservation No. 2, as amended or unamended; that upon the said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the reservation as reported or upon any amendment proposed thereto.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That, as I understand the reading of it, would give a Senator 15 minutes upon any modification proposed thereto and 15 minutes upon the reservation itself, but he can not speak more than once; that is, if he speaks 15 minutes on a proposed amendment to the reservation and some one offers an entirely different one, then he can not say a word upon the latter amendment. I would hardly like to agree to that, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. While we are discussing the matter, in order that the Senator from Massachusetts may have it in mind, I would not like to see an agreement made which would prevent a reasonable discussion of other amendments.

Mr. LODGE. This covers only the one reservation.

Mr. REED. I thought the latter part of it, as I heard it, could be construed to cover others.

Mr. LODGE. It covers only reservation No. 2 and amendments pending thereto and other amendments that may be offered hereafter.

Mr. KING. As I understood the proposed agreement, it would include substitutes which might be offered for the reservation.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; a substitute is an amendment.

Mr. KING. So that if a half dozen or more substitutes were offered it would preclude a discussion of them; or, at any rate, all discussion would have to be comprised within the time before 3 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly, the discussion will have to take place before the final vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not want to be at all disagreeable about the matter. I know how anxious Senators are to vote on the reservation, and I am one of them. I have been put in the position here before on just such unanimous-consent agreements, where the 15 minutes allowed would be sufficient upon the pending proposition, but when that is settled and voted down some one else offers a substitute that raises an entirely different question, and then, if the Senator from Massachusetts has placed the proper construction upon the agreement, a Senator is driven to vote yea or nay without being able to explain his position upon the new proposition. I do not want to agree to that. I am perfectly willing that it should be modified.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad to modify it in any way the Senator may suggest.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If it can be modified so that no Senator shall speak more than 15 minutes upon the pending modification or more than 15 minutes upon each substitute or further amendment, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. LODGE. Then we had better make the day for the final vote, say, about Wednesday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not object to that.

Mr. LODGE. I do not like to delay a vote. There is a general desire to reach a vote as soon as possible.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not like to delay it either, but simply because I do not like to delay it I do not care to be driven into what I do not think is a proper course.

Mr. WATSON. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to suggest that he will ask unanimous consent that the final vote shall be taken on Wednesday?

Mr. LODGE. No; I said it would extend the debate very much, but I am perfectly willing to fix the agreement to suit Senators. I am asking for unanimous consent that the vote on reservation No. 2 may be taken upon Monday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am perfectly willing to make the debate for each Senator only five minutes upon each amendment or substitute thereto. I can state any points I have to make on any of the propositions in five minutes, but I do not want to have my mouth closed entirely on a new proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. LODGE. Wait a moment, Mr. President. I think we can arrange it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I suggest that the agreement be modified so as to read "not longer than 15 minutes upon the reservation as reported or more than 5 minutes upon any amendment proposed thereto."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That would suit me.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. KING. Do I understand that that would fix the time when the final vote shall be taken?

Mr. LENROOT. At 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. SWANSON. Under that provision, when 3 o'clock comes we would be compelled to take the vote?

Mr. LODGE. That is the object, to bring the Senate to a vote.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to suggest this difficulty. Promptly at 3 o'clock the Senator from Massachusetts could offer a substitute, and we would be bound to vote at 3 o'clock and there could be no discussion whatever.

Mr. LODGE. The object is to try to get an agreement to vote at some time. Of course, the Senator's objection is to any form of an agreement at any time.

Mr. SWANSON. In most agreements we have fixed a time at which substitutes or amendments could be offered, so that they could be discussed, but under this proposed agreement the Senator could offer promptly at 3 o'clock a substitute to his present reservation and there could be no discussion of it, because the vote would have to be taken at 3 o'clock and that would preclude any discussion. In such agreements we have generally provided that amendments must be filed before a certain time.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I make this suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts? The Senator from Virginia has stated an objection. Would it not accomplish the purpose if we limit Senators to five minutes apiece without fixing a definite time to vote on that calendar day? If every one of the 95 Senators took his five minutes it would only mean a session of seven or eight hours, but I do not suppose all Senators will want to talk.

Mr. OWEN. Why not?

Mr. LODGE. That is a hasty assumption.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be unwarranted.

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to make the agreement read that we shall vote before the end of the calendar day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is perfectly satisfactory. We can sit until midnight if we desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair inquires again if there is objection to the proposed unanimous consent agreement?

Mr. LODGE. We are trying to modify it, Mr. President, and get some agreement if we can.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Massachusetts offered this unanimous-consent agreement. I should like to inquire of him whether there is anything in it that would limit the time in which amendments may be offered in the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. No; not now. As it stands, under the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], there is no limit on the time in which to offer amendments.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Massachusetts accept this modification, that all amendments or substitutes shall be offered on or before 2 o'clock, and that——

Mr. LODGE. That only makes it worse. The object, as I understand it, of the Senator from Virginia is to leave it free and open to offer amendments at any time.

Mr. SIMMONS. At the last minute?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; to offer amendments at any time and vote on that calendar day. If the Senator expects the session to go beyond midnight, of course we shall have to put it over until Tuesday.

Mr. KING. I will offer the suggestion that we modify the proposed agreement so that we may vote during the calendar day, but not fix an hour at which the voting shall take place.

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely what it now is, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary read the proposed agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed agreement as modified.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As now modified, the Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Monday, March 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote without further debate upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to the reported reservation No. 2, and immediately thereafter upon the said reported reservation No. 2, as amended or unamended; that upon the said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the reservation as reported or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment proposed thereto.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask the Senator what his intention is as to the time of meeting on Monday?

Mr. LODGE. I will agree to meet at any time the Senator suggests. We have a meeting of the Committee on Foreign Relations Monday morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I do not want to assume that responsibility.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposed agreement as modified? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

The unanimous-consent agreement is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on the calendar day of Monday, March 15, 1920, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered to reported reservation No. 2, and immediately thereafter upon the said reported reservation No. 2, as amended or unamended; that upon the said calendar day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the reservation as reported, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment proposed thereto.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business with closed doors.

The motion was agreed to, and the doors were closed. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate take a recess, as in open executive session, until Monday at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in open executive session, took a recess until Monday, March 15, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 13, 1920.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of us all, upon whom we are dependent for life, health, and strength, impart unto us wisdom, strength, and courage to meet the obligations of another day, that our acts may be well pleasing in Thy sight and promote the good of mankind. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROTECTION OF TRADE-MARKS, ETC.—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NOLAN. To call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 9023 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California calls up the conference report on the bill which the Clerk will report by title.

Mr. GARD. What is the report?

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a very inadequate number of Members present, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 281 Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors, and the gentleman from California calls up the conference report, which the Clerk will again report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9023) to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendent as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "(b) All other marks not registerable under the act of February 20, 1905, as amended, except those specified in paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 5 of that act, but which have been in bona fide use for not less than one year in interstate or foreign commerce, or commerce with the Indian tribes by the proprietor thereof, upon or in connection with any goods of such proprietor upon which a fee of $10 has been paid to the Commissioner of Patents and such formalities as required by the said commissioner have been complied with: Provided, That trade-marks which are identical with a known trade-mark owned and used in interstate and foreign commerce, or commerce with the Indian tribes by another and appropriated to merchandise of the same descriptive properties as to be likely to cause confusion or mistake in the mind of the public or to deceive purchasers, shall not be placed on this register"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following: "28 (as to class (b) marks only)"; and on page 4, line 6 of the engrossed bill, after "act," insert "of a mark falling within class (a) of section 1"; also, on page 4, line 19, of the engrossed bill, after "date," insert "and the provisions of section 2 of the act entitled 'An act to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks,' approved May 4, 1906"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 9. That section 5 of the trade-mark act of February 20, 1905, being Thirty-third Statutes at Large, page 725, as amended by Thirty-fourth Statutes at Large, page 1251, Thirty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 918, Thirty-seventh Statutes at Large, page 649, is hereby amended by adding the following words thereto: 'And if any person or corporation shall have so registered a mark upon the ground of said use for 10 years preceding February 20, 1905, as to certain articles or classes of articles to which said mark shall have been applied for said period, and shall have thereafter and subsequently extended his business so as to include other articles not manufactured by said applicant for 10 years next preceding February 20, 1905, nothing herein shall prevent the registration of said trade-mark in the additional classes to which said new additional articles manufactured by said person or corporation shall apply, after said trade-mark has been used on said article in interstate or foreign commerce or with the Indian tribes for at least one year, provided another person or corporation has not adopted and used previously to its adoption and use by the proposed registrant, and for more than one year such trade-mark or one so similar as to be likely to deceive in such additional class or classes.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on H. R. 9023, a bill to give effect to certain provisions of the convention for the protection of trade-marks and commercial names, made and signed in the city of Buenos Aires, in the Argentine Republic, August 20, 1910, and for other purposes, having met, submit herewith a statement of the action of your conferees:

On amendments Nos. 1 and 3 are clerical changes which subdivide into paragraphs section 1 of this bill, and the House recedes.

On amendment No. 2 the House recedes from its disagreement to same and agrees to same with an amendment which provides that the $10 fee shall be paid to the Commissioner of Patents, and adds a proviso to this section to protect trade-marks that have already been in use and not entitled to registration.

The House conferees recede from their disagreement to amendment 4 and agree to same, with the proviso to protect trade-marks already in use and not subject to registration under the old law.

JOHN I. NOLAN,
FLORIAN LAMPERT,
GUY E. CAMPBELL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 9023 is the trade-mark bill passed a short time ago to give effect to the International Trade-Mark Convention treaty. The Senate put an amendment onto section 1 of that act, subdividing section 1, so as to provide for section (a) and section (b), and provided for a second list of nonregistrable trade-marks to be kept in the Patent Office, and providing a $10 fee to be paid to the Commissioner of Patents for that purpose. The House conferees, at the suggestion of the Commissioner of Patents, added a proviso at the end of section 1, to protect existing trade-marks both at home and abroad. The other important amendment, and the only material amendment, is section 9, which puts on this bill the bill H. R. 7157, which was reported unanimously by the Committee on Patents, and is now pending on the calendar. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT] is the author of that bill and will explain the matter, and I yield to him such time as he desires.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, I will remind the House that this legislation is simply intended to protect the rights of American trade in foreign countries, in those countries especially that permit the registration of any trade-mark, irrespective of whether the man who registers it has any right, according to our ideas, in the trade-mark or not. This bill was recommended unanimously by the Committee on Patents, both of the House and of the Senate. It has been approved by the Commissioner of Patents, and all these amendments have been gone over carefully by the Commissioner of Patents, and the amendment of which the chairman speaks, which adds a bill now before the House, simply extends the right of registration, so that American trade abroad may be protected in other countries as well as in South America. It does not affect anybody's domestic rights at all, and has to do simply with the protection of American merchants in foreign trade. I think there is no opposition to it from any source whatever, and I hope that the report will be accepted.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, if there is no further explanation necessary, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army reorganization bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] had moved a pro forma amendment, to strike out the last word of section 20. I rise in opposition to that amendment and desire to have read to the committee a letter which I received from the Secretary of War very late yesterday afternoon, just before we adjourned, in which the Secretary of War informs me that he inadvertently sent to me the letter of March 5 recommending a separate construction corps and that now he wants to be understood as favoring the transfer of the construction corps from the Quartermaster Corps to the Corps of Engineers. [Applause.]

I ask that the letter be read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California makes the pro forma amendment and asks that the letter referred to be read. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 12, 1920.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: I desire to call attention to my communication addressed to you on March 5, 1920, referring to H. R. 12775, in which appears the following paragraph:

"It is therefore my respectful recommendation that in due consideration of this subject provision be made for a separate transportation service and a separate construction service in the proposed bill."

Through inadvertence the full purport of the paragraph above quoted escaped my notice, and I desire to at once correct any erroneous impression it may have conveyed as to my attitude on these two important subjects.

It is now, and has been, my recommendation that the Transportation Service should be separated from the Quartermaster Corps and should constitute a separate and distinct service, independent of said corps, and be known as the Transportation Service; and it is now, and has been, my recommendation that the construction service should be separated from the Quartermaster Corps, be assigned to the Corps of Engineers, and be known as the construction service of the Corps of Engineers.

It is hoped that the above corrections will receive careful consideration in the bill now before the House.

Respectfully, yours,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Alabama desire to be heard on his motion to strike out the last word?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes. I did not make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. DENT. I did not make a motion yesterday to strike out the section providing for the Porto Rican regiment. I simply called attention to that section and made the statement that I was disposed to oppose it. I will not make the motion.

Mr. KAHN. As I understood the gentleman, he simply moved to strike out the last word, not the section, in order to call attention to the provisions of the section.

Mr. DENT. But I did not move to strike out the section.

Mr. KAHN. I understood the gentleman to move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I called attention to this section of the bill, because it does make a change, according to my understanding, in the present law, but I will not make a motion to strike the section out. My idea in calling attention to the change in the law was to submit to the House the proposition that the Porto Rican regiment, as originally organized, was organized exclusively for service in Porto Rico. By subsequent legislation the War Department was authorized to send the Porto Rican regiment to service outside of Porto Rico, and during the late war, my understand is, the War Department sent this regiment down to Panama. I call attention to the change of the law, because of the fact that when you get to the section providing for the promotion list, what is known as the single list, if you leave this section in the bill as it is, and then adopt the single list as provided for in the bill, the native officers who were appointed, as I recall it, for a period of four years, will become permanent members of this single list and will go on it just like every other officer of the Army.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. I want to call to the attention of my colleague that when this regiment was first organized it was known as the Provisional Regiment of Infantry of Porto Rico, and, I may say, the officers, or some of them, at least, at that time were provisional officers. But later on, under the national defense act, we made this regiment a part of the Regular Army, and the officers were commissioned for service with the Porto Rican regiment, but they were a part of the Regular Army.

Mr. DENT. And were entitled to promotion only within that regiment and not within the Army?

Mr. KAHN. That is my understanding.

Mr. DENT. This changes it so that they have promotion in the Army just like every other officer?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after section 22 a new section, to be numbered 22a, and to read as follows:

"SEC. 22a. Philippine Scouts: The President is authorized to form the Philippine Scouts into such branches and tactical units as he may deem expedient, within the limit of strength prescribed in section 1, hereof, organized similarly to those of the Regular Army, the officers to be detailed from those authorized in section 3 hereof. On July 1, 1920, all officers of the Philippine Scouts on the active list who are citizens of the United States and are found qualified under such regulations as the President may prescribe shall be recommissioned in some one of the branches provided for by this act, and those not so recommissioned shall continue to serve under their commissions as officers of the Philippine Scouts. No further appointments shall be made as officers of Philippine Scouts except of citizens of the Philippine Islands, who may be appointed in the grade of second lieutenant, under such regulations as the President may prescribe. Officers commissioned in the Philippine Scouts shall be subject to promotion, classification, and elimination, as hereinafter prescribed for officers of the Regular Army, but shall be entitled to only such privileges of retirement and retired pay as may be expressly granted to them by law. Nothing in this act shall be construed to alter in any respect the present status of enlisted men of the Philippine Scouts."

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This particular section of the bill is one that caused considerable discussion in the committee. For one, I think the legislation making the Philippine Scouts a part of the Military Establishment of the United States was a mistake, and I hope that at some future day we will take this matter up and do away with this provision. It involves so many questions that I felt that it was not best to undertake to discuss it at this time, while considering this general reorganization bill. But for one, Mr. Chairman, I do feel that it is an anomalous situation to take the natives of a subject territory and create them into military units under our officers; then if we get into war we can not use them, we can not call them into the service, and we ought not to call them into the service. They are not citizens of our country; they are not entitled to citizenship, and I hope that they never will be entitled to citizenship, because I believe the day will come when they will be entitled to have their independence, and when we will be justified in granting it to them. But as I said, Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to call attention to this provision in order that the membership of the House may have it in mind and think it over, and at some future time we can take this subject up and legislate on it in a proper way.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. BLANTON and Mr. SANFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], a member of the committee, is recognized.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to call the attention of the committee to the letter of the distinguished Secretary of War, and for fear that the committee might feel itself compelled to a conclusion by the opinion expressed in the letter, I want to remind the committee that it is only the third position that the Secretary has taken, and it may be possible that he will approach the subject again. I am referring to his letter on the construction corps, read a moment ago. I think perhaps no action is necessary on the letter. Perhaps at the proper time I should like to move to have it referred to the committee on useless documents. [Laughter.]

The mind of the Secretary of War is a marvelous mind. It is a versatile mind. It turns gracefully from one side of a subject to the other, and then back again, always equally unembarrassed. It is, moreover, a perfectly free mind, unrestrained by its own decisions, unrestrained by logic, by reason, or events. It is as free and versatile when it votes "aye" as when it votes "no," and the comforting assurance that is left with the committee after the perusal of the three letters is that at least 50 per cent of the time the Secretary of War is absolutely correct. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, "A wise man changes his mind, but a fool never." The document coming from the Secretary of War which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] has designated remarkable merely illustrates the fact that when one of his departments attempts to put something over the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War finds it out, he does not permit it. He stops it, and he brings it to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs. The Secretary of War has sent us a wise suggestion, and I take it that so far as the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is concerned we are going to pass it by idly without action. As soon as the letter was read, I expected the distinguished chairman of this committee to ask unanimous consent to return to the section which has been passed embodying this matter and carry out the wise suggestion of the Secretary of War.

The Secretary clearly shows that it was a matter prepared by one of his departments and that in the transaction of the numerous affairs which come through his hands it temporarily escaped his notice. What are we going to do about it? Are we going to carry out the suggestion of the Secretary of War on this important matter?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Which one?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois knows which one. It is the one which comes as the mature judgment of the Secretary of War and not as the hasty judgment of some of these heads of departments whose pets now sit up in the gallery and want special positions made for them, and whose wishes have been carried out by the committee through the vote yesterday of 133 to 74.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood the gentleman to state that one of these letters, maybe more, was signed by the Secretary of War because it was presented to him by one of the divisions of the Army without his knowledge of what it contained. What I wanted to know was which one of these letters represented his mature judgment?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there is not a single Member on this floor who has not at some time had his name signed to documents the contents of which he may have been forced to peruse hastily. On frequent occasions the Secretary of War's name is signed to numerous documents the contents of which sometimes escape his personal attention.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will as soon as I have answered the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. The Secretary of War shows that now this particular matter has been brought to his personal attention, that he recommends a rescission of yesterday's action when the committee was carried away by this proposition of creating this separate corps to make a lot of extra positions. The Secretary of War says he does not agree with the action taken, and he sends us notice in time so that the error may be corrected.

Mr. KEARNS. That is the third time that the Secretary of War has advised this House to pass favorably that amendment to this bill creating a separate transportation corps, and the gentleman from Texas opposed it yesterday. Now that he has come out the third time, is the gentleman willing to accept his matured judgment?

Mr. BLANTON. Not on that particular item, because on that particular item I think his matured judgment is wrong. [Laughter.] I am with the Secretary of War when he is right, and I am against him when he is wrong. But the question is, Are you going to act on his suggestion and rescind yesterday's action?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. That section 24 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the same and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 24. Filling of vacancies: Not less than one-half of the total number of vacancies caused by this act shall be filled by the appointment, to date from July 1, 1920, and subject to such examination as the President may prescribe, of persons other than officers of the Regular Army below the age of 54 years who served as officers of the United States Army at any time between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. A suitable number of such officers who served between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, shall be appointed in each of the grades below that of brigadier general, according to their qualifications for such grade as may be determined by the board of general officers provided for in this section. No such person below the age of 48 years shall be appointed in the grade of colonel, or below the age of 45 years in the grade of lieutenant colonel, or below the age of 36 years in the grade of major; no such person shall be appointed to a grade higher than that held by him on November 11, 1918, nor to a grade above that of captain unless he is specifically recommended for such grade by the majority report of the board of general officers provided for in this section. Any person over the age of 45 years appointed under the provisions of this section shall, when retired, receive retired pay at the rate of 4 per cent of active pay for each complete year of commissioned service in the United States Army, the total to be not more than 75 per cent. Vacancies remaining in grades above the lowest which are not filled by such appointments shall be filled by promotion to date from July 1, 1920, in accordance with the provisions of section 24c hereof. The selection of officers to be appointed under the provisions of this section, under such rules and regulations as may be approved by the Secretary of War, shall be made by a board consisting of the General of the Army and three bureau chiefs and three general officers of the line, to be appointed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That no officer shall be appointed in any branch of the service under the provisions of this section except upon the recommendation of a board of review, convened by the chief of the branch and whose action is approved by him.

"SEC. 24a. Promotion list: For the purpose of establishing a more uniform system for the promotion of officers, based on equity, merit, and the interests of the Army as a whole, the Secretary of War shall cause to be prepared a promotion list, on which shall be carried the names of all officers of the Regular Army and Philippine Scouts below the grade of colonel, except chaplains, professors, band leaders, and certain second lieutenants of the Quartermaster Corps hereinafter specified. The names on the list shall be arranged, in general, so that the first name on the list shall be that of the officer having the longest commissioned service; the second name that of the officer having the next longest commissioned service, and so on. In computations for the purpose of determining the position of officers on the promotion list there shall be credited all active commissioned service in the Army performed while under appointment from the United States Government, whether in the Regular, provisional, or temporary forces, except service under a reserve commission while in attendance at a school or camp for the training of candidates for commission. Commissioned service in the Regular Army or the Philippine Scouts, if continuous to the present time, shall be counted as having begun on the date of original commission. To officers of the Dental Corps shall be credited their service as contract or acting dental surgeons, and to officers of the Veterinary Corps shall be credited their Army governmental veterinary service rendered prior to June 3, 1916. The original promotion list shall be formed by a board of officers appointed by the Secretary of War, consisting of one colonel of each of the branches of the service in which officers are permanently commissioned under the terms of this act and one officer of the personnel branch of the General Staff who has made a special study of merging the present promotion lists into a single list. The steps in the formation of the original promotion list shall be as follows:

"First. Officers below the grade of colonel in the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Veterinary Corps, Corps of Engineers, Signal Corps, Infantry, Cavalry, Field Artillery, Coast Artillery Corps, Porto Rico regiment, and Philippine Scouts, who were originally appointed in the Regular Army or Philippine Scouts prior to April 6, 1917, shall be arranged without changing the present order of officers on the lineal lists of their own branches, but otherwise as nearly as practicable according to length of commissioned service, except that officers of the Medical Corps shall be placed immediately below other officers of two years' longer service. The following shall be omitted:

"(a) Officers who, as a result of voluntary transfer, occupy positions on the lineal list other than those they would have held if their original commissions had been in their present branches;

"(b) Officers of other branches appointed in the Field Artillery or the Coast Artillery Corps to fill vacancies created by the act approved January 25, 1907;

"(c) Officers appointed in the Regular Army since January 1, 1903, while serving as officers of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry or Philippine Scouts;

"(d) Former officers of the Regular Army or Philippine Scouts who have been reappointed in these forces and who are now below normally placed officers of less commissioned service than theirs.

"Officers of classes (a), (b), and (c) shall be placed on the list in the positions they would have occupied if they had remained in their original branches of the service. Officers of class (d) shall be placed on the list in the position that would normally be occupied by an officer of continuous service equal to the total active commissioned service of such officers in the Army.

"Second. Officers of the Judge Advocate General's Department, Quartermaster Corps, and Ordnance Department, and the military storekeeper shall be placed on the list according to length of commissioned service, except those second lieutenants of the Quartermaster Corps who are found not qualified for promotion as provided in section 24b hereof.

"Third. Captains and lieutenants of the Regular Army and Philippine Scouts, originally appointed since April 6, 1917, with the exception of those of the Medical Corps and chaplains, shall be arranged among themselves according to commissioned service rendered prior to November 11, 1918, and shall be placed at the foot of the list as prepared to this point.

"Fourth. Persons to be appointed as captains or lieutenants under the provisions of section 23 hereof, except in the Medical Corps, shall be placed according to commissioned service rendered prior to November 11, 1918, among the officers referred to in the next preceding clause; and where such commissioned service is equal, officers now in the Regular Army shall precede persons to be appointed under the provisions of this act, and the latter shall be arranged according to age.

"Fifth. All officers of the Medical Corps originally appointed since April 6, 1917, or to be appointed under the provisions of section 23 hereof, shall be placed immediately below officers whose commissioned service rendered prior to November 11, 1918, is two years greater than theirs.

"Sixth. Persons appointed as lieutenant colonels or majors under the provisions of section 23 hereof shall be placed immediately below all officers of the Regular Army who, on July 1, 1920, are promoted to those grades, respectively, under the provisions of section 23 hereof.

"Any former officer of the Regular Army and any retired officer who may hereafter be reappointed to the active list in the manner provided by law shall be placed on the promotion list in accordance with his total active commissioned service. Other officers on original appointment shall be placed at the foot of the list, except that officers of the Medical Corps shall be placed immediately below officers of two years' service. The place of any officer on the promotion list once established shall not thereafter be changed, except as the result of the sentence of a court-martial.

"SEC. 24b. Classification of officers: Immediately upon the passage of this act, and thereafter in September of each year, the President shall convene a board of not less than five general officers, which shall arrange all officers in two classes, namely: Class A, consisting of officers who should be retained in the service, and class B, of officers who should not be retained in the service. Until the rendition of the report of the original board all officers shall be regarded as belonging to class A. The findings of the board shall not be subject to review by any authority. Whenever an officer is placed in class B a board of not less than three officers shall be convened to determine whether his service has been honest and faithful. If the finding is negative, he shall be discharged from the Army; if affirmative, he shall be placed on the retired list with pay at the rate of 2½ per cent of his active pay, multiplied by the number of complete years of commissioned service, the total not to exceed 75 per cent, unless his total commissioned service shall be less than 10 years, in which case he shall be honorably discharged with one year's pay. If an officer is thus retired before the completion of 30 years' commissioned service he may be employed on such active duty as the Secretary of War considers him capable of performing until he has completed 30 years' commissioned service. The board convened upon the passage of this act shall also report the names of those second lieutenants of the Quartermaster Corps who were commissioned under the provisions of section 9 of the act of June 3, 1916, who are not qualified for further promotion. The officers so reported shall continue in the grade of second lieutenant for the remainder of their service and the others shall be placed upon the promotion list according to their commissioned service, as hereinbefore provided.

"SEC. 24c. Promotion of officers: On and after July 1, 1920, vacancies in grades below that of brigadier general shall be filled by the promotion of officers in the order in which they stand on the promotion list, without regard to the branches in which they are commissioned. Officers of the Medical Department shall be promoted at the same time as those officers whose names stand next above theirs on the promotion list, but officers of the medical administrative corps shall not be promoted above the grade of captain. Prior to promotion, the qualifications of every officer shall be inquired into by a board of not less than three nor more than five officers, all of whom shall be senior to the officer whose qualifications are under examination, at least two of whom shall belong to the same branch as that officer and at least two of whom shall be officers of the Medical Corps. If the board find the officer incapacitated for service by reason of physical disability contracted in line of duty he shall be retired with the rank to which his seniority entitled him to be promoted. Otherwise, the board shall recommend his retention in class A or his reclassification in class B, and in the latter case shall proceed to inquire into the character of his service as provided in section 24b hereof. The recommendation of the board, if approved by the President, shall immediately be carried into effect. Existing laws providing for the examination of officers for promotion are hereby repealed, but examination under the provisions of this section shall not be required in the case of any officer heretofore examined under provisions of law and found qualified for promotion to the next higher grade, or incapacitated for service on account of physical disability contracted in line of duty.

"SEC. 24d. Transfer of officers: Upon his own application any officer may be transferred to another branch without loss of rank or change of place on the promotion list.

"SEC. 24e. Appointment of officers: Except as otherwise herein provided, appointments to the grade of second lieutenant shall be made, first, from graduates of the United States Military Academy; second, from enlisted men of the Regular Army; third, from reserve officers and from persons who served in the United States Army between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918; fourth, from officers and from enlisted men of the National Guard; and, fifth, from graduates of schools and colleges having technical courses approved by the Secretary of War. Appointees of the second, third, fourth, and fifth classes shall be between the ages of 21 and 30 years. Appointments in the Medical Corps shall be made in the grade of first lieutenant from reserve medical officers between the ages of 23 and 32 years, and in the Dental and Veterinary Corps in the grade of second lieutenant from reserve dental and veterinary officers, respectfully, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, and in the Medical Administrative Corps from enlisted men of the Medical Department between the ages of 21 and 32 years who have had at least two years' service. Former officers of the Regular Army and retired officers may be reappointed to the active list, if found competent for active duty, and shall be commissioned in the grades determined by the places assigned to them on the promotion list under the provisions of section 24a hereof."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, this is a very long section, and I suggest that in its consideration we begin at the very beginning of the section, and then offer any amendments to the various paragraphs according to the subdivisions of the entire section. I think we can gain time by following that course, and I hope that gentlemen who have amendments to offer will assist the committee in perfecting the bill by following that course. I ask unanimous consent that in the consideration of the section we proceed in the manner I have just indicated.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I understand the request of the gentleman from California to be that each separate subsection of this section of the bill will be considered as an independent section.

Mr. CALDWELL. And reread?

Mr. KAHN. No; not reread, but for amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want to do everything, so far as I am concerned, that is reasonable to facilitate the logical consideration of the bill, but there is one phase of this matter that I propose to offer an amendment to, where, unfortunately in my view of the matter, it will be practically impossible to discuss it in its relation to the entire section if the request of the gentleman from California is agreed to, and I think the gentleman can readily apprehend the position it places me in in that connection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Alabama. I do not think this request will have very much effect on the question under discussion, but it will not be convenient for any Member of the House to consider first an amendment on page 28, and next an amendment on page 37, and next an amendment on page 29, and next an amendment on page 35. Members with copies of the bill can not keep very good track of amendments proposed in that way. Now, the gentleman from California suggested that amendments be offered according to these "subsections," as they are called, although that is not what they are, in the bill in that order. The gentleman can discuss the proposition. It is all involved.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the arrangement is made, does it contemplate the inhibition of amendments until the subsection is reached?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; that is the idea.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We could not offer an amendment until that subsection was reached.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no disposition to oppose the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment, to strike out, on page 28, line 10, the words "November 11, 1918," and to substitute therefor the words "June 30, 1920."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY: Page 28, line 10, strike out "November 11, 1918," and insert in lieu thereof "June 30, 1920."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the reason for offering this amendment is that in providing for the appointment of officers other than those of the Regular Army to the vacancies provided in this bill, if we do not extend the time beyond November 11, 1918, and bring it down to the date of the passage of this bill, it will exclude those men who have been commissioned since November 11, 1918, largely as second lieutenants, many of whom were enlisted men of the Army during the war. It would preclude their consideration for appointment. My attention was called to this by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. KITCHIN. What is the date proposed in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. It brings down the eligible list from November 11, 1918, to June 30, 1920.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Do I understand my colleague to say that the bill as drawn will preclude from consideration men who have been appointed as second lieutenants of the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; there have been appointments of men in the National Army as second lieutenants.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Since the armistice?

Mr. ANTHONY. Since the armistice there have been appointments of second lieutenants of Field Artillery and other branches.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In the temporary portion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I so understand.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the gentleman quite convinced that that is the fact?

Mr. ANTHONY. It has been so stated to me.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What class from West Point, and what examinations?

Mr. ANTHONY. The men who spoke to me were enlisted men in the National Army at the time of their appointment as second lieutenants in different branches of the service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, the gentleman would not come to the floor of the House with this proposition without being well fortified, but this is a matter that has escaped the attention of many others who thought they had kept up with it. If there are appointments of men in the temporary forces, of course they ought to be provided for.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose in cases of this sort men who were in the National Army during the activities of the war were permitted to take examinations, and passed them, but their papers had not been acted upon until after the armistice was signed.

Mr. ANTHONY. There are cases of officers who would be precluded from consideration under the limitation of date in the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Conceding that that may be so—and, of course, the gentleman probably has his information well grounded—by the terms of the gentleman's amendment he will also open up possibly an opportunity for undue preference of some of these men, as we go further on in the bill, will he not?

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not see how we could.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CALDWELL. I call attention to the fact that the date the gentleman proposes has not yet arrived.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that.

Mr. CALDWELL. And that between the date of the passage of the bill and the arrival of that date there might be an opportunity for loading this list.

Mr. ANTHONY. What I have in mind is that there may be more of these officers appointed from the same source in the meantime, and if so, they ought not to be excluded from consideration. I do not know that there will be any, but if there are, such men should be taken care of.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not think they could make any such appointments now.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRAGO. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that shortly after November 11, 1918, they began the demobilization of the Army, and that many of the National Guard organizations were mustered out of the service before the men in them received even the promotions for which they had been recommended by the commanding officers of the American Expeditionary Forces?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is in regard to promotions. The purpose of my amendment is to take care of the new appointments.

Mr. CRAGO. But you will force this officer, who was mustered out of the service, say, in December, 1918, or January, 1919, as a major or a lieutenant colonel to accept a commission as a major or lieutenant colonel, whereas if this man stayed in the service, even though he was performing mere staff duty or routine duty in some department, he receives his promotion; but these men who were mustered out of the service had no chance to receive their promotions, and if they go in now, as it is provided they may go in, they must go in below the men who served right with them, below them in grade and in some instances below them in rank.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think what the gentleman says is a correct explanation of that situation, but would not that be taken care of properly in another paragraph which provides for the assignment into different grades?

Mr. CRAGO. Is the gentleman's amendment on line 10 or line 20?

Mr. ANTHONY. Line 10, page 28.

Mr. CRAGO. I was speaking more particularly of the date, "November 11, 1918," in line 20, which we will take up later.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I had in mind the very thing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggested, but that it appears now is down in lines 19 and 20 of this same section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has expired.

Mr. HARRISON was recognized.

Mr. BANKHEAD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it understood that we are formally considering section 24?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that all amendments to this subsection 24 should first be made before we pass to the promotion list provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It will not be necessary to again read section 24?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I simply want to recur for a few minutes to the letter of the Secretary of War that has been read this morning. I had not had a chance to consider it until I heard it read a few moments ago. It is utterly impossible to accept the suggestion that the Secretary of War has made. We have passed the section which provides for the Engineer Corps and therefore it is impossible to make an amendment to that section in order to carry out the suggestion of the Secretary.

Mr. CONNALLY. Would it not be possible to put it on by a motion to recommit?

Mr. HARRISON. It would be possible, but somebody has got to make the motion. I am talking about what must come before this body. When the vote comes up in the House, the question that will come before the House will be whether we will accept the provisions of the bill which provides for a construction in all the different bureaus or whether we shall have consolidated all construction in the construction corps as provided in the amendment made by the gentleman from New York and adopted by the House. It will be utterly impossible, therefore, to consider the suggestion of the Secretary of War to place this construction corps under the Engineer Corps. The sole and only question that can come before the House now is whether or not the construction corps shall be a separate construction corps or whether some of it shall belong to the Quartermaster Corps and some to the Ordnance Corps and some to other corps, a condition which the Secretary has condemned in his letter of March 5, and as to which he does not modify his position in his last letter.

The letter, therefore, of the Secretary of War which he wrote on March 5 will have full force and effect in that it expressly states that he is in favor of a separate construction corps so far as it has any bearing on the provisions of the bill. I hope when the matter comes up before the House my colleagues will bear in mind that they still have the recommendation of the Secretary of War in favor of a separate construction corps as against provisions made in the bill, and that the suggestion of the Secretary of War can not be carried out by placing it in the Engineer Corps.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have no sympathy with the criticism of the Secretary of War based upon some supposition that he has announced a change of view. I think that no pride of opinion ought to restrain anybody, whether in or out of office, in declaring he has changed his mind if he has ground for so doing. [Applause.] This is the question I want to ask, Has not the Assistant Secretary of War, who has had practical information of all these matters, persistently advocated a separate construction service?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. KAHN. I do not understand from the reading of the letter that the Secretary of War has changed his mind. The letter, as I recall it, simply states that his former letter was written inadvertently and did not express his true opinion.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I was referring to the observations of another member of the committee who asserted that the Secretary had changed his mind. As I say, if that is true, I do not critizise him. The question I intended to put was with reference to the attitude of the Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. HARRISON. The Assistant Secretary of War has been very consistent on this proposition. I think a careful reading of the letter of the Secretary of War carries out my contention that as between the proposition in the bill and the proposition in the amendment he still stands by the letter of March 5.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to prevent the appointment in the regular organization of the old men or to give them the positions they ought to have had during the war. I am perfectly willing that something be put in the bill to take care of that situation.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from New York is referring to the old retired enlisted men who came back into the service during the war and were commissioned and served in the Army. At the end of the period that their services were required they went back to the retired list. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] has an amendment which he offered during the discussion of the section relating to warrant officers, but which he proposes to offer to the miscellaneous section, and that will take care of these men.

Mr. CALDWELL. And, therefore, if that amendment is adopted, this amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be unnecessary.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Are there not a good many cases where enlisted men or noncommissioned officers in the Army have been recommended for promotion as commissioned officers, and which recommendations had not been carried out at the date of the armistice?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; and I think they ought to be taken care of. The trouble with the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is that it goes too far and opens the door wider than it should be.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman means as to date. The date in the bill would cut these men out entirely.

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes; the date here would cut those men out, but there is an amendment that is to be introduced that will let these men in.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], as proposed the other day—the one I have in mind may not be the one—would put some retired men at higher pay, but it would not cover this case at all.

Mr. KAHN. These are enlisted men and noncommissioned officers who served as commissioned officers during the war, and are proposed to be taken care of in the bill under the section relating to warrant officers. They are to be made warrant officers.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is another proposition entirely.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the amendment had said of "persons other than officers of the Regular Army below the age of 54 years who served as officers in the United States Army at any time between April 6, 1917, and the present date," it would take them all in. But if you put the date June 30, 1920, you throw the doors open for all kinds of favoritism, which we have always protested against.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It may be that the date is too late. The date of June 30, 1919, would give a chance for all promotions that have been made, and would not be too late. I think these men—I do not know any of them—an enlisted man who was cited for bravery and recommended for promotion, very likely in battle before the armistice, ought to have a chance for a second lieutenant.

Mr. CALDWELL. Of course, the gentleman and I agree that those men ought not to be left out; but the doors ought not to be left open from now on.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas. In lieu of the date June 30, 1920, I move to substitute "the date of the passage of this act."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CALDWELL to the amendment offered by Mr. ANTHONY. Strike out "June 30, 1920," and insert "the date of the passage of this act."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has offered this amendment to make it 1920, June 30. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CADWELL] has offered to amend by making it after the passage of this act. I understand the purpose is to take care of those noncommissioned officers and enlisted men who have been recommended for promotion and for commissions.

Mr. ANTHONY. No; it would take care of those officers who have actually received new commissions since November 11, 1918.

Mr. BEE. Who have actually received commissions. Is it contemplated that in filling the vacancies the men must be now in the service?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the idea.

Mr. BEE. In other words, if a man has been mustered out of the service and wants to go back into the service, he would not be eligible for appointment under this section?

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes, he would.

Mr. BEE. Then he does not have to be in the service now?

Mr. ANTHONY. No.

Mr. BEE. When you state that 50 per cent shall be taken from those not officers of the Regular Army, who served between the periods mentioned, where do those vacancies come from, and what becomes of the Regular officers, or are there so many vacancies that you can go outside to fill them?

Mr. ANTHONY. There are about 7,000 vacancies created by this bill, and we provide that not less than one-half of them shall be filled from those who have served in the National Army during the time specified.

Mr. BEE. Then it would take care of the officers of the Regular Army, and at the same time take care of these men who rendered distinguished service in the National Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. The idea is to make it possible so that officers of both services shall receive recognition, and that there shall be fair distribution of the appointments to the vacancies.

Mr. BEE. To illustrate what is in my mind, the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] served in the National Army during the war and was cited for bravery.

Mr. ANTHONY. He would be eligible for consideration for appointment under this bill, whether in the service now or out of it.

Mr. BEE. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, if this bill passes at least 7,000 new officers will be appointed in the Army.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is correct.

Mr. BRIGGS. And it is provided that one-half of those should be taken outside of the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. Not less than one-half.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman from Kansas accept the amendment that I propose?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, on page 28, lines 19 and 20, by striking out the words after "appointed," beginning with the word "to" down to and including the word "nor"; in other words, to strike out the words "to a grade higher than that held by him on November 11, 1918, nor."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 28, line 19, after the word "appointed" strike out "to a grade higher than that held by him on November 11, 1918, nor."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that is plain, and I do not see any objection to that amendment.

Mr. BEE. What does it contemplate?

Mr. CALDWELL. It contemplates that appointments from the provisional officers during the war will not be made above the grade of captain unless they are specially recommended for it on account of their previous service.

Mr. BEE. What is the object of doing that? Why do you want to deprive a man from going into the grade that he held at that time?

Mr. CALDWELL. It does not. It says "to a grade higher than that held November 11, 1918"; and if in the meantime he has been promoted to some higher grade because of efficiency, he can not get it. We want to have it so that a man who has grown up in the Army since November 11, 1918, or since the beginning of the war, should have the benefit of all that he has grown to. It is perfectly plain that if you do not do this, then if a man was a major during the war and has grown to a lieutenant colonel or a colonel since the war, when he is reappointed he can not be anything but a major; he has got to go back again and start over, and that is not fair.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then, under the language of the bill, if a man had been cited for promotion before the armistice to the position of major and had not received it on the date of the armistice, he could not get it now?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; but under my amendment he could, as I understand it, and that is the object of the amendment.

Mr. CRAGO. What time does the gentleman fix?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not fix any. I permit him to get the grade to which he has been recommended and for which he can stand the examination. That is what he ought to have.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I think this is about as good a time as any, if the House will permit the suggestion, to consider very carefully whether we shall make any changes in the text of this section. When we come to look over the situation with some care, we will find that everything that is to be done in the reorganization of the Army under this section is of such a delicate nature with regard to the relations of one man to another and the comparison of one record with another, each impinging upon another's chances for promotion, that we should be very sure we do not disturb the foundation principle upon which the text of the bill is based.

If I suggest to you that this text, that all of this section, has been prepared only after careful study of the lineal list and commissioned personnel of the Army for the last 25 or 30 years, a careful inspection of the records, a careful determination of the mathematics involved in those records leading to the probabilities of promotion and the ages at which promotion may be gained and the probable length of service in a grade before being promoted to another; and if I suggest further that this inspection and study has been reduced to something like the terms of a life insurance actuary's table and upon that deduction has been founded this text, I am sure it will assure to you as practical men that if we once begin to disturb some of the points of this combination we will throw the whole scheme out of joint.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I am not a member of the committee, and I have no desire to thrust myself into this debate, but in view of what the gentleman has said, does he not think it would be better to have presented full information of this portion of the bill before we vote upon any amendment?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I should think very likely that would commend itself to the judgment of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As I understand it this is the most intricate part of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If we could have the benefit of a general explanation by the members of the committee it would assist us in reaching a conclusion with respect to details.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If the gentleman will permit me, very likely the committee would not care to listen patiently to any improvised information in general, but as point after point arises, if it can be satisfactorily explained, it will accomplish the object.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. LITTLE. I was just going to ask who it was that made this painstaking investigation and report?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not cite the gentleman to the names of all the persons involved in it, but they are men who have had custody of the records there and have been connected professionally with the responsibility of studying them.

Mr. LITTLE. Somebody in the department laid the information before the committee?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Because nobody except men in the War Department knows what the records are.

Now, this occurs to me in connection with this amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. We all approve of the idea that we shall give promotion to the brave young men who served in the temporary forces in commissioned grades and see that they are deprived of none of the prestige which they properly won under those circumstances. But there are various things to be taken in consideration in connection with the significance of these dates.

The armistice took effect November 11, 1918. Now, in the period of a few weeks or months after that all that could be brought home of the combatant arms of the Army were brought home and demobilized and the brave young officers who officered those units were sent back into civil life. They did not go back into civil life because the Army did not appreciate the value of their services or that the Army underestimated what the value of those services might be if they were continued in it, but because there was no longer any use for them. So they went back into civil life. Now, it is obvious that they lose much of seniority or promotion that they might have gained had they stayed in the service from November 11 until the present time, whereas at the very same time they were mustered out other men, temporary officers in the Army like themselves, who happened to be engaged in duties for which the necessity to continue still existed, were continued in the service. Some of those men were engaged in quartermaster duties or various other staff functions, some were connected with the great mass of business in settling up affairs after the armistice. Some of those men might have been in charge of salvage dumps and some of those men were engaged in auctioning off automobiles, maybe——

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Just a moment. Because they were held to be fit men to conduct that business. They were being trained in that service and they gained the seniority of age in the service and the opportunity for additional promotion in the service, which was denied these young men of the line who were sent back into civil life as soon as line troops and line officers were no longer needed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I have five additional minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It would be obviously unfair to say that this group of temporary officers shall have the advantage of continued seniority in promotion that they got because they were retained in the service when another part of the same outfit, equally deserving, equally efficient, shall lose all that prestige because they were not retained in the service, their service for the present being no longer necessary.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman subscribe to the doctrine that all promotions should be strictly on the basis of seniority?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Not in the temporary forces; no. I think in the Regular Establishment that is the safest and wisest thing, eliminating the unfit so that seniority will mean the progress of the fit.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I see the language of the bill is that no person shall be appointed to the grade higher than that which he held on this specified date?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Suppose he had been recommended for a higher grade on the day of the armistice, what would the gentleman say as to that?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am going to come to that in this way: Here is the point where admittedly our language must make it possible to arrive at some attempt at equity. The question, however, is one of doing it in a practical way.

We know that every war ends with the probabilities of advancement of a good many men still left in suspense. It is our purpose in this bill to try to get to the place where you can draw the line with approximate fairness, and so here is the particular place where we shall make a start.

Now, then, let us keep in mind the third thing about these dates and about the comparison of records of these temporary officers. You will find, if you go on through this section, that when we take these young men into the Regular Army we are going to match up their service and records more or less with young men and older men of the Regular Establishment in assigning them to their grades, and then the question comes in as to how much advantage you are prepared to give, and give consistently, to a temporary officer of two or three years over a Regular officer of five, six, eight, nine, or ten years, or even more. That at first might not seem to you to be a logical proposition, but the logic of it lies in this, that most of these temporary officers who are now applying for admission either started as first lieutenants or very soon became first lieutenants and captains, because in the temporary Army it was often easy to get an advanced grade to start with. Not only that, but the period of service between the grades for temporary officers was frequently only a matter of weeks, and they often went from lieutenant to captain, and captain to major in a very short time. However, right along with them were their fellow officers of the Regular Establishment, who could only go up from one grade to another under the provision which limited them by seniority, and many of whom as soon as the war was over went back to their old original place in the line, and all of them will by June 30 of this year. There were Regulars who might have matched these temporary officers as colonels, who are now in their old grade as captain.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman recognizes the fact that the men who are on the regular list by reason of these vacancies here will get in, and the man on the temporary list will only get in where he can get in.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not want to base the Regulars' hazards of promotion on the mathematics of what somebody else may or may not get. I want him to get what he has earned.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman knows that November 11, 1918, was fixed because that was the date of the armistice, and we figured the war was over then. Now, there was another date in reference to promotions and preferences because of the war, and that was July 1, 1919, when the War Department issued an order to the effect that no further promotions should be made. Would the gentleman be willing to compromise and agree to an amendment fixing the date of July 1, 1919, in place of striking out the whole thing?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; because I think this thing is very plain as it stands. I do not want to compromise anybody's record. I say when you get down to the last conclusion in this matter, by admitting temporaries to the grades they got in the temporary service, they have an advantage over the Regular who can not match that grade with them, although he may have had a temporary grade with him once. Although he may have had a temporary grade higher than he has, when he is considered for promotion he reverts to his old grade of captain, say, which he was 20 years in earning. It is unfortunate to match a young man who has been in only a short time, and who now holds a higher rank, with a man who has served 20 years and has gotten to be only a captain.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out, in line 20, page 28, the words "November 11, 1918," and insert in lieu thereof the words "June 30, 1919."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 28, line 20, strike out "November 11, 1918," and insert in lieu thereof "June 30, 1919."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am frank to admit, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know whether the date is correct or not.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the gentleman will yield just long enough for me to say it, I have no objection to his amendment. It accomplishes practically the same purpose as mine.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the provision in the bill as it stands, if enacted into law, would be most demoralizing.

The provision in the bill is that no person shall be appointed to the vacancies from outside of the Regular Army to a higher grade than he held November 11, 1919. There are many cases, both at the war front and in the departments at Washington, or some, where for meritorious service rendered either in the field or in the office men were recommended for promotion before November 11, 1918, and have since been promoted. There are other cases where in the ordinary conduct of the War Department men have been promoted since November 11, 1918, and after promotion were held up for a while. But the provision in the bill would forbid any of these men staying in the Army who have received their promotions and commissions since November 11, 1918, unless they are demoted and put down below the rank—the lineal list of young captains in the Regular Army. That is a gross injustice. It would be demoralizing in its effect. I mention the date of June 30, 1919. I do not know whether the date is correct or not, but after the armistice all promotions were held up. No matter how meritorious the recommendation may have been, no promotion of these temporary officers was made for quite a while. But that time expired, as I understand, before June 30, following the armistice, and promotions were made in accordance with these recommendations. I think these men who stayed with the Army and received their promotions ought not to be slapped in the face by the legislative body of the country and told that if they are to stay in the Army after receiving promotion for merit they must go down below the grade which they held and that a man 36, 37, or 40 years of age must be put in the lineal list below an officer of 21 or 22 years of age. It is so unjust that I know it did not receive the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs thoroughly when the matter was before that committee. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAGO and Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], a member of the committee.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, I want to take a few minutes to answer the criticism of the gentleman.

This matter was carefully considered more than one time in the committee, and here are the facts as they apply or as this language applies.

If we stop with November 11, 1918, we will have the grade of these officers fixed, of course, as of that date. Now, within 30 days after that date they began mustering out of the service the men who had been in the front line. In other words, within three months after that date and long before June 30, 1919, the men who had been in the front line with the National Guard organizations and the National Army organizations, and especially the National Guard organizations, were all mustered out of the service. Now, many of those men had been recommended for promotion. Their promotions were not received before the date of their muster out, and in such cases you will have men who served as majors or lieutenant colonels mustered out as such go back into this service in a lower rank than a captain or a first lieutenant who remained in the service on some special duty and received his promotion after his regiment was mustered out of the service.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is it not a fact that the promotions in France were very much slower than promotions on this side, because the men were so busy fighting that they did not have the time to make promotions?

Mr. CRAGO. Exactly so.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will not this preclude those who were engaged actively in the war from receiving the promotions they ought to have?

Mr. CRAGO. That is true, and many of these men were mustered out before they received the promotion for which they were recommended.

Here is the recommendation that I want to make: I think we should either strike out this entire matter, beginning with the semicolon in line 19 and ending with the period after the word "section," in line 23, and leave this matter to be entirely determined by that board, or leave it in such a way that the conferees between the House and the Senate can agree to some date which is fair to the greatest number of the officers who will be affected thereby. I believe that can be worked out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Suppose we added, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania please, after the date specified, language to the effect that it should apply not simply to those who had held the rank of that date, but to those who had been recommended for higher rank, and the recommendation approved by the superiors, including the commander in chief. Would not that answer the purpose the gentleman had in mind?

Mr. CRAGO. That would remedy it to some extent, but it would not take care of all the cases.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I propose to offer that at the proper time.

Mr. CRAGO. It would be beneficial to add that.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. Why not strike out the earlier part of that same sentence, beginning with the word "no," in line 15, so as to remove the age limitation? Let me say this, that there are men to-day in the Judge Advocate General's office who served abroad and hold the rank of major or lieutenant colonel and who would now be railroaded out of office if the language were left as it is.

Mr. CRAGO. Oh, that is raising another issue.

Mr. FRENCH. That is true; but it seems very vital, and it looks as though men have been discriminated against who, if they had entered the service at this end of the line and had worked their way up here, would not be disturbed; but inasmuch as they were overseas and were commissioned at a lower grade and happened to be of a younger age than that provided in the bill would be relieved from their commissions.

Mr. CRAGO. I would not want to disturb any of these officers who have records of that kind if there is any way to prevent it.

Here is the point I am trying to make: Either leave this date as it is—and the Senate will probably fix some other date, and the proper date can be substituted—or strike out all the language referring to rank and leave it in such a way that the conferees between the two Houses can adjust this matter in an equitable way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I have offered a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I have offered a substitute and sent it to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment pending is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to modify my amendment. Instead of "June 30, 1919," insert "or before June 30, 1919," so that it would read "on or before June 30, 1919."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is exhausted.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York should be adopted, and, certainly, if that is not adopted, the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], should be adopted.

It would be cruel, it would be inhuman, to permit this language to stay in this bill. Every man in this House has had repeated applications from young men who served in France and who were so busy fighting the foe that they had not time to prosecute their rights for promotion, although recommended time and time again; but the 11th of November, 1918, came, and all promotions ceased. That is what happened to the men engaged on the other side. The same is true as to what happened on this side.

I want to call your attention to the fact that it was just as essential that we should have good men here at home as that we should have them over there. Some of the best men in this country were induced to give up good positions, business men, sharp, active young men, who came here at the request of the Quartermaster General, or came here at the request of the Judge Advocate General, and served faithfully and well; and were promised, if you please, that they would be promoted, and it was recommended that they should be promoted, but the 11th of November came and their promotions were denied.

Some of those men still remain in the department because of their patriotic belief that they should stay here and help out their chiefs who besought them to stay. Some of them were promoted, and some of them were promised promotion, and those promises are still in existence. Some of them may be promoted if opportunity is given, but if you permit this language to remain not one of them will get his promotion. It is another demonstration of the fact of the absolute selfishness of this Regular Establishment. They do not want anybody outside of that Regular Establishment to have any recognition that they can possibly keep them from having. And I want to say to the gentlemen of this committee and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] that he can afford to be generous, even if he is interested.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I am not accustomed to dealing quietly under innuendo. What is the gentleman's contention?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My contention is that these learned gentlemen who are so partisan in favor of keeping the Regular Establishment can be generous enough to give these other men whose service is as essential as that of those in the Regular Establishment a chance for promotion so that they may receive their just dues.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But the gentleman said, "Even if he is interested." I should like to have that language explained.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say that the gentleman is interested in preserving the bill in its present form. I say that throughout this discussion he has demonstrated the fact that he does not want one item of the bill changed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman is not explaining, but he is putting in more.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will explain. The last pronouncement that the gentleman made upon the floor was that we should be very careful before we changed the bill, that this thing had been figured out to a mathematical or actuarial nicety. By whom? By the General Staff. The General Staff officers wrote that bill, and there is not a man here who will deny it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is there any gentleman on the floor here who could have written it in their place?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I desire to say that there are gentlemen upon the floor who could have had at least precaution enough to have seen that they did not fill it so full of jokers that nobody outside of the General Staff and those particularly interested in it could have any advantage by reason of its provisions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. So I say that if we are going to try to encourage and popularize the Army of the United States among the people of this country, we must take into consideration that it is not alone those who are within the Regular Establishment who should be provided for, and not alone those who are within the Regular Establishment who should be invited to take an interest in this Army; by doing this thing you are shutting the door in the face of hundreds of young men just as much entitled to be recognized, just as much entitled to be promoted as those young captains in the Regular Establishment are. How long will they have to wait? Not six months. It would not delay them any considerable length of time, and I say it is the most selfish proposition I ever heard advanced, that this door shall be shut in the face of those men who belonged to the temporary establishment; not only those who were promised promotion who did not get it, but those who got promotion and who are staying here to-day at a sacrifice to themselves, discharging the duties of their office to the acceptance of their chiefs, with the promise that they should have at least an equal chance when it came to the reorganization of the Army.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I know the gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Take an officer, for instance, who was a captain in the Construction Corps. The gentleman discussed that yesterday.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. On November 11, 1918, or on May 1, 1918, he was made a major. Take another boy in the Infantry from the State of Indiana, who was in the first Indiana over across, and he was demobilized. He was a captain and demobilized on January 1, but held the rank or grade of captain on November 11, 1918. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana, does he want to give that major in the construction corps an advantage over the Indiana boy who was in the line?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That is the point.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not want to give one an advantage over the other, but I do want the door left open so that all of those who desire to stay in the Army and who ought to be given encouragement, can stay in the Army. The gentlemen who are instrumental in putting this into this bill are not so much concerned about the young man who has been discharged and demobilized and has gone back to civil life, where he will stay, as they are interested in shutting the door in the face of the men to whom I have referred and who are yet in the Army, but do not belong to the Regular Establishment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And is not the provision so drawn as to do an injustice to officers who served in the Army who are just as much entitled to recognition as the captain to whom the gentleman referred?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely; so I say there should be equal opportunity to all, and there is no one who will for a moment contend that there is equal opportunity for all in this provision.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. A man serving in the Regular Establishment for 20 years is now a captain. Another man comes in as a temporary officer during the war and he becomes a lieutenant colonel in 18 months. Which of those men should have the advantage when you come to make up this single list? Or would you give the temporary officer all that advantage?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I would not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. All right.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would not give him that advantage, and this proposed amendment would not give it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Read the bill and see.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If you strike out this language it will give the man at least a chance who, by reason of his merit, can be promoted, but by this provision unamended you propose to say that he shall have no chance at all. I say it is infamous, that it would be a disgrace to this body to say to these hundreds of young men who are entitled to this recognition, "You shall have no recognition," and I can not help believing that the gentleman from Illinois was right when he said that the facts in this case were not brought to the attention of this committee; for I can not believe that a committee of this Congress would be so cruelly selfish as to say to the men whom we urged and prayed with to come from the civil walks of life and give their all to this country, that now when we are going to reorganize the Army the door shall be shut in their faces for the benefit of an aristocratic few. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am sure the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] who has just spoken does full justice to the ability, to the courage, to the diligence, of this great Committee on Military Affairs. I do not believe that any of us think for one moment that this bill was written in any spirit except that of a genuine desire to do the best that could be done by the subject. I believe, moreover, that when we leave it open to be inferred that any other spirit animated these men we make a mistake, and a mistake which ought not to be made.

Now, let us come to the consideration of this question under discussion. I approach the question of any amendment here with a great deal of diffidence. I recognize that these men have given months of study to what we must consider hastily and without digesting our thoughts. We can make some suggestions, we can make some changes. It is believed that when we suggest this date in the bill it may do injustice to some of those who are to be subject to the provisions of the bill, and the gentleman from Illinois suggested a later date. I believe that that will help obviate any chance to do injustice, and I suggest as a further amendment to that which the gentleman from Illinois has proposed that we have not simply a provision that men shall not have a higher rank than that which they have held before a given date, but that we add "or for which he has been recommended and such recommendation approved by those superior in command to the officer recommended, including the Commander in Chief."

We have this situation: The campaign over there was in its final stage a short one. The time of close and hard fighting was a short period of time. It was too short a time in which to have recommendations based on bravery, based on service in the field, finally carried out. And yet these men won by risking their lives, by periling all they had, the promotion for which they were recommended. Why, then, should we not take into account the recommendation as much as the actual rank? Perhaps the man who was recommended holds not the recommendation alone; perhaps he may have served and occupied a rank for which he was recommended. At any rate, he displayed the initiative, he displayed the heroism, he displayed the ability to do and dare, which, under this amendment, shows that not only those who witnessed that which he did, not only those who were inspired by the heroism he displayed, but those who sat in the calm of their offices, where they could carefully and thoughtfully consider this act not done in their presence unmoved by the enthusiasm of the moment, not stirred by the fact that this daring deed was done in their presence, with time and abundance of opportunity in which to reflect, men under these circumstances, charged with the high responsibility of considering that which they did, with the recommendation of the Commander in Chief, approve of such recommendations.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. The recommendation would have the approval by the chief on the other side and reached his office, but what about the man where they recommended and it had not reached his office?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I have talked with a gentleman on the Military Affairs Committee, and I find that even the cases comprehended in my amendment grow up into the thousands, and that it would involve a change of records, a great deal of additional consideration, and it will take in a multitude—the larger number of cases. You can not provide for each individual case; all you can do is to make it general.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DEMPSEY to the amendment of Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 28, after the figures 1919, insert "or for which he had been recommended and such recommendation approved by those superior in command, including the Commander in Chief."

Mr. DEMPSEY. Add after the figures 1919 "in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think the gentleman's amendment should come in after the word "him" in line 20. The gentleman had better examine it.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I think I will offer it after the word "him" in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment is not in order as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I think the two can be read together and make a complete whole. I offer it after the word "him" in line 20.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it does not change the language of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; but it modifies it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Can it not be so considered if no objection is made? I understand the gentleman from Illinois is willing to accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be voted on, and then the gentleman from New York can offer his amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It would be better to consider it as one question, because it makes one complete amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It could not be considered in that way in the face of opposition. Of course, by unanimous consent it can be considered as one amendment.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be considered as one amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I dislike to object, I have a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and also for the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I would like to have it considered, and for that reason I object, and I offer the substitute for these two amendments.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not see how it will interfere with the gentleman's substitute to have the two amendments considered as one amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the two amendments will be considered together as one. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Then I offer my substitute now.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from New York. A statement was made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] that this bill was written by the General Staff. I think it due to the Committee on Military Affairs that a statement should be made at this time as to how this bill was framed. The committee from time to time, after long hearings and considerable discussion, agreed upon certain policies to be formulated in the law. The committee recognized that it would require an Army officer of considerable skill to draft legislation to put the policy of the committee into proper language. The committee had the assistance of an officer of the War Department in doing that very thing.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I just want to say that the officer who helped us draft this bill consulted me this morning on this change of phraseology, and the words of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] meet his approval.

Mr. KAHN. Time after time when the officer returned with a provision embodying the policy expressed in language that he thought would meet the views of the committee the committee changed the language very materially, and very frequently had the entire thing rewritten so as to meet the exact views of the committee. The Committee on Military Affairs is responsible for the policy which the bill tries to carry into effect.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman think it is safe practice to have anybody write a bill who is opposed to the policy that they want embodied in the bill?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know that any officer consulted by the committee was opposed to the policy that the committee felt ought to be embodied in the bill. The committee repeatedly, after the language was handed to the committee, changed the text, so as to make the meaning of the committee more clear.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman not know that the General Staff is opposed to the policy of this bill?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know, because I have not been in consultation with the Chief of Staff for months, nor with any officer in high command in the General Staff for months. I know that I am trying, as one member of the committee, to give the country a military law which will be better than any military law we have heretofore had.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman from Indiana ought to have the information, and the House ought to have the information, that the Committee on Military Affairs rejected in its entirety the bill prepared by the General Staff.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But, after that, the committee asked the gentleman, who is a member of the General Staff, to write the ideas of the committee into the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. After that, let me say to the gentleman, the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs considered for weeks what its policy would be, and then called in this representative of the General Staff and dictated to him the policies which should be embodied in this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that he has examined the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and in his opinion it is not a substitute. It will not be in order until after the votes are had on the other amendments, and then it would be in order.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CONNALLY. I would like to have my amendment read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read it in the gentleman's time.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from New York offered an amendment to my amendment, and that is to be considered by the House as an amendment to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then no other amendment to strike out the last word is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois is to perfect the text, and is therefore a preferential amendment, to which has been added by unanimous consent an additional amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And another amendment now is not in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that if my amendment is adopted there will be no occasion, I think, to have the gentleman's amendment passed, and I think he will agree with me if he will listen to me. My amendment is to strike out all of this language to which the gentleman from Illinois is objecting.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am perfectly willing to hear the amendment read, but I want to bring the thing to a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 19, after the word "major," strike out all the balance of the lines down to and including the word "section" in line 23.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is another thing entirely. I ask for a vote on the other amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as modified by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas now offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 19, after the word "major," strike out all the balance of the lines down to and including the word "section" in line 23.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment just adopted offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not cure cases of officers who were immediately discharged after the armistice or were not promoted subsequent to that time. It will help the officers who remained in the service and were promoted after November 11, and according to my understanding an officer who was discharged promptly after the armistice and was not promoted after November 11 will not be affected.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield for just one suggestion?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. It does cover the cases of all men who were recommended for promotion previous to the date named?

Mr. CONNALLY. Whether afterwards promoted or not?

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Well, I will say to the gentleman from New York and others that in the language of this particular section of the bill you do not do away with the restrictions which the War Department may impose in promoting these officers. Before they can be commissioned they must still pass the examinations and the regulations laid down by the board officers provided for in this case.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under the language of the bill no officer can be promoted above the grade of captain unless he is recommended by the board of general officers. Under the gentleman's amendment, it might be, I will not say would be, a purely political matter in the hands of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I call the gentleman's attention to page 29 where selections shall be made by a board consisting of the General of the Army and three bureau chiefs and three general officers of the line, to be appointed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is promotion, but this is original appointment. The gentleman strikes out the only safety to the officer in reference to their being a political appointment.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; it says selection. If the gentleman from Illinois will read the language in his usual careful and analytic way, he will discover——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have not examined it very carefully, but I did not suppose it was in twice.

Mr. CONNALLY. On page 29 it says:

The selection of officers to be appointed under provisions of this section, under such rules and regulations as may be approved by the Secretary of War, shall be made by a board consisting of—

and so forth.

My objection to the language which I have moved to strike out is that these officers, in order to be appointed, must still pass the scrutiny of the board of general officers, and you need not worry that that board of general officers, composed of officers already in the Army, are apt to promote a man to any higher rank than his merits entitle him. But in the language we are now discussing Congress is saying to the board that, no matter how worthy a man may be, no matter how distinguished he may be, no matter what recommendations he may have, you are saying to that board, "You shall not appoint him, regardless of his qualifications." Unless what? Unless he served in a higher grade than captain prior to a certain date. Not only that, but neither can you appoint him to the grade of captain unless he was specifically recommended. What does that mean? It means that half the vacancies provided by this bill are to be filled by men to be brought in from the outside. What else does it do?

This provision means that while half the appointments under this bill shall be made from the outside it provides that the half that is already on the inside shall get all the ranks of lieutenant colonel and of major and of colonel, except those very few, those very few men who may be specifically selected under the terms of this particular provision.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. You can not——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will.

Mr. CRAGO. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact the language of the bill is really a limitation on this board giving these officers from the outside any higher rank.

Mr. CONNALLY. Correct. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is exactly right about it. The language of the bill which I am discussing is a limitation. It says to this board, "You can not consider these men, no matter how meritorious they may be." It simply means these officers who are now on the lineal line of the Regular Army shall receive the benefit and be promoted to the rank of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major. The new men you appoint from the outside, these new men, must go to the foot of the list, and this board is absolutely prevented from appointing those men at all. That is another evidence of the flexibility of this bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In just a moment. I want to say in reference to the Committee on Military Affairs that I do not attach any blame to that committee with reference to the charge that is generally talked about of the General Staff writing this bill. It is customary for departments to prepare a draft of a bill and then submit it to a committee. I believe the committee has worked faithfully on this bill, and in some particulars has done well; but I think the committee, in view of the larger aspects of the measure to which its attention has been directed, has been led into committing errors which it has overlooked or permitted to creep in unnoticed.

Mr. McKENZIE. I just want to ask my distinguished friend from Texas if he does not think that it would be very unwise to give any board or any person power to appoint an officer to the grade of major or lieutenant colonel or colonel who had not spent a number of years in the service-laying the foundation that would enable him to carry out the duties and responsibilities that devolve upon an officer of that grade?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that if he believes that why did he write into this bill, on page 28, the following language:

A suitable number of such officers who served between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, shall be appointed in each of the grades below that of brigadier general.

He says no board should have the power to make an appointment unless a man has been in service for a great number of years, and yet the very bill the gentleman is talking about says they shall appoint majors, lieutenant colonels, and colonels from the outside. They will appoint the few that have been selected and are now on the list of the War Department awaiting appointment.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman knows those officers will be appointed in the staff corps.

Mr. CONNALLY. If a man can learn these intricate staff duties in a short time, why could not a man who has been overseas and who has been in the National Guard for 15 years, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] will testify, possess qualifications relative to line duties?

Mr. ANTHONY. The only limitation on the appointment of these officers, as I see in the bill, is in regard to their age.

Mr. CONNALLY. Line 19 says that—

No such person shall be appointed to a grade higher than that held by him on November 11, 1918.

Mr. ANTHONY. I had special reference to the age restriction. The purpose of that is to prevent these appointments from overriding officers of longer service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. And we require the specific recommendation of this board of officers for appointments higher than that of the grade of captain. That is to safeguard these appointments.

Mr. CONNALLY. Absolutely.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will note, the board is to consist of three officers of the staff and three general officers of the line, and we thought that that was a board there that would be absolutely unimpeachable.

Mr. CONNALLY. He regards the board as absolutely unimpeachable. Is not the gentleman willing, then, to allow this board to make selections without surrounding it with these restrictions in making the selections?

Mr. ANTHONY. We thought it safe.

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman in one breath says he is willing to trust this unimpeachable board to select officers from civil life, and in the next breath proposes to hedge it about, so that the men on the outside have to pass Scylla on one side in respect to their commissions on the 11th of November, and if they get past Scylla they will have to pass Charybdis over on the other side. They provide that they can not be promoted to higher rank than captain unless they had been specifically recommended by some fellow already in the department. I want to tell you that they have already got the list of these higher-ups selected.

Mr. ANTHONY. Our idea in making that provision was, so that this board that we think unimpeachable could reach down and take a man that was selected and appoint him higher.

Mr. CONNALLY. To what?

Mr. ANTHONY. To a higher grade.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why did you restrict it so that he could not be promoted over the rank that he held on November 11, 1918?

Mr. ANTHONY. He can be appointed to a higher grade than captain if he held it?

Mr. CONNALLY. If he held it. He may have been discharged a short time after November 11 and gone back to his occupation in civil life, and under the terms of this bill as written by the gentleman from Kansas, you could not promote him above the grade he held on the 11th of November, but some little fellow down here in the Ordnance Corps or the Quartermaster Corps, that did not get out of a storehouse during the war, until after November 11, and was promoted thereafter, they could reach in and get him and put him where they want to put him, but could not appoint the former higher than captain unless he was specifically recommended by some specific fellow in some specific bureau in the War Department. If this board is so unimpeachable, if it is of a high character and possesses great knowledge, I am willing to let that board make these original appointments regardless of the fact of whether the officers held a certain rank back there on June 30, 1919, or not. What is the effect of this bill? It is to take care of those men already in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 26.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FRENCH: Page 28, line 15, after the word "section," strike out the balance of the line and everything down to and including the semicolon in line 19.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I have absolute respect for the committee in the shaping of this bill, but here is a provision which seems to me is very unhappily placed. The only way, I suppose, or the best way, that we can consider phrases of this kind is to see how they are going to work out when they shall be applied. Under the language of the bill no person below the age of 48 may be appointed to the grade of colonel, below the age of 45 to the grade of lieutenant colonel, or below the age of 36 to the grade of major. In the first part of this section the War Department is given, apparently, generous authority in the matter of making appointments from outside of the War Department. But we then have inserted in the section certain provisions which go far to nullify the very generous provisions of the earlier part of the section, and here is one of those provisions. Let me cite you to the case, for instance, of a lieutenant colonel who may now be serving in the Judge Advocate General's office. This man was a member, say, of the National Guard of his State. He went overseas. He is under the age limit prescribed in this section, in the language I moved to strike out. He served with his command at the front. He was overseas for the entire period of the war. He retired and was appointed to a commission, say, that of a lieutenant colonel, but by reason of the fact that he is below the age specified in the language I move to strike out he will be legislated out of his commission with the passage of this bill.

Let me call your attention to another case. Here is a major who, let us say, served overseas during the entire war who attained a captaincy who, when the armistice was signed, returned home and was commissioned in the rank of major in the Judge Advocate General's office. Because this officer is not yet 36 years of age, although he is now in the Judge Advocate General's office and has been there for a year and a half and is a brilliant lawyer and has had wide experience in private practice, as an officer at the front and in the department where he is now serving, yet because he has not attained the age of 36 he shall not be eligible to be chosen for further service under the rank he has earned.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. I said before I would not want to discriminate against any of the officers whom the gentleman mentioned awhile ago and whom he is mentioning now; but does not the gentleman realize that this has been worked out on the basis of the length of time it takes an officer in the Regular Army to reach these grades? And does not the gentleman realize that it is evidently unfair to take a man from the outside at the age of 40 and put him in a higher grade than that which the man in the Regular Establishment could possibly have attained at the age of 40? In other words, in the Judge Advocate General's office there may be Regular officers who are, by reason of their length of service, only captains, and yet the provision would mean that men from the outside could come in of the same age and outrank them. This thing has been worked out on that basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. In reply to the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO], I would say that I recognize that in the shaping of a bill like this you must take just such things as he has suggested into consideration. But that is not the only element to be considered. There are other elements that must be taken into consideration. Here is a bill under which you would have it in your power to take a man who has passed the age of 36, who has never seen one day of service in the Judge Advocate General's office, who has never been a successful practitioner at the bar, but because he can qualify as of the age of 36 he may be placed in the very position held by this man who for a year and a half has been a successful officer in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

Which, then, is more consistent to adhere to, the eye-for-an-eye and the tooth-for-a-tooth policy of grading everybody on the basis of age or to qualify that policy by adopting what seems to me to be a more practical policy and say that a man shall be measured by his worth instead of by his age and that he shall serve on or be demoted upon the basis of fitness and ability?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman has stated a hypothesis. He infers because the age limit is given there, that that will be the reason why this other man will be appointed.

Mr. FRENCH. No; I do not give it as the reason. But notwithstanding the fact that he may not have had a day's experience in the judge advocate's office or a year's experience as an attorney, he would still be qualified.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. He could not qualify unless he passed a board that found that his professional fitness was equal to his age. The age is only a mark on the thermometer to register one part of it.

Mr. FRENCH. In part it is; yet the man who has had the experience that I have described would be a far abler man to discharge the duties that the gentleman suggests.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I know; but this is the situation: We are trying to get away for the first time from all these irregularities that have hitherto made the law a great chapter of exceptions, but which was still called a law. Now, we are going to start out anew and grade these people so that hereafter we shall have a continuous and a consistent and a sequential list instead of its being all daubed up with exceptions. The gentleman is adding an exception here at the very time when we are trying to get rid of exceptions.

Mr. FRENCH. It seems to me, on the contrary, I am trying to eliminate an exception. You have put in here an age limit that would disbar men in the service who, when the war broke out, went overseas and then, having returned home, attained responsibility in the Judge Advocate General's office of major or lieutenant colonel or colonel, but by virtue of the fact that they may not be of the particular age to qualify as major or lieutenant colonel or colonel must be demoted.

Let me make another parallel. The age question has been suggested as one parallel. Let me make another. Suppose one of these hypothetical officers that the gentleman from Vermont suggests could have entered the Judge Advocate General's office early in the war and had not gone overseas at all. Then his age would not be a bar.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No. The question of going overseas has no relation to this. The question is whether or not, if he is in the temporary force when for his advantage in life he thinks he wants to go into the permanent force, you would place him on an equality with the men who went into the Army when young and not as a matter of second thought?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has again expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] is a very dangerous one, and it would be very harmful to the Army if adopted. The age limit prescribed in the act is founded on the average number of years that it takes an officer to reach that rank. It would be obviously unfair to take men from outside of the Army and transfer them into the Army at ranks vastly higher than those of men of much longer service in the Regular Establishment.

The gentleman from Idaho must know that after the Civil War, when the Army was reduced from 1,000,000 men to 25,000, there were officers who had held the grades of general and colonel, who took commissions as low as first lieutenants in the Regular Establishment.

After the Spanish War, when we again reduced the size of our Army, officers who held commissions as captains and majors accepted commissions as lieutenants. And now when we are reducing the Army from 5,000,000 to 300,000, it would be obviously impossible to take care of all of the temporary officers and take them into the regular service at the rank they held in the Army of 5,000,000 men. There must be some effort made to harmonize the rank of those men with the rank of men of long years of service in the Regular Establishment.

I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. FRENCH. Would not the general board harmonize this age question as to all new officers going in?

Mr. ANTHONY. The very purpose of the act is to harmonize age with rank in the provision for this single list.

Mr. FRENCH. You could leave that to the discretion of the board.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we did that, we would have to arbitrarily reduce the rank of your man after we appointed him.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I understand the purpose of the language in the bill is to fix a limitation on the age, in order that men appointed from civil life shall not be appointed to ranks higher than those of men who have served for many years in the Army. I think that propositon is fair, except for this: During an emergency that might arise we should find ourselves in a situation where perhaps the best man in the Army could not be appointed to a high rank. If this statute had been the law during the Revolutionary War, the father of our country, Gen. Washington, could never have been appointed general of the Army, because he was appointed at the age of 43. Under a law like this Wellington could not have been appointed a colonel at 27; and while the purpose of this language is meritorious, in that it intends to prevent the friction that has heretofore arisen and injured the morale of the Army, I think it ought to be amended to apply to peace times.

If an emergency should arise, the War Department would be confronted with legislation which Congress has put upon the statute books, which legislation the War Department could not change, and under its restrictions we could not call even the very best man to the command of our troops.

Mr. CRAGO. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this restriction applies only to filling the vacancies created by this particular act, and in the case of any emergency, of course, it would be entirely proper to go outside, and this would not apply.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am glad to have the gentleman explain that situation, because if this legislation were of general application, then some of the men who made the most illustrious commanders in years gone by would have been barred from holding high positions, and we all know that some of the greatest and brightest geniuses in military affairs have been young men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I want to ask a question of the committee. Under the qualifications that have been placed here, a colonel must be 48 years of age, a lieutenant colonel 45, and a major 36. Now, during the late war there were a large number of National Guard regiments that reached the front and fought overseas. Among their officers were men who performed notable service in that conflict, who were cited for their distinguished conduct in action, and who showed marked proficiency in the handling of troops. I know of a particular instance. I do not know that the gentleman whom I have in mind has any desire to enter the regular service. I assume that he has not, but he commanded a Minnesota regiment in the Rainbow Division. This colonel had the respect and confidence of every general officer under whom he served. Yet with his experience overseas, his actual handling of troops under fire, in command of an artillery regiment, with his years of experience and service in the National Guard, something like 20 years, during which time he rose from private to colonel in the National Guard, he would still be ineligible to hold a colonelcy unless he had attained the age of 48 years.

I have in mind other guard and reserve officers who served as majors with distinction who would likewise be ineligible for appointment to the grades they filled.

I can not favor the age restrictions.

Mr. ANTHONY. He could not hold a colonelcy in the Regular Army. But the gentleman understands that all the officers of the Regular Army who held advanced rank in the National Army—and nearly all of them did—have been or will be arbitrarily reduced to their proper grade in the Regular Army, and the gentleman would not think it fair for the officer whom the gentleman has in mind to be given an advantage over these officers of the Regular Establishment who are arbitrarily reduced in the manner I have indicated. He ought to be subjected to the same limitations which they are.

Mr. CRAGO. He ought to be able to do that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think they all recognize that fact and will be glad to accept it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But there are men in the regular service who have at least the rank of colonel who have not attained the age of 48 years.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very few.

Mr. CRAGO. Temporary rank.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I only know of one particular instance, but I have heard that there are others.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the gentleman will find that these ages are about the average ages corresponding to the attainment of these various ranks.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But it does not seem to me that there should be restrictions which would prevent this general board, in whom we ought to have a great deal of confidence, from promoting younger men, and it would be my idea that this could be bettered by reducing the ages four or five years.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that if we should do that it would go very far to destroy the morale of the officers of the Army, who would feel that their years of service had availed them nothing, if men were superimposed over them arbitrarily by law in this manner.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Well, but they would not be superimposed. They would merely become eligible, and then it would be up to the board as to whether or not they would be appointed to those positions.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 10, after the figures "1918," add the following: "except that a person who was in active service as an officer of the Army of the United States for a period of not less than two years between April 6, 1917, and the date of the passage of this act shall be eligible for appointment under this section, notwithstanding he is above the age of 54 years."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be no objection to this amendment. I have consulted several members—on both sides—of the Committee on Military Affairs, and there seems to be no opposition. This only provides that where a person actually served in the Army of the United States for two years between the dates mentioned he shall be eligible for appointment although above 54 years of age. It does seem to me that if a man has served two years when he made this sacrifice for his country he ought not to be debarred from eligibility because now he is over 54.

Take Dr. Mayo, the famous surgeon, who in volunteering his services sacrificed thousands of dollars a year during the war. He served over two years. He would be ineligible under the language of the bill. There are many men who served like him during the war. Evidently men of that kind ought to be eligible for appointment. Under my amendment the board would consider the qualifications of applicants, and if he was not qualified would turn him down. I hope no gentleman will object to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 16, after the word "him," insert the following: "Provided further, That the President may, in his discretion, with the approval of such board, select civilians and commission them to fill any vacancies in the Quartermaster Corps, regardless of whether such civilians have had military experience."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I realize the necessity in the ordinary branches of the Army to have men of military experience for officers, but in the Quartermaster Corps the situation is entirely different. It is primarily a business man's department. We proved by our experience in the war just finished that men could be found in the business world who were better equipped for conducting the business affairs, even of the Army, than those who have been in the Army from the beginning and have not had a business experience. According to the testimony of Army officers themselves these business men were invaluable in this, the business department of the Army.

The principal effect of the Army from a business view is not to produce but to consume. The average Army officer who is in the Quartermaster Corps has unlimited access to the till of the Treasury, which he can tap at any time. He has not had business experience. I do not say it in criticism of the Army officers who, by virtue of the fact that they have not been educated in the competition of the business world, but perhaps entered the service early in life, do not know as much about business dealings as men who are civilians.

I simply provide in my amendment that the vacancies may be filled in this manner by the approval of the board. Such a system would leave enough of the trained Army officers in the Quartermaster Corps to have the necessary functions performed by those who must be familiar with the work of the Army, and yet link with them some good business men selected from the business world, who could perform the business functions of the Army.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. Does not the gentleman know that is already a provision of existing law?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under the terms of this bill a man can go in in the low rank as a second lieutenant, but in order to get a civilian into the Army he must be one who served between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. Why should the selection be so limited? Why should not the Government be left free to choose the best available men?

Mr. CRAGO. There is a provision in the national-defense act which provides for the appointment of civilians, and that is not repealed by this act.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is true, but we are now enacting a new law, and most assuredly we should embody provisions that will reflect experience which we have gained while operating under the national-defense act.

Mr. CRAGO. That is not necessary.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Could you appoint a colonel, a major, or a general in the Quartermaster Corps who did not serve between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918?

Mr. CRAGO. We did it repeatedly during the war.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; during the war, but under the terms of this bill, and by virtue of its provisions, every man is placed on the list. It would be impossible to appoint a man to a high place. In fact, you could not appoint a man to higher rank than second lieutenant, and he would not be entitled to promotion for years. Under such circumstances you could not secure a business man of any consequence. Military training is not necessary to the conduct of business. When you go to buy groceries you do not march up and salute the grocer. You do not order "squads east" or "squads west" when you march into the supply houses of this country. This is a business man's department, and it ought to be headed by a business man.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman's amendment is safeguarded by the provision that the appointee must be recommended by the board.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; he must have the approval of the board. I think it is safeguarded in every possible way, but it would take out of politics the situation, because the board must approve the man, and you could get a man appointed in that way.

I think this amendment is all important. The Army is an expensive piece of machinery—necessarily so. But we should eliminate all the waste possible in order to economize in the affairs of government. This amendment makes it possible for the President to draw into the Quartermaster Corps at any rank men of commercial experience; men who know how to make the debit and credit sides of the ledger tally; men who are accustomed to figuring the cost of an article before arranging for its purchase; men who know the game of business and how to make a success of it—men, therefore, who will safeguard the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 28, line 16, after the word "of," strike out "forty-eight" and insert "forty-two"; and after the word "of," in line 17, strike out "forty-five" and insert "thirty-eight"; and after the word "of," in line 18, strike out "thirty-six" and insert "thirty."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, under the terms of this bill the appointment of any of these 7,000 officers—one-half of which shall come from outside of the Regular Establishment—is vested in the board that is mentioned in the section. The bill, as has been stated here, places certain restrictions upon the appointing power of this board. By reason of these restrictions certain National Guard officers who showed the most efficient service in the field, who had the respect of their general officers in every way, could not be appointed to any of the positions that they held overseas unless they happened to be over the ages mentioned. I recognize that there is need for some sort of uniformity of age, but it would seem to me that if we are going to recognize at all those who went into the National Guard as young men years ago and rose up to positions of authority and made good overseas we ought not to place the age limit so high that regardless of ability they could not be appointed to those positions if the board thought that in other ways they were in all respects qualified.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman also agree, carrying out the philosophy of his suggestion, that the young men and the older men in the Regular Army to-day who find themselves within the ages that he prescribes for the temporaries to come in shall be advanced in their grades right over the heads of everybody else, so that they will have a rank on equality with those new men he wants to bring in?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not believe that is at all analogous.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, yes. These men have been putting in anywhere from 8 to 10 to 15 to 20 to 30 or 40 years of experience, and they have not got the grades indicated there for a less number of years, and the gentleman wants to bring in the new men with 2 years or 18 months' experience and put them over these men. If you are going to do that, why not put these men up to the grade of the temporaries?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But I do not want to take the men of one or two years' experience and place them over the heads of these other men of 15 or 20 years' experience.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What I want to do is to make possible the use of the exceptional material that has been developed in the guard by 15 to 25 years of experience. If this amendment is adopted, then this board will be able to recognize this service; otherwise, not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Agreed. I respect that service highly. I think those men are deserving of coming into the Regular Army, but if you give them the advantage of that service in these years, then give the Regular who has had the same years of service equal advantage with them; but that you do not do.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. He has not had that rank.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Why? Because it takes longer on the lineal list of the Regular Army to get a grade and rank, because it takes years and years and years by seniority; but you would put your hand on the temporary officer and promote him arbitrarily.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There are men in the regular service with the permanent rank of colonel who have not reached the ages mentioned in the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. How many?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I do not know, but there are some; and if there are some in the regular service you ought not to object to this board, in which you have confidence, taking exceptionally qualified men from out of the National Guard and placing them in the regular service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman ought to specify more particularly his evidence. I would like to know the instances.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Of those holding the rank?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. There are some, but not many.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 7, after the word "person," insert "below the age of 54 years"; and on line 8 strike out down to and including the word "years."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I presume the chairman of the committee will agree to this amendment. I think the language will come better after the word "persons" than after the words "Regular Army," because the way the language reads it is somewhat difficult to say whether the language "below the age of 54 years" refers to officers in the Regular Army or to persons. If the amendment is agreed to, it would read—all persons below the age of 54 years, other than officers of the Regular Army.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think that is correct.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman wishes to transpose the language?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PELL: Page 29, line 16, after the word "experience," in the amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "and in the same manner he may appoint officers to the Construction and Engineer Corps."

Mr. McKENZIE and Mr. CALDWELL. May we have the amendment again reported?

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I will not waste the time of the committee in discussing this to any extent. It merely adds the construction corps and the Engineer Corps to the Jones amendment. I offer this amendment because the training of the ordinary Army officer is not particularly directed toward the activities of those two corps, and it seems to me that a very good class of men can be gotten from the outside. All the argument which Mr. JONES gave for his amendment will apply in this case.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, lines 9, 10, and 11, strike out the words "without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list of their own branches, but otherwise as nearly as practicable."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee——

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, this is perhaps the most important amendment we will have, and there is a good deal of difference of opinion in reference to it. There are only about 43 Members present. I think that we ought to have more Members, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not entitled to ask for tellers. Does the gentleman move that the committee do now rise?

Mr. KAHN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, on that I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. KAHN and Mr. SEARS) reported that there were—ayes 5, noes 100.

So the committee refused to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of considerable interest, and it will be impossible intelligently to present my views on the matter in five minutes, and I ask the courtesy of the committee that I may be given permission to address the committee for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to speak for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, possibly some Members of the committee were absent from the Chamber when the amendment which I offered was read, and in order that the membership of the committee may have an intelligent idea of the amendment which has been proposed, if you will kindly refer to page 31 of the pending bill, in lines 9, 10, and 11, my amendment proposes to strike out the language, "Without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list of their own branches, but otherwise as nearly as practicable." So that if my amendment is adopted the language will read as follows, that in making up this list it "shall be arranged according to length of commissioned service," and so forth.

Now, gentlemen, this question of rank, as I undertook to point out in my few remarks in general debate on this bill, ever since the Civil War, and possibly before that time, has been one of acute controversy in the Army of the United States. For a number of years promotions were made by regiments. Afterwards, seeking to correct the injustices which were brought about by that system which discriminated against officers of equal capacity upon the lineal list, the policy was adopted of making promotions according to the branch of the service, Cavalry, Infantry, and so forth, and that system has given a great deal of dissatisfaction, and it resulted in great inequality, as is now very candidly admitted by the Committee on Military Affairs after a very exhaustive and, I have no doubt, full consideration of this vexed question of promotion. While they are attempting to frame a permanent law for the reorganization of the Army, including a permanent system of promotion, the committee has deliberately come to the conclusion that the only just, equitable, and sound method of arranging this matter is to base promotions upon the principle of the length of active commissioned service. Now, the language of the bill provides, if you will refer to section 24 (a), where it says:

For the purpose of establishing a more uniform system for the promotion of officers, based on equity, merit, and the interests of the Army as a whole, the Secretary of War shall cause to be prepared a promotion list, on which shall be carried the names of all officers of the Regular Army.

Now the committee announces that as a principle and a basic principle upon which promotions hereafter in the Army shall be based; and I agree absolutely with the conclusion and with that principle and policy, because with any other system you are bound to incur favoritism, prejudice, and the personal equation in reference to making promotions, and all sorts of undesirable things. But my objection, gentlemen, to the language of the bill is that although it announces in favor of that principle as a just principle, in a subsequent provision of the section they undertake to set up a series of departures from that principle which absolutely nullifies and emasculates the principle itself, as I will endeavor to show you. Now, if they had been content to follow that principle as announced there could not have been any objection, but when we get over to the proposition of the details of arranging the list they say that officers filling the grade of colonel in the Dental Corps and all the other corps shall be appointed, not according to the total of their active commissioned service in the Army, but that they shall be arranged "without changing the present order of officers on the lineal list of their own branches, but otherwise as nearly as practicable." Now what is the result of that language, gentlemen?

It simply perpetuates this system of injustice and inequality of giving men promotion according to their present standing on the lineal list of their own branches, and disregards this basic element they refer to here as a correct principle, based on equity and merit of the Army as a whole. They disregard that principle, and leave the inequalities of the old system just as they are. Now, the purpose of my amendment in its practical application, if adopted, will only refer to one large class of Army officers as a whole, and that is the volunteer officers of the Spanish-American War service. That seems like a good long time ago viewed from the standpoint of this great World War through which we have gone; it was simply a minor engagement. It did not test the military or economic strength of our Republic, but it did test in a large measure the patriotism of the young manhood of America at that time, and when volunteers were called for a number of our gallant young men from all over the United States volunteered as officers and engaged in that service. They endured the hardships of the Tropics, of the Philippines, of Cuba, the danger of yellow fever and other contagion and typhoid fever, in the hard service of the Volunteer Army. What I am seeking to correct here is that these Spanish-American volunteer officers, in making up this permanent promotion list, shall be given credit and nothing but credit for their active commissioned services with the volunteers of the United States Army. That is the basic proposition involved in my amendment.

Now, gentlemen, to show you how the committee have further departed from that principle, in addition to leaving all those officers on the lineal lists of their own branches as now arranged, to the detriment of the volunteer officers' class I have just referred to, they set out a number of other specific exceptions to the principle they are seeking to establish. I call your attention to the following classes of officers that they say shall be excepted from the operation of the principle upon which they themselves rely as a just and equitable principle.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If the gentleman will permit right there, does the gentleman know what the policy of the War Department was when this particular lineal list was made into law that we are now seeking to revise? Did they sort of redistribute the commissions?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They were supposed to be arranged according to the length of service and according to the branch of service under the then existing system. In 1901 an effort was made to correct this situation, but, unfortunately for the carrying out of the purposes of that law, there was a joker in it, under the construction of which by the War Department it deprived these Spanish-American War volunteer officers from receiving the actual benefit of their service, and that construction was based on this proposition: That act provided, seeking to correct this injustice at that time, that they should be placed upon these lineal lists upon the basis of their length of prior commissioned service, and the act went on to state further that no person appointed under the provisions of that section should be placed above another in the same grade with another commissioned service, and that nothing therein contained should change the comparative rank of officers heretofore commissioned in the Regular Army. And that provision of that bill, under the construction of the War Department, placed a number of men in as "blocks," to use that term, that prevented these men from receiving the benefits to which they were entitled; and that provision exists to this good hour.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman please state from what law he was reading?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was quoting from the law of February 2, 1901.

They set out that the following officers shall not be subject to this rule; in other words, they place them over in a favorite section. They say that the following list of men shall not be regulated by their present standing on the lineal list, but that they shall be omitted from it:

Officers who as a result of voluntary transfer occupy positions on the lineal list other than those they would have held if their original commissions had been in the Regular branch.

Men, who because of their own convenience or their own caprice, sought voluntary transfers, they say, shall constitute a favorite class.

Officers of other branches appointed in the Field Artillery or the Coast Artillery to fill vacancies created by the act approved January 25, 1907; officers appointed in the Regular Army since January 1, 1903, while serving as officers of the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry or Philippine Scouts shall be exempted from the provisions of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Here is another favored class which they create as an exception:

Former officers of the Regular Army or Philippine Scouts who have been reappointed in these forces and who are now below normally placed officers of less commissioned service than theirs.

And what is the answer, gentlemen of the committee, of the advocates and proponents of the bill as it is written with these exceptions? Their answer is absolutely not one of argument or of logic, but one of expediency, pure and simple, an ad hominem argument, if you please, to create as little dissatisfaction in the Army as possible. Their argument is that these men in this advanced rank, with numbers on the lineal list to which they are not entitled, would be dissatisfied if this order were changed. Of course, that would be perfectly natural.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this bill prevent the President from taking a captain and making a brigadier general out of him?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you think it will hold water?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope so. I am seeking by this amendment to place every officer of the Army of the United States, when this list is to be made, upon the same basis, without favoritism or partiality and without the influence of any clique or class anywhere along the line. As I said, the answer is not to the logic of my position, not to the justice of it, but they say it has been so long recognized that we ought now, although 19 or 20 years have passed and although we have an opportunity here fairly and fully presented, to place these volunteer officers in their rank on their lineal standing on the list; we ought not to do it because it would dissatisfy these gentlemen who have for 20 years enjoyed the preference to which they are not entitled.

Gentlemen, I am appealing for the men who have been discriminated against; the men who, in the day of the Nation's peril, volunteered and went into this hard service; and I ask you to correct now, by this amendment, this injustice which has been done, so that they can be entitled, on this permanent promotion lineal list, to the position they ought to occupy, based upon the principle which the committee itself announces as the correct principle. It is as little, I think, as we can do in justice to them, and it will not demote a single officer in any grade on the personnel list of the Army; not one. According to the testimony of Col. Spaulding before the committee, that is very frankly admitted. The only effect of it will be, possibly, in some cases to reverse the lineal rank or number of an officer in that particular grade. Col. Spaulding made the argument that it only made a difference of a few months in the promotion. I do not agree with him in that. In some cases it will make a difference of several years in the promotion from one rank to another.

What I want to do in my amendment is to work absolute and impartial justice to all the officers of the Army of the United States. Col. Spaulding, in making a defense of these exceptions, which he admits vitiates the principle, says "these men who lost by it would naturally be displeased. Somebody would suffer. I frankly admit it." But here these officers of the Spanish-American War have been suffering for 20 years in the matter of pay, promotion, honor, rank, responsibilities, and everything that goes to make up the ambition of an officer of the Army of the United States, and here is a fair and reasonable opportunity to do justice to them, and I trust that this committee will adopt my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont is recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to oppose the amendment of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], for reasons that appeal to all of us in our pleasant fraternal association here, but I am trying to stand for a principle, and I hope I may be persuaded not to yield to his enticing arguments while I do it.

The fact is that we have got to start somewhere with a basis, perhaps not absolutely perfect, but a basis that will work the greatest good to the greatest number. If anybody were to attempt to go back on the lineal list of the Army to cover the records of all living men and accurately and mathematically and microscopically adjust every bit of the differences of service between them or the question of merit and other things that would arrange them in an absolutely precise line of rank, the job never could be finished. We all know that. Now, we are trying to start in this thing on such a safe, general conclusion that, while it may seem occasionally not to do exact justice to every individual, yet we may be quite certain that it approximates the greatest good to the greatest number, and, once in operation, will, in obedience to that principle, only line men up at the end of this list so that hereafter the very things that the gentleman complains of are not likely, we hope, to happen again.

Therefore we must start with a compromise. Let us see on what we found the compromise, so far as the case the gentleman makes out is concerned. And let me say, by way of parentheses, that I have felt, too, an instinctive sympathy with him and for the officers to whom he alludes, because 22 years ago I, too, was a volunteer officer in the War with Spain. My own sense of comradeship and fraternity naturally goes out to those men. At the same time, now that the uniform is off, and when the pleasant recollections of 22 years ago are fading into the retrospect, I find myself in a new situation. No longer a soldier obeying orders, I am now a lawmaker, charged with the responsibility of doing my part in the care of the soldiers of to-day and the prospective soldiers of to-morrow, and I must yield to something besides sentiment when I decide my responsibility on that basis.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman still had on the uniform of one of those officers, how would the gentleman feel about the abstract justice of his proposition?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am going to get to that now.

If these men have been consciously wronged I could see why, even at this late date, there might perhaps be a reason which even expediency could not waive why we should undertake to right the wrong. But in addition to what the gentleman from Alabama has told you, these also are the facts: When it was decided to take candidates from the volunteer officers of the Spanish-American War into the United States Regular Establishment they were notified upon what conditions they could enter the service. At that time the service was comparatively limited in number. At that time none of the subsequent arrangements and careful adjustments between the volunteer troops and the National Guard troops and the troops of the Regular Establishment had been written into the law. It was a more or less nebulous atmosphere, so far as the military organization was concerned. But at that time it was finally agreed that the class of entries into the Regular Establishment should be divided between the grades of second and first lieutenant, not on length of service but on age, and every man who went into the Army at that time knew exactly the conditions upon which he forsook his civil status and began to be a soldier in the Army. He knew it. He was informed of it, and it was upon his own motion and responsibility that he accepted that condition and entered upon a prospective career of perhaps 40 years.

Now, I think it would be held, in all respect to our good friend, that the United States Government does not insure men against mistakes of judgment they may have made 20 years ago. I do not believe we can afford to think that, however much our sentiment or our natural sympathies may operate, we can go back and correct errors of judgment made by men, however lofty their intention, or however noble their motive that inspired them to go into the service at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Now, then, it is true—and here is a peculiar thing about it—it is true, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has suggested, that if this amendment of his has the effect of law eventually it will reverse men in their files in the Army.

I ask you to conceive of this as a practical proposition in an institution that has to be so completely organized and disciplined as an army. On June 30 of this year there lie down to sleep in one tent two men who for 20 years have held the relation to one another of commander and subordinate. When the morning sun awakens them on July 1 they change places. I wonder just what effect that would have.

If I may be permitted to make the suggestion, many of the men who are in this same class of volunteer officers of the War with Spain, who came into the Army under the conditions I have suggested and who are now subordinate to these men, but by the amendment of the gentleman from Albama would be made their superiors, have made it known in various ways, proper under the circumstances, that they are perfectly willing to let the record stand as it is, because they think it would do more to demoralize their relations in the Army than it would do good to make the change. These are men who would profit by the change. Of course, you should accept that testimony for what it is worth, because I tell you beforehand that it is the opinion of these men, but it is an admission against interest, and you lawyer minds will understand the value of that.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BEE. Does the gentleman know about how many officers would be affected?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I think the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] can tell the gentleman about that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Three or four hundred, or probably more, would be affected in the promotions.

Mr. BEE. In the file number, not in the rank.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There would be three or four hundred reversed.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes. The gentleman has suggested that the omissions enumerated on pages 31 and 32, which are here lettered as (a), (b), (c), and (d) are exceptions to the principle we laid down of having seniority of service determine the relation in the lineal list hereafter. That is in a sense true, but it has this significance: These exceptions, so called, are not exceptions made by the choice of the men in their original entrance into the Army, but they are exceptions brought about by the operation of law, and if each one of these cases is tested, I think gentlemen will satisfy themselves that these exceptions enumerated here are events which took place to a large degree, in most instances events which took place after the man had come into the Army, and that changed his original status. That can not be put alongside the conditions upon which the man accepted his right to come into the Army in the first place, as an exception, and I think that ought to have a great deal of bearing upon this question. For instance, when these officers as the result of voluntary transfer got a lower grade, that was under the operation of law, because there was then no single list upon which record could be compared with record and exchanges made as is provided in this bill. It is inevitable that, it being physically impossible for two bodies to occupy the same place at the same time, any exchange made, even in the interest of the service and for the benefit of the service, would mean that one of the men would have to be subordinate to the other. This simply tries to give these men the equalized rank where they were when they entered the Army. If you will test these other so-called exceptions down all through, you will find that they respond more or less to the same principle. Take the matter of the Coast Artillery and the Field Artillery Corps. You will remember that after those officers entered the corps these services were separated. You will find, again, that the operation of law comes in to make necessary these exceptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE] challenged attention to certain admissions against interest made by some of these gentlemen, but he has done the same thing himself. He says he wants to be fair. Well, if he does, he is committed to the Bankhead amendment. This amendment simply provides that the law which you undertake to enact shall reach everybody. You are undertaking to make a law which says that the men shall hold rank in file according to their position in the Army, their lineal rank, and this exception is made. But if the rule is a good rule, it should be adhered to. If it is not a good rule, it should not be adopted. It is just as fair for one as it is for another. Now, it appears that a lot of gentlemen who served in the Spanish War and did some fighting for their country managed to get commissions after that war. It appears that as a result of the methods adopted by the department a lot of people who would not ordinarily precede them now precede them and have a higher place in the file, a higher rating than other men who have been commissioned longer than they. You are proposing to enact a law that hereafter everybody shall hold according to the time he was commissioned. Now, here are a bunch of fellows who say, "Here, begin with us. We want to be put in that position along with everybody else." The gentleman suggests that what he wants is some place to begin.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Kansas answer a question?

Mr. LITTLE. Wait until I finish my statement. When you are making your law which is hereafter to establish the rule, why not clean up this bunch of fighting men who got the worst of it? That is as good a place to begin as any. I notice that when they come to the Spanish War men the Staff can always interpret it to mean that it does not include them. You know the old story of the white man and the Indian, the turkey and the buzzard, who should get the turkey and who should get the buzzard. The white man said, "Why, you take the buzzard and I will take the turkey, or I will take the turkey and you take the buzzard." You say to these men, "Now, we are going to have this thing in regular order as men are commissioned, but not in your case." It seems to me this is a good time to correct that mistake and that injustice, and let us apply the rule generally.

Mr. BEE. Let me ask the gentleman this question. I believe if I am capable in that respect I do not want to do injustice between the officers of the volunteer forces in the Spanish-American War and those who were in the Regular Army; but let me hear from the gentleman on this question: Ought it not to have been done at that time?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. BEE. And is there not this trouble, 20 years afterwards or more, that instead of doing justice in all things the result will be to do injustice to those who were in the service and who will be affected by it?

Mr. LITTLE. Oh, no; if you do not correct it now you never will, but the question is where to begin. Three hundred years ago on the border between England and Scotland they fought all the time for 300 years. They fought and they drove off cattle. The King of Scotland sent down word, "We are going to hold court in Dumfries and everybody must come before that court." John Little said, "That is fine; that is just the way to do it, but I have an affair I must first adjust with the Johnston clan; they killed my cousin and drove off my cows, and we will even up and then go to law in the future." And before they held court he got his cows, killed a Johnston, burned a house, and "harried a hirsel." "Now," he said, "let law and order reign; I am willing to go to court after this."

Of course, he was wrong, and possibly ought to have been hung, although they never did get to hang him. [Laughter.]

That is the instinct of human nature everywhere. It is right and proper before you begin a new deal that you should square up the old one. Here is a bunch of fighting men who got the worst of it, and now this is their last chance to have a place in here in which the law will place everybody else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Kansas have two minutes more; I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kansas be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think the gentleman from Kansas is laboring under a misapprehension of the facts.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope so, and I would be glad to be shown that I am wrong.

Mr. McKENZIE. This is not a case where the Regular Army officers are trying to outrank the men who came in after the Spanish-American War. It is a difference between the men who got the grade of first lieutenants and those who got the grade of second lieutenants, and some men who got in after the Spanish-American War. It is not any fight on the part of the Regular Army officers against a certain class of men.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the difference; the justice would be the same? All I have to say about this is that these fellows who in the Spanish-American War came and said these things, and I think they ought to know whether their fingers have been pinched better than the gentleman does.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If we establish a new principle in this bill, the promotion to general officer will be made from the grade of colonel alone. That is a new principle, and in order to be consistent we must have an exception written in the bill, according to the gentleman's argument, to take care of all the men who have heretofore got up to the grade of colonel, but did not get the grade of general officer. In other words, we must go back and correct all the mistakes.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman thinks because they are adopting a new principle that thereby they can safely do an injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment, but I want to ask the gentleman from Alabama for some information. It is very difficult for the average man in the House to determine where he ought to leave off on any of these men—these men affected by your amendment, I understand, came into the service during the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They were volunteer officers for that service and afterwards came into the United States Army.

Mr. BEE. As Regular officers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. With what rank did they come into the Army as Regular officers?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Some as first lieutenants and some as second lieutenants.

Mr. BEE. Those who came in as first lieutenants came in from West Point in 1900 and 1901?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Exceptions were made to West Point graduates; they came in ahead.

Mr. BEE. Will the effect of this be to demote in the line the West Point graduates who came ahead?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely not; there will not be the demotion of any officer.

Mr. BEE. I do not mean in office, but I mean in relative length of service and rank. I mean with reference to those West Point graduates who by operation of law were placed ahead.

Mr. BANKHEAD. These men from West Point who came in after the passage of the act of February 2, 1901, will not be affected by the provision of this amendment.

Mr. BEE. Who will be affected?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Only the officers who came in from civil life since the Spanish-American War.

Mr. BEE. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Here is a man who went in as a volunteer in the Spanish-American War. Here is a man who after the war came in from civil life. Is it possible that preference was given to the man that came in from civil life over the volunteer in the Spanish-American War?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is absolutely true, and that is what is intended to be corrected by my amendment.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman says that under his amendment the West Point graduate is not affected and the Regular Army officer is not affected.

But it becomes a question between the volunteer officer in the Spanish-American War and the officer who came into the Army after the war from civil life. It occurs to me that if that is the case, the man who volunteered in the Spanish-American War ought to have the preference over the officer, I care not who he is, for I know none of them, who came in from civil life afterwards, but I do not think that ought to be the rule under the law against the West Point graduate or the Regular Army officer.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But upon what evidence does the gentleman base his suggestion that the only people who will be dispossessed by this will be men from civil life?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not say they are the only ones. I said in a large number of cases people appointed from civil life do rank those who had former service.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BEE. That ought to be stopped if that is the case.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It will be with this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But it does not affect these particular individuals.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But in order to do that you would have to go over the records of 10,000 officers, to see whether any man at any time who was taken in as a civilian ever marched in a Memorial Day parade.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But you have to go back over that same list to make up the list provided for by this bill.

Mr. BEE. Is it admitted that it will not affect the graduate of West Point?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman says so. I do not know how you would make the comparison of one man with another on the list until the list is made up, and that is why we are trying to cling here to a principle and not individual instances.

Mr. BEE. Because, as I understand it, the West Point graduate bases his service in the Army from the time he entered the academy.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; he does not. He does not get continuous service.

Mr. BEE. I mean for a retirement basis.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That has been cut off.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that the gentleman thinks it is all right to permit a West Pointer, who was never in a fight in his life, to outrank a man who holds an older commission in the Army, who has done some fighting?

Mr. BEE. Not at all; but I will say to the gentleman that the reason I made that statement is that I understand that it is existing law, and has been the law, and I see the danger to those men who have gone for 20 years under that belief in having that law expire.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 19, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, line 19, after the word "hereafter," add: "Provided, That the board may place upon such promotion list a limited number of such officers holding temporary commissions who have demonstrated their special fitness and qualifications for such commissions next below the Regular Army officers senior in age to such temporary officers.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the time of the House to discuss this amendment. I simply wish to say that this provides that the board of Regular Army officers provided in this bill shall be permitted to recommend for a position on the lineal list for promotion a limited number of expert civilians in the various staff corps according to age rather than service. If they have an excellent man, for instance, in the Ordnance or in the Quartermaster Department, or in the Signal Corps, they can not give him grade, but they can place him next below the Regular Army officer senior to him in age. I believe it will not injure the Military Establishment, but will do it good, and will not affect to any great extent the men in the Regular Establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 16, strike out the word "other" and insert the word "lower."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the committee has adopted a wise plan in establishing one single list of promotions. I believe the only practical way of putting that doctrine into effect is to start exactly where we are to-day; in other words, not to disturb any officer's position on the list of officers as it now stands, but henceforth make promotions from the single list. But I want to call the committee's attention to the fact that in making up the single list the committee has made a number of exceptions. On page 31 it will be noted in line 3 that the committee lays down the rule that in the branches named there the officers shall occupy the relative positions they now occupy with these exceptions.

Section (a), if I may have the attention of the committee, says:

Officers who, as the result of voluntary transfer, occupy positions on the lineal list other than those they would have held if their original commissions had been in their present branches.

My amendment is to strike out the word "other" and insert in lieu thereof the word "lower." Now, I want to state to the committee what I have in mind. I want to do that for the reason I am perfectly willing if a man has been transferred, say, from the Infantry to the Coast Artillery, who thereby went down in the scale and list in relative rank, to give him the benefit of being placed now on the list where he would have been had he remained in the Infantry. That is what I want to do, and that is fair; but if you use the word "other" you say to a man transferred to some branch, and who by extra work received promotion in that branch, if you use the word "other," you demote him because you put him back where he would have been if he had stayed in the original branch of which he was a member. You remember we had no Air Service a few years ago. There was practically no Air Service. Numbers of officers transferred from the Infantry and Artillery and went into the Air Service. In order to do that, gentlemen, they had to take on increased risks, and they had to run the danger of losing their lives, they had to study, they had to work while the fellow who was still in the Infantry was spending his time around the Army and Navy Club. This man was working and trying to improve himself.

Now, when the Air Service was enlarged, a man received a higher rank than he would have had if he had still remained in the Infantry, and according to the present provisions of this bill you are jerking him out of his place in the Air Service and putting him back where he would have been had he not worked, if he had not risked his life, and if he had not secured the promotion which he secured by reason of the risks and labor incurred. Another instance I call to the attention of the committee. I will take a man who is in the Infantry. He is ambitious. He is smart. He sees that by studying law, for instance, and by securing a transfer to the Judge Advocate General's office he may perhaps secure more rapid promotion than by staying in the Infantry, where he was originally commissioned. He studies at night while the other fellows are playing pinochle. He studies law while the other fellow is out playing cricket. He studies and prepares himself by taking a law course while the other fellows are attending balls and receptions, and he gets into the Judge Advocate General's Corps. He was originally commissioned in the Infantry, but by his study and work he improved himself and secures promotion. I believe that that man ought to occupy his present rank that he has obtained and not, by the provisions of this bill, be jerked out of that rank and put back where he would have been had he remained in the Infantry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to call the attention of the committee to one very distinguished example with reference to the Judge Advocate General's Corps. He is not in the service now, so this does not affect him. Maj. Johnson was Gen. Crowder's first assistant in the Provost Marshal General's office, and he drew up all of these draft laws—was originally an officer in the Cavalry, I believe. I do not know whether it was Cavalry, Infantry, or Artillery; but, anyway, he was an officer, and he was ambitious; and he studied law and prepared himself, because he believed he would get a better chance for promotion.

He did so. He served under Gen. Crowder, and by virtue of the efficient service which he rendered he was finally promoted to successive grades until he became a brigadier general in the Eighth Division and was ordered overseas and was on his way overseas and on the sea when the armistice was signed. There are other instances of officers of that kind who, by their special fitness have received promotion, and unless you adopt my amendment striking out the word "other" and insert "lower" you will deprive them of the rank which they have earned.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. I agree with the gentleman there is a good deal of force in what he says with reference to officers applying themselves and getting a transfer for promotion. Then the gentleman referred to a pinochle player. Of course, I do not know what that is, but suppose during the war that some officer had become engaged in playing pinochle with an officer of a lower grade in a different branch of the service and because he enjoyed the game he would have him transferred to another service, to a higher grade. How about that?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think that occurred during the war. They did not play pinochle during the war. I want to give due credit to the Army. It is a wonderful organization. During war time it fights and during peace times it concerns itself principally with promotions, and that is what I am talking about now. During peace times it is studying promotions and during war time it fights, and I believe the word ought to be changed to "lower." I believe a man ought to have the rank he would have been entitled to had he remained in his old branch when higher than his present rank, and the man who has won promotion ought to be entitled to hold it, even though higher than he would have had but for his transfer to another branch.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PLATT: Page 28, line 3, strike out the words "not less than," and on line 5, strike out the word "shall" and insert the word "may."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, there have been a good many applications for appointment as officers in the Regular Army from men who served during the war as temporary officers, but this whole subject is likely to become rather academic than practical unless the pay of the officers is raised. A large number of these applications have already been withdrawn, so I am informed, and it seems to me if you leave the words "not less than one-half of the total number of vacancies" in here, it might not be possible to fill one-half from outside appointments.

Mr. McKENZIE. I will inform the gentleman that there are over 20,000 live applications now on file.

Mr. PLATT. I understand that many of them have been withdrawn, and that many which remain are not really live but are not formally withdrawn. At any rate, there have been 2,358 resignations of officers in the Regular Army, and unless something is done with regard to raising pay so that an officer in the Army can live, there will not be a tremendous effort to break in from anywhere.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. There was a bill reported increasing the pay of officers. Does the gentleman understand what has become of it?

Mr. PLATT. I understand that there was a bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which passed the House, and went to the Senate, and the Senate attached a provision to it which increased the pay of the Army, as well as the Navy and the Coast Guard Service.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand that the bill recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs has been hung up, and that the Rules Committee and the steering committee of the Republican Party refuse a rule for it.

Mr. PLATT. That might be true. I have no certain information on that point.

Mr. CRAGO. I am very glad to inform the gentleman, in connection with the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia, that it looks now as if we might have favorable action in a few days on some particular bill increasing the pay of the men of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. PLATT. I want to say just a word or two more. It is an actual fact that there are here in Washington some stenographers getting more than some of the officers, and it is common talk in the Army that many of the top sergeants say that they can not afford to take commissions as second lieutenants because they will not get as much pay out of it as they do as sergeants, with clothing and living expenses provided. There have been resignations from the Army of officers as high as colonels who can easily get more in civil employment than they can in the Army, and it is growing to be a rather serious question. Resignations are coming in every day.

Mr. LANGLEY. And I wish to say that the morale of the service is being seriously affected as the result of the conditions referred to by the gentleman from New York. I know of many cases where officers could easily get twice as much in private employment as they are getting now, and I think it is time that we were adopting some measure of relief, instead of carrying on this penny-wise and pound-foolish economy. We owe it to them to give liberal wages where they are deserved.

Mr. PLATT. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that, and I agree with him fully. It seems to me something has got to be done or we will not have any officers at all.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. And both gentlemen know that a great many men can make more than Members of Congress, and that many make less.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORES of Indiana offers the following amendment: Page 31, line 11, after the word "service," insert the words "including contract service for the Medical Corps and Dental Corps."

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer that amendment simply in the interest of clearness. I understand that such was the purport and intent of this bill as to construing this section, together with one on page 30 and another and later section. I believe that is what the bill means, and it ought to be clear and definite. For that reason I hope the committee will accept my amendment. I understand they will.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second amendment offered by Mr. MOORES of Indiana: Page 31, line 12, after the word "Corps," insert the words "and Dental Corps."

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I offer that so as to put the Medical and Dental Corps on an equality. If the committee desires that, I offer the amendment for that purpose.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Let it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit a question?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BEE. This amendment we adopted just before, in the part inserted after the word "service," does that apply to contract surgeons?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. The contract surgeons who accept commissions are credited with the time of their contract service, instead of their commissions.

Mr. BEE. And cease to become contract surgeons?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Now, you want to put the Dental Corps after the Medical Corps?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. On what ground does the gentleman associate the Dental Corps with the Medical Corps people in this preferential advantage at the start?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. That amendment was suggested to me because of the amazing difficulty at this time in getting candidates for the Dental Corps. I was told that the supply of dentists was inadequate, and that they were underpaid, and that they could not get men to accept commissions.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Of course, that brings up the same old proposition of the Military Establishment having to compete against the attractions of higher salaries, professional or occupational, in civil life.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And we have to concede at the start that we can not do it. Does it not seem to the gentleman that we have to set such a high standard for the men on the line, the men who have to take the risk of combat primarily and directly, so that they are now almost all university men, or the equivalent of that in point of education before they come in, that, considering that the line officers must start at second lieutenants, it is quite an unjust advantage to give to dentists over those men an allowance of five or six or seven years start?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. They are not in the same service. They simply get the benefit of two years' more time.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I understand what it means. It means that they will be promoted at the head of these men at a higher pay to begin with.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. But they do not shut any man out.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. They start in with higher pay. They have preferential quarters, and they always have that much advantage over the young man who has a serious ambition to enter the military service without that advantage at all. It carries light and quarters and allowances with it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Was not the grade or the rank before the war that of first lieutenant?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In the Dental Corps?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am reminded that it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois rises in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order, but upon a section of the bill that is to follow. I ask this privilege for the reason that it is apparent that I can not be here when this bill is passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on a section of the bill in which I have a deep interest I want to say that I represent no one but the constituency that sent me here and express only my own personal viewpoint. I have no desire to criticize the leadership of either side of this House in what I am about to say, but I do want to give to you and to my people back home my own convictions upon certain matters.

It has been intimated to me that I might with propriety wait for the national convention that convenes in Chicago to write the platform upon which my party shall appeal to the people of the United States. I find no fault with the chairman of the national committee for the appointment of the array of talent that he gave to the country some time ago to write a platform, but I do insist that a better platform can be written by the legislation that is enacted in the Congress of the United States, and I for one am willing to agree to and abide by the majority rule, not only of my party but of my country.

There are two propositions that are of great interest to the people of the United States, and as a layman in the Republican Party I say that the thing for the Republican Party to do, being in the majority in this House, is not to evade issues but to meet them squarely and abide by the result. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not intend to plead anybody's cause for political purposes, but there are two issues that interest the American people—one particularly interesting a certain part of the personnel of our country, 2,000,000 strong, and their immediate relatives, and the other to the whole populace of the United States: The soldiers' bonus and universal military training, and I think it is time for this Congress to meet them. [Applause.] For myself, I am not at this time, and I do not know whether I shall at any time advocate universal military training. There are what seem to me to be four good reasons why America should not adopt a policy of universal and compulsory military training at this time. Two of those are quite frankly based upon expediency and two are based upon the fundamentals of our Government. Those of expediency are:

1. In so far as I have been able to read the public mind, an overwhelming majority of the people are against such a policy. This is particularly true of the people of the Mississippi Valley and of my own district. Included in this majority are virtually all the mothers who have sons, farmers, men who work for wages, and small business men; in other words, most women and the general run of male citizens. I am aware, of course, that popular opinion may not be at all times and upon all questions a sure guide to the country's needs. But legislative as well as executive officers are very frequently reminded that they are public servants, and their obedience to the public will is the genius of our Government.

2. The cost of such a policy is at this time prohibitive. In general, of course, cost is to be considered in relation to the benefits which will accrue. There come times, however, when no matter how beneficial a thing may seem to be if it is not fundamentally essential the cost will be too high to undertake it. Not many will argue that universal military training is indispensable. And taxes are now so high, the cost of Government is so great, that I, at least, believe that until the public burden is very substantially reduced nothing costing money should be undertaken if it is not indispensable. Estimates of the cost of universal training range from $600,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 a year. Accept the lowest figure as sufficient, and it is still too much to be added to the public budget.

Coming to the fundamental objections to universal military training they are——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Such a policy will foster a military caste. I am opposed, and I believe our Government itself is opposed, to the establishment of castes of any sort—a labor caste, a business caste, a professional caste, or any other. To train all the youth of America year by year will require a permanent body of military officers so much larger than we have ever reckoned with that none can guess what its influence will be. Of this we may be sure, however: It will be a body numerous enough and influential enough to make its desires an issue in every national election. This is something, it seems to me, wholly undesirable and inexcusable in our kind of government.

A nation trained for war invites war. It is futile to say our people would be trained for defense only. We ought to know ourselves better than that. The individual trained and powerful for defense—who thinks he can lick anyone—is the one who takes offense when none is meant and gets into needless fights. Nations are not so different. In 1913 I sat on the veranda of a hotel in Potsdam watching a splendid parade of the Imperial Guard. I asked a German citizen next to me: "What is to be the outcome of all this?" "That we will lick somebody or get licked," he said. We all know the answer now. I do not believe America will ever become the military, trouble-hunting, offensive nation Germany was; but I do believe it would be a serious mistake and a contradiction of the very purpose of our Government for us even to get started in that direction.

Back of all, as a principle of the civilization our Nation is trying to exemplify, is this: None but an inevitable war can ever be right. Possibly—probably, even—we will have inevitable wars from time to time. When we do, the price of victory will be high. But in the long run, year by year and generation by generation, I do not believe the cost will be as high—in lives, in suffering, in money, or in destruction—through adherence to the policy we have pursued since the birth of the Nation as it would be if we were trained and ready to engage in any war, right or wrong, which might seem to our advantage at the time. Faithful to our old policy, we will at the least insure ourselves against the folly and wickedness of an unrighteous war.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to reiterate again what I said at the outset, and that is that the American people are watching the Congress of the United States and asking us not to sidestep vital issues. Whether what I have said is right or wrong, there is a burden of responsibility upon Congress, and it rests largely upon the Republicans, because we are in the majority in this House.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a short question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. Is it your judgment that this bill should embody a provision for compulsory universal military training?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. That this bill should?

Mr. MILLER. That this bill should, this bill that we are now considering.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I have been speaking about eight minutes in opposition to universal military training.

Mr. MILLER. I am asking a question of the gentleman from Illinois, and I would like him to state to the House whether he is in favor of this bill that we are now considering embodying a provision for universal military training?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I am not.

Mr. MILLER. That is what I thought.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask the gentleman if his opinion in reference to universal military training would be changed if he was informed that the military power in Germany had created a revolution there, and to-day we are advised that they are in the saddle and that conditions in the world had changed considerably from what they were on the day before yesterday?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman that five trips to Europe convinced me that universal military training was largely the cause of the attempt upon the part of Germany to override the civilization of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not thus far sought to participate in the debate on this military reorganization bill, having contented myself with listening rather than talking. I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] which proposes to preserve the status quo of the Dental Corps and keep them on an equality with the other branch of the medical profession in the service. This is merely a matter of justice, as I view it. They are, in fact, a part of the medical profession, and did their full share in the recent war in relieving the sufferings and contributing to the welfare of our soldiers, and the very least that we can do justly is to give them what the gentleman's amendment proposes, as I construe it.

I want to say that I heartily concur in the sentiments expressed by my distinguished friend from Illinois, Mr. SMITH, who has just preceded me. I think I am correct in saying that a large majority of the people of my district and State are opposed to compulsory universal military training. I think the proposition is un-American, unrepublican, and undemocratic. I also think that it is unnecessary, and that our experience in the World War conclusively demonstrated that fact, because some of the most effective fighting was done by our American boys who had had less than 60 days' training. If any foreign country should attack us, we are ready to defend our homes and our institutions, and we do not need compulsory military training to get us ready, to say nothing of the enormous expense that would be involved.

Our soldier boys have been overseas once, and unless I am very much mistaken they do not want to repeat the experiment. I think they would prefer to remain here and defend our own land and our own homes, which they are ready at all times to do, and that is one reason why I am opposed to the League of Nations, unless it is Americanized; and, to be perfectly frank about it, I do not care very much whether it is adopted or rejected after it is Americanized.

Something has been said in this debate about economy and in favor of higher pay for our officers and enlisted men, and my primary purpose in asking the privilege of addressing the committee was to make one or two observations in that connection. I do not think there is any man in this House who appreciates more fully than I do the great burden of taxation under which our people are laboring, nor who sympathizes more deeply than I do with that larger class of our citizenship—the poor—upon whose backs the burden of taxation always falls with crushing weight. I do not wish it to be understood from what I said a few moments ago in interrupting the gentleman from New York that I was endeavoring to criticize the leadership of my party with regard to the expenditure of the people's money. I am in favor of reasonable economy, but not of niggardly or short-sighted economy.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman realizes that I only have five minutes in which to express my views.

Mr. MADDEN. I will only take a moment.

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, well; all right.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to know if it has not always been the policy of the gentleman never to vote against an appropriation or for taxation?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; the gentleman states that a bit too strongly; but I will confess that I have some leaning in that direction [laughter], except that, as the gentleman knows, I confine my votes for appropriations for our own people. I want to see taxation equally and fairly distributed, and I also want the same thing with regard to the distribution of appropriations, and I do not think that has always been done heretofore. I wish it understood that I am not seeking to criticize anybody for the radical cuts that were made in the estimates of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and in other estimates submitted by different executive branches of the service, which I think were exorbitant and inexcusable. But what I am trying to do is to make a distinction between real economy and artificial economy. The extravagant expenditure of public money is one thing and its judicious expenditure for needful public purposes is quite another thing. I want to see economy practiced where it is necessary and wise, but I do not want my party to seek, by neglecting necessary expenditures, to create an artificial balance on the credit side of the ledger for whatever purpose it may be intended. I do not believe that this is the sort of economy that will appeal to public opinion when we go before the people again for their suffrage.

There has been a time, and within my recollection, too, when places in the various branches of the public service were desirable. This is not the case now in the great majority of places of moderate salaries, because those capable of filling them can secure private employment at a much more remunerative wage. In other words, I think we err in seeking to practice too much economy when it will result in crippling the public service.

Speaking now to my Republican brethren, I beg to say that I do not think we are serving the best interests of our party when we consent to loaning or giving money to foreign countries while we have hundreds of thousands of people here at home who need help. I do not believe that it is to our credit as a party to permit functions of the public service to be conducted in shacks and sheds, and sometimes even in the open air, while giving money bounteously in other and less needful directions. There are hundreds of places in the United States to-day where the business of the people of this great Nation is being conducted under conditions that are a disgrace, and we ought to have the courage to remedy them. Of course we all understand that we are not to have a public buildings bill at this session, but if we do not have it at the next session I for one will endeavor to know the reason why. [Applause.] So far as I am personally concerned I do not propose to be one of the dramatis personae of the ostrich act which is now being played in certain quarters. [Applause.]

Before I take my seat I wish to make one further observation, and that is that we owe it to our soldier boys of the late World War to treat them at least as liberally as we have treated our soldiers of other wars. I have introduced several bills designed to give them relief in one direction or another, and I hope that my efforts have not been without some beneficial results to them. So long as I remain a Member of this body I intend to continue to work for the promotion of their interests. I want to say this one thing, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, and that is that the boys do not want swamp lands. I have talked with hundreds of them, and that sentiment is universal. They made a greater sacrifice than we can ever compensate them for, and they do not expect that. They are intelligent and patriotic young Americans. They understand the condition of our Treasury and of the country in general, and all they ask is that we give them a little help financially, so that they may by their own endeavors get on their feet again and get back to the position they occupied before they left their homes and their avocations and went to war for our country. That is the least that we ought to do for them, and I for one am in favor of doing it now. I think we have waited too long already, and we ought to stop this quibbling and debate and committee hearings and proceed to enact some affirmative measure of relief. If the Government is not in position financially to do it by the payment of a direct bonus, then let us do it by a bond issue or devise some method which will give them the relief that they ask for. That is all that I care to say now, Mr. Chairman, on these matters. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORES of Indiana: Page 31, line 12, after the word "corps," insert the words "and Dental Corps."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 31, line 6, after the words "Artillery Corps," insert "the Judge Advocate General's Department."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I must ask the indulgence of the committee for speaking so often on this bill, not being a member of the committee which framed it; but I wish to say, in justification, that I have studied this matter with great interest and am deeply concerned about it.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that on page 31 the bill provides that all the officers in the Medical Corps, Dental Corps, Veterinary Corps, and so on, naming all of the corps in the Army except three, shall be so placed on the lineal list as not to disturb their present rank, not to disturb their present position on those lists. From that list are omitted the Judge Advocate General's Department, the Quartermaster Corps, and the Ordnance Department, and the military storekeeper.

Mr. CALDWELL. And the construction corps.

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; since that amendment was adopted.

Now, gentlemen, I call your attention to the effect that this will have. The effect of omitting the Judge Advocate General's Department from that portion of the bill will be to make it possible for a major in any of the corps mentioned—the Infantry, Cavalry, Medical Corps, Dental Corps, or Veterinary Corps—to be placed higher on the list than a lieutenant colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department provided the major in the Infantry or other corps has had a total commissioned service longer than the lieutenant colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

The gentleman from the General Staff who appeared before the committee explained why it was necessary to give a doctor in the Army credit for two years more than any other officer. In other words, under the terms of this bill if a man is in the Medical Department he is automatically given two additional years over the length of time which he has served.

That is done on the theory that it requires special knowledge and additional education to be a surgeon or physician. But when it comes to the lawyers they are not only not given two additional years, but the bill is so drawn that a major or lieutenant colonel in any other branch of the Army can be promoted over a lieutenant colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department, provided that major or lieutenant colonel has had a total commissioned service longer than that of the lieutenant colonel in the Judge Advocate General's Department. Gentlemen, I do not believe that is fair.

A moment ago in discussing another amendment I stated that I believed in the one single list, but when you adopt that list I believe you ought to adopt it as it stands to-day, and if you except the Judge Advocate General's Department from the terms of this bill, on page 31, you absolutely discriminate against the Judge Advocate General's Department of the Army.

Now, I have no direct interest in this matter, but I am interested in preserving the morale of the Army; and the only way you can preserve it is to establish the one list as it stands to-day; and whenever you undertake by legislation to juggle with that list and make it possible for some man who now ranks below another to jump him by legislation, you are going to do that which is destructive of the spirit of the Army. Now, there is a great deal of jealousy in the Army. There is a great deal of jealousy not only among individuals, but against branches of the service. Col. Spaulding in his testimony along this line sets out his views of the single list. Now, I understand, of course, how officers in the Army have their jealousies among the departments. Col. Spaulding is not a member of the Judge Advocate General's Department, and of course it did not occur to him perhaps exactly what the effect of this omission would be. But I will say, gentlemen, that if a surgeon is to be placed in the list and promoted according to his present rank, why should a judge advocate, who has to have additional training, be discriminated against and the surgeons be given two years additional credit on the list and the judge advocate penalized?

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is purely an administrative matter, which can be remedied by the Chief of Staff of the Army and those in authority. On page 32 of the bill the matter of placing the men in the Judge Advocate General's Department, the Quartermaster Corps, the Ordnance Department, and so forth, is provided for. Now, the change that the gentleman cites has had consideration from the committee, and I will confess that if the situation in the Judge Advocate General's office was to be taken just as it is it might be wrong, but that is not necessary. In the Judge Advocate General's office we have four officers who have a temporary rank and who have served during the war and who are inferior in rank to two or three other officers who have been assigned to duty in the Judge Advocate General's Department, and who have more years of service in the Army than the men who have really had charge of this work during the war.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is a temporary rank.

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. This does not affect those holding a temporary rank.

Mr. CRAGO. You are attempting, because a man holds a temporary rank, to perpetuate that rank, in order that he may outrank others of longer service in the Army, but not so long in this department.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the gentleman's pardon; he does not understand my amendment. My object is not to disturb the relative rank in the Judge Advocate General's office at all. I am trying to prevent a colonel in the Judge Advocate General's office being outranked by a lieutenant colonel of Infantry because he has served longer than the colonel in the Judge Advocate General's office.

Mr. BEE. Under that suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, you would do away with the single list.

Mr. CRAGO. You would not do away with the single list, but you are doing this because a man had gone into the Judge Advocate General's office with a high rank who has not had the service; he is outranking a man who has had longer Army service but not in this department. A man may have served with troops for a number of years and then have been assigned to the Judge Advocate General's office. I believe that has occurred, where a man 18 or 20 years in the service has been a subordinate to a man who had 12 or 14 years' service in the Army. I contend that that is not right. Our position is that a man in these departments should have rank from the date of his commission in the service. As to the temporary situation in the Judge Advocate General's Department that can be remedied.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not referring to that at all. Why does the gentleman make a difference on page 32, where it says that the officers of the Judge Advocate General, the Quartermaster, and the Ordnance Corps shall not be arranged according to the present position, according to the length of the service, and shall be placed at the foot of the list. If the gentleman will read on page 31 he will see that it names nearly every branch of the service except the Quartermaster and the Judge Advocate General, and provides specifically that they shall retain the present rank, colonels among colonels and lieutenant colonels among lieutenant colonels. I want to make it possible so that a lieutenant colonel who had had a longer service can not outrank a colonel in the Adjutant General's office.

Mr. CRAGO. If he has attained that position on the list you want to return him to where he would be if he had not had the extra promotion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no.

Mr. CRAGO. I thought the gentleman had in mind the office of the Judge Advocate General as organized to-day. There is a situation existing there which appeals to some of us. The gentleman's amendment would have that effect.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am in favor of putting the colonels among the colonels and the lieutenant colonels among the lieutenant colonels. I want it like it is to-day, disregarding the temporary rank altogether.

Mr. CRAGO. If that is the gentleman's amendment I do not know that I would have any objection to it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, may I call attention to the fact that this paragraph does not include colonels.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know that I would have said anything if it had not been for the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, my very good friend, Mr. CONNALLY, that there was jealousy in the Army and between its branches, and that the Army officers who were our fighting force in time of war devoted their attention in time of peace to promotions.

Mr. Chairman, I venture the prediction that there is no more jealousy between the officers of the Army or between the different branches of the Army than exists in any other class of men. Lawyers are never jealous of each other, it appears. I presume that is because everybody is against them to such an extent that they must stand together. That may be the reason, but you never find jealousy among lawyers. Probably they sympathize with each other in their misfortune. I contend that the average Army officer of the United States from the day of George Washington to this good hour, with such rare exceptions as prove the rule, has been a splendid type of American wherever he is placed. We speak occasionally of the golden days of the Army which are past and gone. The golden days of the Army are past and gone merely because we have receded from that time. In the ranks of the officers of the United States Army, with those who came from West Point, with those who came from the National Guard, with those who came from the ranks, with those who came from civilian life, with those who remained in the service because of their services in the Great War, has always been found the standard of a gentleman and a soldier, and in my judgment it will be preserved through all time.

I am not opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] if it accomplishes the purpose he intends, because an officer in the Judge Advocate's corps is just as much entitled to promotion in rank as an officer in another corps, but I could not let this opportunity pass, in view of the statements made here, without saying that in my judgment in the past, in the present, and in the years to come, if occasion arises, officers of the United States Army will not only be efficient in time of war, but will be what they are to-day—splendid examples of the American soldier, faithful to their flag, loyal to the traditions of their country, and efficient in the administration of their duty, as they have been in all of the years of the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNALLY) there were—ayes 18, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 34, line 6, after line 5, strike out all of section 24b, down to and including line 13.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on a preferential amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWOPE: Page 34, line 15, strike out the words "not be subject to review by any authority" and insert in lieu thereof the following "be subject to review by the Secretary of War."

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SWOPE. I decline to yield, Mr. Chairman.

I take issue with the gentleman from Kansas, because I believe that this section should be retained. I am in favor of it in the main. I think there should be some way of getting rid of the so-called "deadwood." At the same time I think that these officers should be protected in their rights, and under this section I do not believe that they are so protected.

Now, this section 24 (b) creates a board of not less than five general officers, to be convened each year by the President. These officers are to classify all of the officers into two classes, namely, class A, those who are to be retained in the service; and class B, those who are not to be retained in the service. In other words, this is to be, in the parlance of the Army, a "benzine" board. The objection which I find is in line 14 and 15, on page 34, which read as follows:

The findings of the board shall not be subject to review by any authority.

Now, that is a very dangerous provision. And why? Because, in the first place, this board will be unable to know all the qualifications of all the officers they pass upon and will be compelled to rely almost entirely upon the efficiency cards of the officers. That is where the trouble begins, because these efficiency or qualification cards mean practically nothing, and I can demonstrate that to you very clearly. In the first place, these cards originate in the company, where the captain grades the lieutenants, and then in the battalion, where the major grades the captains, and in the regiment, where the colonel grades the majors and regrades all the officers in the regiment. A different scale may be used for grading in each regiment.

I know of one officer who was graded by a colonel who used a high grade, and this officer received a grade of 89 or 90. Two weeks thereafter he was transferred to another regiment, where the colonel used a very low scale in the grading of his officers, and this officer received a grade of only 56. And although that was one of the high grades given by that particular colonel, nevertheless it was only a little better than placing that man on probation. So you see that the information that will be received as to the qualifications of these officers by this board of general officers contemplated under this section is at best bound to be most unreliable and inaccurate.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWOPE. No; I must decline to yield.

And therefore it is most unwise to cloak this board with such despotic authority by saying its findings shall not be subject to review by any authority.

I want to know what is the idea of placing such complete confidence in the judgment of these Regular Army generals? They are human and as liable to make mistakes as anyone else. And to say that this board shall have the authority to "benzine" an officer into class B for discharge or retirement and that the findings of the board shall not be subject to review is out of the question. It is violative of every principle of justice to say that this board shall arbitrarily "benzine" an officer into class B for discharge retirement upon a grade he has never seen, without a hearing and without even the right of appeal.

I think that our experience in the last three years has taught us a great deal better than that. Suppose the findings of a court-martial, which sentenced to death two soldiers because while acting as sentries they went to sleep from exhaustion while on duty, had not been subject to review? These findings were approved by Gen. Pershing, and he is a great man and is the highest general in our Army, but if it had not been for the right of review and if it had not been for the fact of Executive clemency those boys would have been in their graves to-day, which would have been a great injustice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SWOPE. I know, Mr. Chairman, that it will be argued by the committee, and it is so stated in the hearings, that by having the findings not subject to review it will do away with politics. As long as you have the human element, Mr. Chairman, you are bound to have politics. [Applause.]

Politics will play just as large a part in this board as it would with the reviewing authority. Every Member of this House knows that there is more politics in the Army than there is right here on the floor of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, you know the lobbying that has been going on ever since this bill has been before the House. It has been difficult to tell whether the Army headquarters is down in the Army and Navy Building or here in the corridors of the House of Representatives.

I submit Mr. Chairman, that it is——

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWOPE. I must decline to yield. I submit it is the part of wisdom to make these hearings subject to review by the Secretary of War, and that we should not exempt the findings of the board or any other similar board from review by the proper authorities. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute as a perfecting amendment to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers a substitute amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 34, line 14, after the words "Class A," strike out the remainder of the line and all of line 15 and line 16 down to and including the word "is," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Upon the approved finding of the board that the officer be," and in line 18, after the word "the," insert the word "approved."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not a substitute.

Mr. MADDEN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] was a perfecting amendment, and it is entitled to the first consideration.

Mr. CALDWELL. Then I offer the amendment without the last proposition of inserting the word "approved."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is not a substitute then.

Mr. CALDWELL. It covers the same ground.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Kentucky moved to strike out certain language and insert other language. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out a lot more than that. It may be on the same subject; I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, but it can be made if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky goes up or down. The gentleman from New York will still have the same right.

Mr. CALDWELL. The object is exactly the same, except that this is the language that has been used continuously in the law.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman from New York ought to interject himself into this amendment for the purpose of crowding out the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE].

Mr. CALDWELL. I am a member of the committee, and I was on my feet offering the amendment when the gentleman from Kentucky offered his. I have no pride in offering the amendment. I am willing that anybody should have his name on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be considered for the present as not in order as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY as a substitute to the amendment offered by Mr. SWOPE: Page 34, line 14, after the words "Class A," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In any case in which an officer is placed in class B by said board the decision of such board shall not be final until the officer affected is informed of the respect in which he has been found deficient and is afforded an opportunity to be heard and offer such records and testimony as may be pertinent to the inquiry by the board. After such hearings and findings by such board the officer affected shall have the right to appeal to the Secretary of War under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I submit that that is not a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky. It may cover the same subject matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the suggestions of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understood that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was to strike out certain language and insert other language. The substitute proposed by the gentleman from Texas strikes out other language besides that proposed to be stricken out by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the amendment of the gentleman from New York did that. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas strikes out the same language that the gentleman from Kentucky moved to strike out and adds something.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I thought it struck out a good deal more.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the Chair is mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that the Chair is in error. The gentleman is correct. The Chair will hold that the amendment is not in order.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Whose amendment?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in sympathy with the fundamental purpose of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE]. He wants to protect the rights and the good name of 17,000 commissioned officers in the United States Army. He wants to give them a right to appeal. He wants to have the findings of this star-chamber board reviewed. But by whom shall those findings be reviewed? Now, there is the fix. Where shall they go? To the Secretary of War, says the gentleman from Kentucky. Well, let us see how that works.

You gentlemen remember very well what has happened in the case of Maj. Harry Graham, an admirable, amiable, competent, brave soldier, who, by the offhand decision of a military martinet, was improperly and unjustly put out of the line of promotion. This House passed a bill to restore him to his lineal position in the line. The action was absolutely nonpartisan. The Members on both sides of this aisle, by a unanimous vote, voted to restore to that fine officer the rank in line to which he was entitled. And what happened? You might expect that he might make at least as strong an appeal to the Secretary of War as he made to us. And no doubt he did, but the Secretary yielded to the Army clique and, through his influence, our action was vetoed. And that would seem to be the inevitable result where the court of appeal is too closely allied in interest with the accusers.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GRIFFIN. And therefore I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that the Secretary of War or any other official, bound up in Army alliances, will make a very poor tribunal to which to appeal against injustice.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Pardon me. I will yield in just a moment. I want to finish this thought. You are trying to temper and make bearable a section of this bill which is utterly hopeless and vicious. It embodies unalloyed Prussianism utterly inimical to every principle of justice. It is absolutely beyond salvation by amendment and it ought to be entirely eliminated from this bill. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not be camouflaged by the promise that by this bouncing board, or benzine board, as he calls it, you are going to get rid of dead timber. You are more likely to get rid of good timber by trying to doctor and preserve this section in the bill. What it needs is amputation, not amendment. It is essentially vicious, unjust, and un-American. If the gentleman will reconsider it for a moment, I hope he will withdraw his amendment, and permit several amendments which are now at the desk to be voted on to eliminate the entire section.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is it possible that the gentleman from Kentucky is proposing to amend a great bill for the benefit of one man?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know. For my part I do not make an appeal on behalf either of persons or parties. This question is larger than partisanship. It affects the inalienable right of 17,000 commissioned officers to the benefit of those fundamental rights which we have been taught so long to revere, namely, the right to know the charge against us, the right to be confronted with the witnesses against us, the right to cross-examine, and the right to produce evidence in our defense. All of these privileges are granted to the lowest and meanest in our land; and yet, under this anomalous section, the fundamental right of fair trial is denied to the very men in our land who preeminently ought to be protected by all the safeguards of our law when they are attacked in regard to that which all honorable men most highly esteem—their fair name as gentlemen and soldiers. I appeal to you, my colleagues, as Americans to resent the inherent viciousness of this section, which permits a star chamber board or commission of five men to examine into an officer's military record, and, without giving him a hearing, make a finding against him which will result in his discharge from the Army in practical disgrace. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us vote.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I simply wanted to explain the purpose of the amendment, but I think gentlemen understand it sufficiently, and in view of the evident desire to vote I will yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] has been adopted. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is still pending.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers a preferential amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY: Page 34, line 14, after the words "class A," strike out the balance of the line and all of line 15 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "In any case in which an officer is placed in class B by said board, the decision of such board shall not be final until the officer affected is informed of the respects in which he has been found deficient and is afforded an opportunity to be heard and to offer such records and testimony as may be pertinent to the inquiry by the board. After such hearing and findings by such board the officer affected shall have the right of appeal to the Secretary of War under such regulations as may be provided by the Secretary."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. Part of line 15, which this amendment proposes to strike out, has already been stricken out by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CONNALLY. But there was other matter inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman's motion is to strike it out as amended?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Should not the motion be made accordingly?

Mr. CONNALLY. My amendment proposes to take the place of the words inserted by the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will modify the gentleman's amendment so as to have it come in at the proper place.

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SWOPE] in his amendment, but I do not believe it goes far enough. You will notice in this bill the following language:

The findings of the board shall not be subject to review by any authority.

Of course, I do not believe anybody in this House on reflection will vote for that language in any kind of a bill, but the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky only provides that this action of the board shall be reviewed by the Secretary of War. What does that mean? The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is simply that the findings of this board will have to be approved by the Secretary of War. That board meets behind closed doors. It passes on a man's case without his knowledge. The officer may be out in an Army post in Arizona or Texas, and the first notice that he has of the fact that the board has passed on his qualifications is a notice that he is out of the service. My amendment goes further than that of the gentleman from Kentucky. It provides that no officer shall be discharged until he has been served with a "citation," if you please [applause], until he has had an opportunity to know in what respect his record has been found deficient. Gentlemen of the committee, what good will it do to allow this matter to be reviewed by the Secretary of War when the officer affected does not know anything about the fact that he is being tried. Do you not know that the Secretary of War, as a matter of course, will approve the findings of an Army board that passes on a man's technical qualifications as an officer unless the officer who is affected has some opportunity to come up and say, "You have made a mistake about this matter"? Now, on what do they base these recommendations? As the gentleman from Kentucky said, they base them on a system of cards, efficiency records. During the war the Army established a very elaborate system of markings on efficiency cards; but to-day it has discarded that system, and repudiated it and done away with it, showing conclusively that that system was not reliable or efficient. My amendment provides that a man shall have a hearing and that he shall be confronted with the witnesses who testify against him.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is the gentleman willing to go so far as to admit that any board of five men shall pass upon the qualifications of 17,000 commissioned officers in the United States Army?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, well, if a man has an appeal, and he has a trial, the publicity of the facts will prevent injustice in many cases. I think you have got to have a canning board.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is there anything in the amendment to provide for the formulation of the charges?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the gentleman from New York had listened to the reading of my amendment, he would not ask that question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The amendment only goes to his appeal after he has had his trial.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; it says before the action of the board shall be final he shall be served with notice and in what respect he has been found deficient.

Mr. GRIFFIN. After he is tried.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I wish the gentleman would not interrupt, if the gentleman had listened to the reading of the amendment——

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am using the gentleman's language and his construction of the language.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, but it is provided in the amendment that he must have a trial. Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I do not know who wrote this specific provision of the bill, whether the General Staff or the committee, but whoever wrote it knew very little about law and knew very little about the institutions of the Anglo-Saxon race when he put it within the power of five officers behind closed doors to kick a man out of the Army and then put into the law these words: "The action of this board shall not be reviewed by any authority."

Why, the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. By his order he may send a fleet across the sea or the Army to battle on foreign lands, but he can not disturb the findings of these five sacred officers on the board who say that an officer of the Army must leave the service without a hearing and without a trial. The Secretary of War is vested with almost plenary powers in controlling the War Department and all its activities, but when it comes to this sacred question of the board, by the terms of this act the Secretary of War can do anything else, but he must not review the canning factory that meets behind closed doors without the knowledge of the officer upon whose fate and fortune it is passing. The Secretary of War must not review the action of such board.

The gentleman from Kentucky was exactly right, except his amendment does not go far enough. What good does it do for a man to have his case reviewed if he has no opportunity to present the facts? What good does it do to have his case reviewed if he does not know that it is even being tried? What consolation would it be after he had been kicked out by five officers to have it approved by the Secretary of War, also in secret and without his knowledge?

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know who wrote this section of the bill? It was the General Staff.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am not opposed to the General Staff; I think it is a useful functionary of the Government; but what I want to do is for the Congress to fix the duties of the General Staff by law. If this language is adopted, Congress will be responsible and not the General Staff.

I believe in giving a man a fair trial. If you go out and pick up a fellow for speeding, he has a right to a jury trial before a court, he has a right to have witnesses subpœnaed. If I seek to take the property of the gentleman from Kentucky, he has a right to be served with notice, have a hearing and witnesses subpœnaed.

But by the terms of this bill you place in the power of five shoulder-strapped officers behind closed doors the right to pass on the honor, happiness, and welfare of an officer of the Army without his knowledge, without his having any opportunity to appear and defend the record that he has made. Do you not know that a man's record in civil or military life is more valuable oftentimes than the money or wealth he may accumulate? There are many officers in the Army to-day that would rather be beggars all their lives than to be sent from the Army with the stamp of disgrace or ignominy on their records which you make possible by the paragraph in this bill.

I am not hostile to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, except that his amendment does not go far enough, and I appeal to Members to adopt my amendment and give every officer in the Army, however humble he may be, the right to go before his accusers and have a specification of the charges which may be brought against him. Do not throw him out of the Army and send him into disgrace without a trial. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I think the House is in a temper to agree heartily with those who want exact justice and impartiality to all officers who may be under accusation and which has been so eloquently advocated by Members who have proposed their amendments to the bill. I want to call attention to the fact that if we adopt this substitute which has been proposed we wipe out the very satisfactory compromise which would accomplish the same thing that the gentleman wants to do. The parliamentary status is such that with the Swope amendment adopted, if this substitute is adopted, it means that we wipe out all that we have adopted by way of amendment. That is the understanding that most of us have.

Mr. CONNALLY. All that the substitute does is to say that this shall be reviewed by the Secretary of War, and my amendment says that it shall be reviewed by the Secretary of War, and it does not change the principle, but goes a little further and requires that he have a trial.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Very well.

I want to take this occasion to dispel, if I may, from the minds of the committee any thought that the Committee on Military Affairs in adopting this section of the bill had any idea of setting up any star-chamber proceedings whatsoever. I want to say that under the law as it exists there is no way to eliminate from the Regular Army's commissioned personnel an unfit officer unless it can be found in one of two ways either that he has violated the Articles of War and the Regulations so that he has subjected himself to punishment by court-martial for an actual offiense or crime or because he fails to pass a professional examination for promotion. We all know as practical men——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. But under the existing law passed in 1890 and in force since that time is not the President authorized to prescribe the system of the examination?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that if the present law is enforced by those having it in charge and it functions properly can not we get rid of the dead timber, if there is any dead timber?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It may seem so, until you come to work under what has been prescribed, and it has been found not to work. That is the reason why we propose this new thing.

What we are trying to get at here is not to test the academic and professional fitness, and it is not a test that is to take the place of the ordinary court-martial proceedings. When a man is guilty of doing a wrong thing, it is so obvious that you can get at that at once. What we want to reach here is that type of old-time or young-time officer who is manifestly by temperament and disposition and various other more or less nebulous things that go to make up his personality unfit to be in command of troops and unfit to articulate himself with the military organization. He may be possessed of all of the normal virtues of character. He may be a man of superior education. He may be able to qualify on all of the present tests of the Army for a commission, and yet lack the necessary temperamental suitability and fitness for a military career, so that he would probably be of more usefulness outside of the Army than in it.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In just a moment. In this class also is the type of officer whose kind has sometimes been suggested to you in these recent months as the "hard-boiled." He does not commit any military offense. Often he is a man of such superior intellectual attainments that he is easily able to qualify for the academic and professional examinations to advance through the grades. But the man is notoriously unfit to have in his power and keeping and under his military responsibility the lives and fortunes of soldiers.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. My amendment does not destroy the board. They could still get rid of that kind of man, could they not?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes. I am quite in sympathy with the general intent of the gentleman to safeguard this thing so that no injustice may be done. I am trying only to answer the suggestion that I think has been rather imprudently made on the floor, that this is a deliberate attempt on the part of the committee to set up star-chamber proceedings to railroad men out of the Army who ought not to be so dismissed.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Take the hard-boiled officer such as the gentleman has mentioned. The incidents upon which is based the statement that he is hard-boiled would show somewhere in his efficiency reports, would they not?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Frequently they would not.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Then are we going to demote officers or put them out of the service or promote them upon something that is intangible?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No; that is exactly what we want to get at by this qualification.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Under present existing law, what is there to interfere as a part of the examination, with its being prescribed that a certain number of credits shall be given to a man's record as shown by the efficiency report?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. My esteemed friend, the gentleman from Kentucky, handled that situation very, very skillfully when he said that these paper records alone are not to be trusted as an estimate of a man's capacity for military service.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That very fact that the gentleman from Kentucky brought out was among the reasons why this committee unanimously, so far as I now remember, voted against the idea of basing promotion in the Army on what is known as the selective system; that is, for the very reason that these cards would not be a fair index of the various merits of the various men, and there might possibly be favoritism in it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. If you do not have any confidence in the efficiency of the reports——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Do not read that into my mouth, because I did not say——

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will not say confidence; but the gentleman admits the inadequacy of the report as a basis, and he admits the inadequacy of examinations as a basis, and there is nothing left upon which to base promotion except those intangible influences where a man's personal equation is the prominent factor.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLE. Why does the gentleman say there is no other way to get men out of the Army when they have had a perfect string of men taken out of the Army?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That was under the operation of the extreme war powers of the President during the war. We are attempting to get back to statutes in time of peace.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. BEE. I will ask the gentleman if there is not danger in this matter. Here is an officer who served, say, 15 years. He becomes useless for any other avocation in the world. He is brought before one of these boards from which he can not appeal if he is reduced or discharged.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I meant to be understood that I myself and the committee are sympathetic with the idea of giving these men all the chance they can have, and if there can be framed proper words to clarify this section, if it needs any clarification, that is what we desire. If the committee has used language which does not seem to go to the extent that the temper of this House has wisely indicated it should go, for my part I desire that the language should be made clear. That is the committee's purpose.

But we want to get rid now, in this new democratic army, of the man who, being assured by law that all he had to do was to wait until somebody above him resigned or died before he got promotion, sat down and did as little as he could to get by. We want to see if we can not stimulate the best in these men in the service from now on so that by their own ambition and effort they shall receive a reward for their devotion to the service and not have them simply clock watchers waiting for some man to die.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it is 15 minutes to 5 o'clock, and it is Saturday afternoon, and the committee could meet on Monday and formulate the necessary language.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I will ask that the gentleman have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to ask the gentleman this: Everybody concedes that this should not be permitted. Of course, many of these little mild-mannered changes of this kind really do not amount to anything, just simply mitigate, and the gentleman from New York has made very apt suggestion in that the committee meet between now and Monday and formulate something that will give a man full hearing, such as he might have in a court, and that he will have an appeal to some disinterested party. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection, for my part, for all we are trying to do is intelligently to get at the purpose of the House, and the only thing is to straighten it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is in doubt.

The commfttee divided; and there were—ayes 39, noes 35.

Mr. KAHN and Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The rule that was adopted relating to the consideration of the Army reorganization bill stated that the House should meet at 11 o'clock during the consideration of that bill, the rule making a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on that bill in order. Monday being suspension day, and the consideration of the Army reorganization bill not having yet been concluded, will the House meet on Monday at 11 or 12 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks, from the language employed in the rule, which is as follows:

That during the consideration of the bill the House shall meet at the hour of 11 o'clock ante meridian—would make it necessary for the House to meet at that hour on each day on which the motion to consider it would be in order, until the bill had finally been disposed of.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose the House cares to decide at this time as to whether a motion to go into Committee of the Whole to consider this bill would be in order on Monday or not, and in view of that fact——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It is plainly in order on Monday.

Mr. MONDELL. And in view of that fact, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock on Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon on Monday next. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the request of the gentleman from Wyoming is granted, does not that knock the rule endwise about the 11 o'clock meeting?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would dispense with the 11 o'clock meeting for Monday.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why would it not nullify the whole thing about 11 o'clock?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. You could change it by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was unanimous consent for a single instance during the consideration of the bill. The Chair thinks they can change the hour of meeting for a single day by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The 11 o'clock business is a nuisance in any way you fix it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention of the gentleman to take up the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and suspensions after that?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARD. And conclude the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

Mr. MONDELL. To go through the calendar if there is sufficient time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wyoming if it would be in order at the conclusion of the calendar on Monday to go into Committee of the Whole on this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. I am rather inclined to the opinion that the consideration of the calendar on Monday, with some matters that the Speaker may desire to give consideration to under the suspension of the rules, will take the entire day.

Mr. ANTHONY. If it should not take the entire day, there would be no reason why we should not go on with this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. None in the world.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. GARD. Further reserving the right to object, there seems to be a desire on the part of persons over here to understand whether the Army bill is to be taken up at any time on Monday or not. That is, meaning that they will want to make some arrangements.

Mr. MONDELL. It could not be taken up until we disposed of the Unanimous Consent Calendar and matters that might be taken up under suspension of the rules.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no chance.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think there is any probability of reaching the Army bill on Monday.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman says there is no probability of it?

Mr. MONDELL. I think not.

Mr. GARD. Is the gentleman willing to have it understood that the Army bill will not come up on Monday?

Mr. MONDELL. If it is a matter of very great importance to any of the gentlemen, I have no objection to having that understanding.

Mr. GARD. It is not a matter of extreme importance, but it is a matter of convenience.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. KITCHIN. Monday is not unanimous-consent day.

Mr. GARD. Yes; it is.

Mr. KITCHIN. Unanimous-consent day is on the first and third Mondays. Is next Monday the third Monday?

Mr. KAHN. The first was on Monday.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It came in on Monday.

Mr. WINGO. So that there is no question but that Monday is unanimous-consent day?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought otherwise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LUFKIN, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CULLEN, on Monday, March 15, on account of business in connection with the New York State Hospital Commission.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House resolution 476.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on House resolution 476. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what is the resolution?

Mr. KING. The resolution is to investigate the administration of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman intend to extend his own remarks, or what are they?

Mr. KING. A portion are my own remarks and a portion is a communication from a banker, who is a friend of mine, in Chicago, giving information of a nonpartisan nature of interest to the House.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman did that yesterday. Is it going to be a daily performance?

Mr. KING. No; that was yesterday afternoon.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman started in the afternoon?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I did not object yesterday, but I have received similar statements concerning the same subject, and I presume every other Member of the House has received similar statements, and I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. DYER. Regular order!

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an editorial from the Gloversville Leader, in my district.

Mr. DYER. What about?

Mr. CROWTHER. It is not a political editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing an editorial from a newspaper in his district. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WINGO. What is it about?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we should encumber the RECORD with a lot of editorials. I therefore object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the pending bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. He has that permission, Mr. Speaker. Every Member who speaks on it has it.

Mr. LITTLE. I thank the gentleman. I did not know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, March 15, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation urgently needed for printing and binding for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 687); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a tentative draft of a bill for the sale of the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting lists of papers, documents, etc., in the files of this department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and have no permanent value or historical interest; to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FORDNEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12954) providing for the relief of populations in Europe and in countries contiguous thereto suffering for want of food, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 741), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12525) granting a pension to Kate Young, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 13051) to add certain lands to the Lemhi National Forest, Idaho; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13052) to pension certain survivors of certain Indian wars, disturbances, and campaigns from January 1, 1859, to January 1, 1891; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. EVANS of Montana: A bill (H. R. 13053) for the relief of certain tribes and nations of Indians in the State of Montana; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. FORDNEY: A bill (H. R. 13054) preventing the collection of a double Federal estate tax upon any portion of an estate upon which a Federal estate tax has been imposed and collected within a period of five years prior to any decedent's death; to the Committee on Ways and Means.
